9th Circuit Rules Chinese Fugitive Eligible For Asylum In US. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/10, Page A - 5, Egelko) reports, "A Chinese man who was beaten by officials in his homeland for protesting the forced sterilization of his brother, then fled to the United States, is eligible for political asylum under a law protecting opponents of China's reproductive policy, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday." The Chronicle continues, "The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned an immigration court's ruling ordering the deportation of Li Bin Lin and told the immigration judges to determine whether Lin would face persecution in China. The ruling makes it likely that Lin will qualify for asylum, said his lawyer, Jisheng Li of Honolulu." The Chronicle adds, "Lin lived with his brother, their parents and other relatives in a house in Fujian province on China's southeast coast. When Lin's brother's wife became pregnant with their third child, officials told Lin's brother that he would have to undergo a vasectomy. … The brother left home to avoid the operation, and birth control officials came to the home in March 1998 to seize and destroy household furnishings, the court said. When Lin tried to stop them, they beat him and called security police to have him arrested, according to his court declaration. … He went into hiding and left two months later for the U.S. territory of Guam, where he still lives. His brother was eventually sterilized." The Chronicle notes, "When U.S. officials moved to deport Lin in 2001, he filed for asylum, relying on a 1996 law that makes immigrants eligible if they have been forced to undergo an abortion or sterilization, or if they have been persecuted for 'other resistance to a coercive population control program.' The law was intended to protect those who fled China because of its population-control policies. … The Board of Immigration Appeals, whose judges are Justice Department appointees, ruled against Lin, saying he had not shown resistance to the birth control program and had simply been trying to protect household property."

Hopes Higher For Agricultural Guest-Worker Bill. McClatchy (1/11, Doyle) reports the "introduction Wednesday of an ambitious agricultural guest-worker plan showcases the changed Capitol Hill circumstances that may make 2007 the year for an immigration overhaul." Joined by "lawmakers from Florida and California, and backed by hundreds of farm, labor and church groups," Sen. Larry Craig is "reintroducing a guest-worker plan that's been debated for years. As many as 1.5 million farm workers and their relatives now in this country illegally could gain legal status under the bill." The legislation, "dubbed AgJobs, would also revise an existing guest-worker program that farmers consider inefficient. It's the first big immigration overhaul bill introduced this year, mirroring legislation passed last year by the Senate but not the House of Representatives."

TAX:

Fourth Guilty Plea In KPMG Tax-Shelter Probe. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C7, Davies, Reilly) reports, "A California accountant pleaded guilty yesterday to four criminal charges related to the sale of allegedly improper tax shelters and his role in helping a former KPMG LLP executive try to obstruct a government investigation into the products. The admission marks the fourth guilty plea the government has secured in its investigation into shelters designed by KPMG." The Journal continues, "As part of a deal with prosecutors, Steven Acosta, of Pasadena, Calif., admitted to conspiracy, tax evasion and two counts of obstruction of an Internal Revenue Service investigation. The 49-year-old faces as many as 16 years in prison but has agreed to testify against former KPMG executives facing criminal charges related to the shelters in a trial scheduled for September." The Journal adds, "Mr. Acosta worked briefly for KPMG, but he wasn't among the 19 individuals -- including 17 former KPMG executives -- indicted in November 2005 on criminal charges related to the tax shelters. Mr. Acosta, posing as an independent investment adviser and hedge-fund operator, said he helped David Greenberg, one of the indicted former KPMG executives, to sell shelters. … Mr. Acosta said he didn't have any knowledge or understanding of the transactions he was purportedly providing advice on. In return, Mr. Acosta said, Mr. Greenberg paid him $600,000 for his role. Prosecutors said Mr. Acosta also lied to IRS agents investigating the tax shelters and that his role in the fraud generated $100 million in losses to the government."

NYTimes Says Bush Tax Cuts Made Inequality Worse. The New York Times (1/11) says in an editorial, "The tax system in the United States is supposed to mitigate inequality. But a recent report by Congress's budget agency provides fresh evidence that Bush-era tax cuts have done more to reinforce inequality than to redress it." The agency "found that in 2004, the latest year for which comprehensive data were available, the top 1 percent of households pocketed 14 percent of total after-tax income in the United States, up from 12.2 percent in 2003. That increase, the third largest in one year since the agency started keeping track in 1979, works out to an extra $128 billion. And yet despite that hefty gain, the effective federal tax rate of the top 1 percent decreased slightly."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Democrats Angered By New Judicial Nominees. The Hill (1/11, Schor) reports, "As President Bush withdrew four contentious judicial nominees, apparently offering an olive branch to the new Senate majority, he resubmitted a handful of executive-branch nominations that have angered and dismayed senior Democrats." The Hill continues, "The White House's acknowledgment that its withdrawn judicial picks would face near-certain rejection in the new Congress won praise from Democrats and their allied interest groups. But the renewal late Tuesday of several agency nominations signals that Bush is not backing away from confrontation with Democrats who have held up many of the appointments and could renew their previous holds." The Hill adds, "Several of the re-nominated officials, such as Assistant Secretary of Homeland Security for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Julie Myers and Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees and Migration Ellen Sauerbrey, already are serving in the administration under recess appointments that allowed them to sidestep Senate confirmation votes but expired at the end of the 109th Congress. John Bolton, who became America's ambassador to the United Nations following a recess appointment, opted to step down from the post last month rather than face a bruising Senate battle to win formal confirmation. … Steven Bradbury's nomination to lead the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel was blocked in August by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) in protest of the administration's denial of security clearances necessary to investigate warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency (NSA). Though Justice since has initiated an internal inquiry of the NSA program, Kennedy said yesterday he wants more time for oversight before Bradbury is considered."

House Votes To Increase Minimum Wage. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 6, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The new Democratic majority in Congress kept a campaign promise today, as the House voted to increase the Federal minimum wage from the current $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. That $2.10 raise is the first raise in the minimum wage in 10 years. The bill now goes onto the Senate." The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 10, :25, Couric, 7.66M) said the bill faces opposition in the Senate, where Republicans want any wage hike tied to tax cuts for small businesses." ABC World News (1/10, story 4, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported "the White House said...while President Bush supports the increase, he wants it coupled with tax relief to ease the pain of some of the small business owners we saw in Dean's report."

The AP (1/11, Espo) reports Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "has already signaled that Democrats will accept pro-business changes. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters that he and other lawmakers are working on between $8 billion and $10 billion in relief over 10 years."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports, "When Congress last approved a minimum-wage increase in 1996, the attached business-tax benefits approached $20 billion -- or twice what is now envisioned." But Baucus "is reluctant to go further and use up more of his tax offsets, options he will need in the future to pay for Democratic energy initiatives as well as some form of middle-class protection from the Alternative Minimum Tax." Instead,

"he and the ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, are expected to rely on a small reservoir of tax-shelter changes that the Senate has passed before but were resisted by the House when under Republican control. Among these targets are leasing tax shelters known as sale in and lease out transactions, which have been criticized by the Internal Revenue Service and which Congress has largely outlawed for leases entered into after March 12, 2004." The New York Times (1/11, Hulse, 1.16M), Washington Post (1/11, A6, Weisman, 690K) and Washington Times (1/11, Hurt, 88K), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

USA Today (1/11, Wolf, 2.27M) reports that in the House, "Republicans offered to raise the wage if the increase was accompanied by tax and health care breaks for the nation's 23 million small businesses. … The GOP plan, which would let companies band together to buy health plans, was rejected by a 2-1 ratio. Then, 40% of Republicans voted for the wage hike alone." McClatchy (1/11, Talev) notes the final tally was 315 to 116.

Washington State Businesses Not Hurt By Higher Minimum Wage. The New York Times (1/11, Egan) reports on how the difference in state minimum wage between Washington state, $7.93 per hour, and Idaho, $5.15 per hour, has affected the local economies across the state line. The Times says that "nearly a decade ago, when voters in Washington approved a measure that would give the state's lowest-paid workers a raise nearly every year, many business leaders predicted that small towns on this side of the state line would suffer. But instead of shriveling up, small-business owners in Washington say they have prospered far beyond their expectations." Businesses "here at the dividing line between two economies — a real-life laboratory for the debate — have found that raising prices to compensate for higher wages does not necessarily lead to losses in jobs and profits."

White House Weighs In Against House Stem Cell Bill. The New York Times (1/11, Swarns, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration jumped back into the bitter debate surrounding embryonic stem cell research on Wednesday, urging lawmakers to vote against House legislation to expand such research and calling for a new focus on scientific studies that would not harm embryos." In a White House position paper, "officials pressed for consideration of alternative research strategies that would be "free of the ethical violations of embryo destruction." Administration officials said President Bush was also considering an executive order that would call for increased financing for studies that did not involve embryos. The move came as the House prepared to pass a bill on Thursday that would expand federally supported stem cell research." The legislation, sponsored by Reps Diana DeGette, a Democrat, and Michael N. Castle, a Republican, "would permit federal financing of studies on stem cells derived from embryos at fertility clinics that are scheduled for destruction." The Times adds, "Supporters of the House bill acknowledged, however, that they did not expect to have enough votes to override a presidential veto."

The Washington Post (1/11, A4, Weiss, 690K) reports, "Congressional leaders driving the legislation say they hope to avoid all-out war. Compromise language 'is welcome,'" said DeGette Tuesday. But "if it comes to war, members of Congress and aides from both parties said, supporters have many options not available to them last year. They range from subtle moves that could enhance the odds of overriding a veto to heavy-handed tactics such as attaching the bill to must-pass budget legislation. 'I'm confident we'll have a veto-proof bill this time,' said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.)." USA Today (1/11, Vergano, 2.27M) notes that last year, the bill passed the House 235-193. According to Democratic Sen. Tom Harkin, "a veto-proof majority is more likely in the Senate" this time around.

Bush, Congressional Democrats Expected To Clash On Host Of Issues. Roll Call (1/11, Pierce, Stanton) reports that aside from a minimum wage measure and a lobby and ethics reform bill, President Bush and "the new Democratic-controlled Congress" are "on a collision course on most other issues of national importance this year" such as "a $100 billion-plus supplemental Iraq War spending bill, judicial nominations, a stem-cell research measure, and legislation to give Medicare officials the ability to negotiate lower drug prices." No one "disputes that the highest profile fight will be over the supplemental war spending bill, where Democrats are no doubt poised to use their newfound power to try to make good on their election promises to change the way the war has been run."

Medicare Drug Negotiation Bill Unlikely To Lower Prices. The Washington Post (1/11, A14, Lee) reports Democrats are "fond of citing the Department of Veterans Affairs as evidence that Medicare officials could squeeze lower prices out of drugmakers if the government merely used its negotiating clout. But that comparison ignores important differences between the two systems, experts say." Unlike Medicare, VA "by law receives an automatic 24 percent discount from the average price that wholesalers pay. Its prices are also low because VA, which prescribes medications for 4.4 million veterans annually, has a relatively narrow formulary, or list of approved drugs." VA also "secures big discounts from the manufacturers of a few drugs in each class by promising not to offer competing drugs." But the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) "is prohibited by law from adopting such a list for the year-old Medicare drug benefit, in part because seniors enrolled in what is known as Part D want to have a wide range of drug choices." The House Democratic bill that would "require the Bush administration to negotiate drug prices for Medicare would neither permit a formulary nor require an automatic discount. It would simply require the secretary of health and human services to pursue negotiations and report back to Congress in six months." That is "part of the reason that many experts do not expect the measure to deliver significant savings even if it overcomes opposition in Congress and escapes a possible presidential veto."

The Hill (1/11, Young) reports congressional Democrats are "moving ahead without asking the Bush administration to weigh in, but that hasn't stopped the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) from taking a lead role in pleading the Republican case against Democrats' claims that federal negotiation of drug prices will save money for taxpayers and senior citizens over the deals the private Part D plans are striking with pharmaceutical companies." The Administration's "mounting campaign against the Democratic proposal also is accompanied by a more aggressive defense of Medicare Part D by congressional Republicans, most of whom previously had appeared reluctant to claim credit for the creation of the entitlement program expansion despite high approval ratings from beneficiaries."

Leavitt Criticizes Democratic Push To Negotiate Prices. In a Washington Post op-ed (1/11, A25), Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt says, "Legislation under consideration would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate and set the prices of drugs. In effect, one government official would set more than 4,400 prices for different drugs, making decisions that would be better made by millions of individual consumers. There is also the danger that government price setting would limit drug choices. Medicare provides access to the broadest array of prescription drugs, including the newest drugs. But price negotiation inevitably results in the withholding of access to some drugs to get manufacturers to lower prices."

Kennedy Looks To States To Promote Universal Healthcare. The Financial Times (1/11, Callan) reports Sen. Edward Kennedy "called on the White House to follow the lead of state governors and move to extend healthcare coverage to the uninsured." The move "follows a plan set out by Arnold Schwarzenegger, the Republican governor of California, this week that would extend healthcare to 6.5m uninsured Californians. Mr Kennedy also cited bipartisan co-operation in his home state of Massachusetts, which is the first state to require all residents to have a health plan."

The AP (1/11, Freking) reports Kennedy "has his own version of what universal health coverage would look like. He wants to extend Medicare to all. In his first hearing Wednesday as chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, the Massachusetts Democrat called on 10 witnesses from all over the country to talk about how to make health care more affordable." However, the hearing "also showed that finding agreement won't be easy. While all the witnesses agreed that health care is becoming less affordable every year, they often had very different solutions."

Durbin To Play Key Role In Passage Of Democratic Agenda. In his Washington Post column (1/11, A25) David Broder notes Senate Majority Whip Richard Durbin's role in the passage of the Democrats' 100 hour agenda: "In the next two years, however, a great deal of the Democrats' fate depends on Durbin. As assistant majority leader, or whip, it is up to him to figure out how to corral enough votes in the narrowly divided Senate to pass at least some of the flood of bills that the energized House Democratic majority will send over." Durbin said, "'I just spent two years as minority whip where I had 45 Democratic votes. And, as you well know, if you can find 41 votes to block cloture' -- the move to cut off debate -- you can prevent the majority from bringing its bills to an up-or-down vote." GOP Minority Whip Trent Lott "has the same job, but he has 49 Republican senators, so he has a larger pool from which to find his 41." Broder adds, "While Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada leads the policy debates and handles the public relations, the onus is on Durbin to produce the votes at critical moments."

Reid's Efficiency Plan Costs Byrd Chance To Cast Vote. The Washington Post (1/11, A23, Cillizza) reports, "Just days into his tenure as majority leader," Sen. Harry Reid "received a tongue-lashing from" West Virginia Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D) "for a decision to end a vote before the senior statesman had cast his 'yea' or 'nay.'" Byrd, who has "served in the Senate since 1958 and is a noted stickler for the rules and etiquette that guide the chamber, was unable to make it to the floor in the 15 minutes allotted for a vote yesterday -- his first missed vote since March." Byrd said, "The leadership arbitrarily closed the vote before I could get to the floor. That is not the way legislation is done in a body such as ours." The Post adds Reid has "emphasized his intention to run the body more efficiently, a plan that includes limiting votes, which often have lasted a half-hour or more, to just 15 minutes."

New House GOP Leadership Includes Aggressive Party Advocates. The Washington Times (1/11, Bellantoni) reports House Republicans have "chosen leaders who aren't afraid to attack Democrats to serve in key positions for the 110th Congress, suggesting that the civility on Capitol Hill may not last long." In one example, Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, "beginning his second term, was recently named to serve as a member of the deputy Republican whip team, typically made up of more senior lawmakers. Considered one of the party's up-and-comers, the 31-year-old is known for his frequent tongue-lashings aimed at Democrats." The Times adds the Republicans are "also quick to note Democrats' use of unfair tactics -- such as not subjecting their opening legislative package to committee hearings -- but did not acknowledge that they used the same strategy for years."

Bush Appoints Dudley To Regulatory Policy Post. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, B7, McKinnon, Solomon) reports President Bush "appointed conservative academic Susan Dudley to an influential new job advising on regulatory policy, at a time the regulatory process could serve as a conduit for the White House to push through any policies opposed by a hostile Congress." Dudley's appointment "came after Congress blocked her nomination to be the White House's regulatory czar last year. Her position as a senior adviser to the White House's regulatory office will enable her to influence policy decisions, although she won't be able to implement them on her own." The "apparent end run around Capitol Hill angered liberals who object to her criticism of the federal rule-making process, among other things."

Four Banks Object To US "Basel II" Capital Standards. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C5, Paletta, Pulizzi) reports, "Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., and two other large U.S. banks brought concerns about pending international capital standards known as Basel II to White House officials as crucial deadlines for the standards approach." The Jan. 4 meeting "represents the most recent -- and perhaps highest level -- attempt by the group of banks, which include Wachovia Corp. and Washington Mutual Inc., to bring substantive changes to the Basel II capital proposal before next year. The Federal Reserve and other bank regulators are still discussing how to implement the standards by next January."

"Whistleblower" Secretly Records VA Official Avowing Defiance Of Congress. Under the headline, "Tape Reveals Defiance," The Hill (1/11, Bolton) reports that a "secretly recorded meeting of researchers working for the Department of Veterans Affairs indicates that the department did not take seriously congressional requests intended to safeguard the personal and medical information of veterans. The recording, obtained by The Hill from a researcher who attended the meeting, sheds light on a behind-the-scenes struggle between lawmakers and Veterans Affairs officials over the handling of veterans' personal information." Since the May laptop theft, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee "has asked the department repeatedly to report on the security of its information systems, a task that entails providing information about who had access to sensitive information and how it was stored," and reports have also been requested by the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee. However, Dr. Joseph Francis, "the deputy chief of research and development at the department," told fellow researchers at a September meeting in Baltimore "that Congress would not get what it was looking for." Noting the 1996 federal legislation "directing executive-branch departments to adopt higher cyber-security standards," Francis said, "Congress is actually rather angry at the VA because we've been technically breaking the law for a decade." The meeting attendee "whistleblower" who "secretly recorded the talk" told the Hill that the incident "really illustrates that, to the researchers at the VA, the veterans are guinea pigs and are there to promote the research, which is used in turn to promote researchers' careers."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Speaker's Lobby. The Hill (1/11, McCormack) reports, "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Wednesday that smoking in the Speaker's Lobby will no longer be permitted. 'The days for smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over,' Pelosi said in a press release issued this morning."

Roll Call (1/11, Mcardle) reports, "When asked about Pelosi's new ban, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who is known for having an ever-present cigarette in hand when doing interviews in the ornate room just off the House floor, said, 'That's fine. ... No it won't affect me at all.'" Democratic Rep. Barney Frank, "a well-known cigar smoker, said, 'It's not a big deal. If it had come to a vote on it I would have voted against it.'" USA Today (1/11, Dorell, 2.27M) reports Frank also "told reporters asking about the ban to call back 'when you have some serious issues you want to talk about.'"

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports "smokers say they will either step outside to smoke or light up in their offices, where smoking is permitted." In the Senate, "smoking is allowed only in senators' offices. The smell of cigar smoke often hangs in the air outside the Capitol office of Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W. Va.), while visitors can catch Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) sneaking a few puffs outside the building."

The New York Times (1/11, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports, "Whether Democrats are any less inclined to make backroom deals than Republicans, the new majority will be remembered for bringing the rules of the House into line with those in the rest of the District of Columbia, numerous states and corporations, several European countries and all major airlines."

The Washington Post (1/11, A7, Layton, 690K) notes "Pelosi, of smoke-free California, is known to detest the tobacco habit. Ever since her ascension as top Democrat with authority over the lobby and most other space in the House, smokers have been bracing for the moment when they'd be ordered to extinguish their butts." The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Simon, 850K) runs a similar report.

Stevens To Push Paid Parental Leave Measures. The Washington Post's (1/11, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Many companies offer paid parental leave to their employees after the birth of a child, but not Uncle Sam. Naturally, young federal employees would like the government to offer such family leave, but personnel officials have balked, saying that the government already provides a generous package of vacation and sick leave and that more paid time off would not improve recruitment and retention of employees." The Post adds that Alaska Sen. Ted Stevens (R) wants to revisit that issue "this year," and has "introduced a bill that would provide eight weeks of paid leave to federally employed women after childbirth and five days of paid leave for new fathers. The bill also would provide five days of paid leave to federal employees who adopt children." The Post adds, "Stevens is working on another bill to require companies with more than 50 employees to provide paid maternity leave."

Bernanke To Testify Before Senate Budget Committee Next Week. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Ip, Rogers) reports Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's "efforts to stay out of politically charged fiscal questions will be tested next week as he makes his inaugural appearance before a congressional budget committee." Bernanke is to "testify on the fiscal and economic outlook before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday, Jan. 18. Committee officials confirmed the appearance Wednesday." Bernanke "has said he does not want to comment on specific tax and spending proposals, saying those are the purview of Congress and the administration."

Bills Would Cut Off Pensions For Convicted Lawmakers In Future. The Washington Times (1/11, Miller) reports former Democratic Rep. James A. Traficant Jr., "convicted of racketeering and taking bribes, is wiling away prison time painting colorful pictures but also able to collect a congressional pension of nearly $40,000 a year." Traficant is "one of about 20 former senators and congressmen with felony rap sheets who can receive the taxpayer-financed benefit." Rep. Mark Steven Kirk "introduced a bill that would stop future congressional felons from pocketing retirement pay," and a "similar measure is being offered by Democratic Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and John Kerry of Massachusetts in an amendment to that chamber's ethics reform bill, which is expected to go to a vote tomorrow." Other "recent convicts include former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican convicted of graft and imprisoned last year, and former Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican convicted last year of corruption charges tied to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Cunningham is eligible for about $36,000 a year, while Ney is in line for a $29,000 annual pension, according to estimates from the National Taxpayers Union (NTU)."

Cheney Addresses Virginia VIPs At Jamestown Anniversary Event. The Washington Post (1/11, B1, Kunkle) reports Wednesday was "the highest-profile event so far in a series that began last year to commemorate the settlement of Jamestown. To mark the 400th anniversary, Vice President Cheney addressed members of the General Assembly inside the cramped Memorial Church that was built in 1907, and legislators toured the grounds of the settlement where representative democracy would take hold. The festivities will culminate in a three-day celebration this May and a visit by Queen Elizabeth II." A "major theme of yesterday's event was that Virginia's key role in the creation of American democracy has sometimes been overshadowed by New England's. A whoop went up when Cheney noted that the Jamestown colonists had already convened a representative assembly by the time the Pilgrims arrived on the Mayflower." Another theme, "also touched on by Cheney, was that the Europeans' many glowing achievements had been accompanied by more unpleasant realities, such as the enslavement of African Americans and the destruction of Native Americans."

The Washington Times/AP (1/11, Potter, Lewis) reports Cheney said it was "fitting for Virginia to begin its 2007 legislative session at the place where representative democracy in America was born, Vice President Dick Cheney told legislators yesterday." In a speech "that stressed themes of religious faith, sacrifice and personal courage, Mr. Cheney helped open the Virginia General Assembly's winter session at the site where the first English settlement in North America was established 400 years ago." Cheney said, "It's striking to realize how much of America's story begins with a little three-sided fort raised on the banks of the James River four centuries ago."

Congressional Press Secretaries' Dinner Questioned. The Washington Post (1/11, Romano) reports in its "In The Loop: On The Hill" column, "While the Senate began debating stricter ethics rules for its members this week, a fancy dinner planned for some Senate press secretaries tomorrow night in New York, paid for with corporate money, has raised a few eyebrows." The "two dozen flacks will arrive in Manhattan today for an annual excursion to meet with media outlets, a trip sanctioned by the Senate ethics committee as 'official' business." Aides "pay for costs out of pocket -- Amtrak, W Hotel, chartered bus -- and later request reimbursement from official funds." The "'gasp' factor, as one corporate executive put it, centers on the $200-a-head closing dinner at the elite Rainbow Room, one of the country's best-known upscale restaurants, sponsored by seven high-profile corporations with business interests before Congress." As far as "the ethics watchdogs are concerned, the dinner doesn't pass the smell test."

OTHER NEWS:

Trade Deficit Down Again. The New York Times (1/11, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "American companies sold more goods like airplanes, cars and precious metals overseas in November, helping to narrow the trade deficit for a third consecutive month. Despite the improvement, the United States is still on track to end 2006 with a record trade imbalance, eclipsing the $716.7 billion deficit in 2005." The Census Bureau "reported yesterday that the trade deficit -- the amount by which the value of America's imports of goods and services exceeded the value of its exports -- fell to $58.2 billion in November, the smallest it has been since July 2005. In October, the deficit was $58.8 billion." The Times adds, "Yesterday's figures surprised many economists, most of whom expected the deficit to widen." The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A2, Bater, 2.04M) says "the data suggest trade has emerged as an important cushion for the economy, as it adjusts to a sizable contraction in housing activity." Trade "has for years been a drag on US growth, as weak economic growth abroad, strong consumption at home and a strong dollar held back the nation's exports and boosted imports."

Oil Prices Fall To 19-Month Low. NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 8, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "[A]s this new year has got under way, a funny thing has happened to the price of oil – it has plummeted. Oil prices dropped another $1.62 just today, leaving them at $54.02 a barrel. That's the lowest level in 19 months. As heating oil supply is now way ahead of demand because of the warm weather many of us have been experiencing. Overall, oil prices are down nearly 12% since just the start of the year."

Stocks Rally. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 12, :10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The was a rally in the stock market on Wall Street today. The Dow was up more than 25 and half points [to close at 12,442.16] The NASDAQ gained 15 and a half [to close at 2,459.33]." NBC Nightly News (1/10, story 7, :10, Williams, 9.87M) also notes the numbers on Wall Street.

Realtors Predict Decline In Home Sales Decline Will Moderate. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, D2, Walsh) reports the National Association of Realtors forecasts that "US home sales will decline less sharply this year than they did last year, while home-price appreciation is expected to gain steam." NAR said "sales of existing homes are likely to decline about 1.2% this year to 6.42 million, following a sharp drop last year, while sales of new homes are seen falling about 9.7% to 957,000." Because the market is "starting this year at a relatively low point, even a gradual recovery of sales during the year would mean that annual totals for 2007 are likely to show no substantial improvement, according to NAR Chief Economist David Lereah." The group "forecasts the median sales price for existing homes to grow 1.5% nationally to $225,300, following last year's estimated 1.1% rise. The national median price for new homes will increase 3% this year to $248,900, according to the NAR, after estimated growth of 0.3% last year."

Economists Remain At Odds Over Persistence Of Poverty. In his Wall Street Journal column (1/11, A7), David Wessel says, "With a few remarkable exceptions -- South Korea, for one -- the gap between rich and poor nations persists. The notion that there was something special about 'development economics' dates to post-World War II years when mostly poor, mostly rural colonies gained their independence." Anne Krueger, former International Monetary Fund official, believes "Third World governments and their First World advisers applied sound economic principles incorrectly or without sufficient attention to the reality. Policies to encourage exports and shield embryonic industries from imports until they got rolling sounded good, for instance, but bred corruption, infantilized industries and created politically powerful vested interests that blocked needed change." Another view is "that poor countries got bad advice and paid the price, but that today's experts know much more than their predecessors." A third view "is that earlier economists focused on the wrong thing." Some economists argue "that what really matters is having solid political, legal and economic institutions -- courts, central banks, honest bureaucrats, private-property rights -- that allow entrepreneurs to flourish."

High Court Seen As Likely To Limit Political Use Of Union Dues. USA Today (1/11, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to uphold a Washington state law that restricts when unions can use fees collected from non-members for political purposes. The dispute is being watched closely by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation and other anti-union groups, as well as the AFL-CIO." The case "revolves around the Washington Education Association, which bargains for the state's 70,000 teachers."

McClatchy (1/11, Henderson) reports the Supreme Court "already has said non-members must be able to 'opt out' of paying for political activity; the Washington law went further, saying unions must get them to 'opt in' before pursuing political causes with their money." Chief Justice John G. Roberts, and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Samuel Alito seemed to agree with the law. Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg also "hammered the union's lawyer with questions that reflected serious doubt about his arguments." Justice Stephen Breyer seemed "similarly inclined, but less certain. Justice Clarence Thomas, as is his custom, said nothing during arguments." The Washington Post (1/11, A7, Barnes, 690K) and New York Times (1/11, Greenhouse, 1.16M) run similar stories.

Vote Machine Firm Critical Of Letter Supporting FL13 Challenge. Roll Call (1/11, Murray) reports the Nebraska-based "electronic voting machine manufacturer at the center of the still-contested Congressional race in Florida's 13th district demanded Tuesday that a court throw out what the company characterized as a threatening letter from House Democrats." Lawyers for Election Systems & Software "filed the motion with Florida appellate Judge Jon Wheeler in response to a letter that House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) sent the court last week." Millender-McDonald "wrote that Christine Jennings, the Democratic candidate in the Nov. 7 race to replace former Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has preserved her right to contest the election before Millender-McDonald's committee. So the court, she said, has an obligation to consider all the facts of the case, an apparent reference to a Dec. 29 lower court ruling not to require Election Systems & Software to disclose how its electronic voting machines work."

YouTube Video Prompts Romney To Reassert Conservative Credentials. The AP (1/11, Johnson) reports a 1994 videotape "mysteriously posted on YouTube.com prompted Republican Mitt Romney to declare Wednesday, 'I was wrong on some issues back then,' while also insisting to social conservatives key to his presidential campaign that he is one of them." The tape "of a Senate debate between Romney and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy showed Romney defending a woman's right to abortion, saying he supported allowing gays in the Boy Scouts and distancing himself from former President Reagan by noting he was a registered independent during the period the conservative icon was leading the nation." While the material "has been previously published," its "presentation in video form — and on the easily shared YouTube medium — prompted an immediate response from Romney, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week." Romney said, "If you want to know where I stand by the way, you don't just have to listen to my words, you can go to look at my record as governor."

Gilmore's Chances To Win GOP '08 Nomination Seen As Slim. In his Roll Call column (1/11), political analyst Stuart Rothenberg critically assesses former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore's chances to win the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. Rothenberg says, "But caucuses and primaries aren't only about ideology. They also are about candidates, organization and money. Maybe time has distorted my memory, but I don't remember him as being a dynamic, inspiring conservative speaker. Others I have spoken with remember him much as I do." Gilmore "begins with no name identification, no money and no organization."

Democratic Candidates Face "Electability" Litmus Test. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, A6, Calmes) reports that for the party "long known for subjecting presidential wannabes to a battery of litmus tests, on issues from abortion to trade, Democrats are uniting in raising one big issue for 2008: electability." It "poses a big hurdle for both Democratic front-runners, Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois." The "widespread concerns about whether either could get elected -- Mrs. Clinton because she is a woman, and a polarizing figure; Mr. Obama for being African-American, and relatively inexperienced -- potentially prevent either from running away with the Democratic nomination. That, in turn, is what keeps hope alive for about a half-dozen rivals maneuvering for advantage should the leaders stumble." Of the pack, "polls and early organization suggest the best-positioned is former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Today Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut officially joins the race with his announcement on the syndicated radio show 'Imus in the Morning.'" On the GOP side, the three frontrunners, Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, "have the opposite problem of their Democratic counterparts. Each of them is considered electable. The question is whether they can get nominated in a party in which the conservative base demands that the nominee oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and taxes, but believes that each of these men is suspect."

Dodd To Run For President. The AP (1/11, Fouhy, Ramer) reports Connecticut Sen. Christopher Dodd (D), "a veteran lawmaker who entered Congress in the post-Watergate class of 1974, will announce his bid for the presidency, Democratic officials said Wednesday." Dodd "will make the formal announcement in an interview Thursday morning on the 'Imus in the Morning' radio show -- a curious bit of timing since he'll be forced to compete with heavy coverage of President Bush's speech on the Iraq war." The New York Times (1/11, Medina, 1.16M) also notes "coverage of Mr. Dodd's announcement would be competing with" that of Bush's speech. The Times adds that Dodd, "although well-known in Washington and his home state, does not have the kind of national name recognition of some other Democrats who are strongly considering entering the race, most prominently Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois."

Clinton Losing Ground In Early Caucus, Primary States. The Washington Times (1/11, Lambro) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's "popularity in Democratic presidential-preference polls has fallen in the nation's first caucus and primary states in the face of increasing support for her chief rivals for the 2008 nomination." Pollsters said her "weaknesses in Iowa and New Hampshire were the result of the growing popularity of two major opponents -- former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- and their populist economic messages, as well as a deepening antipathy toward her among Democratic-leaning independents who dislike her support for the war in Iraq and who question her electability." Pollster Del Ali of Research 2000 said, "I think Hillary strikes these voters the same way Senator John Kerry did in 2004. They would really like to vote for someone they really like this time. Hillary doesn't fit that characterization right now." The Times add Ali's "findings mirror more recent polling showing a similar national decline in support." Pollster John Zogby said, "There's been erosion. She's polling in the low- to mid-40s nationally."

Kerry Adds Campaign Strategists To Staff. The Washington Post (1/11, Romano) reports in its "On The Hill" column, "As Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) waits patiently for his Senate colleague John Kerry to get off the fence and reveal his presidential intentions, the 2004 Democratic standard-bearer is adding high-profile operatives who could easily slide into campaign mode." Kerry has "brought on as a consultant Erik Smith, onetime communications strategist for former congressman Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.), and Vince Morris, most recently the spokesman for former D.C. mayor Anthony Williams, as his Senate press secretary."

Denver Labor Woes Lead Democrats To Postpone Convention Decision. The Washington Times (1/11, Richardson) reports Denver has not "hosted the Democratic National Convention in almost 100 years" because it is "just not a union-friendly town." The Democratic National Committee has "again postponed its decision on whether Denver or New York will be the venue for its 2008 convention, thanks to a recent labor uprising in the Mile High City." With all the "labor trouble in Denver, Democrats might be tempted to scrap the whole idea and head for New York, but there's trouble in the Big Apple, too. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg hinted that he doesn't want to host the event, saying that the city was tapped out after hosting the Republican National Convention in 2004." The delay "puts Democrats months behind Republicans, who announced in September that their convention would be held in Minneapolis-St. Paul and have even sent out press kits."

Sanchez May Run For California Governor In 2010. Roll Call (1/11, Drucker) reports Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D) "continues to give serious consideration to running for governor in 2010, as well as for the Senate, should Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) choose not to seek a fourth term. In preparation for a statewide run, Sanchez -- who has had a gubernatorial campaign account open for several months -- plans to spend the next few years traveling up and down California to meet with constituent groups." Roll Call adds, "In a recent interview, Sanchez said she is 'absolutely serious' about running for governor in 2010, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) will be termed out of office and the seat will open."

Johnson Illness May Give GOP Opening In South Dakota. The Hill (1/11, Blake) reports the illness of Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) "could open things up again in 2008 for Dakota Republicans, who have long struggled for a breakthrough in their congressional representation. If recent history is any indication, however, it will be hard-fought and expensive to make a dent in Democrats' stranglehold on the Washington delegations." Democrats have "held at least five of the states' six congressional seats for the last 20 years." Former Republican state Sen. Larry Diedrich "lost twice in 2004 to Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), first by 3,000 votes in a special election and then in the general." Diedrich said, "I've always thought that perhaps people see the money that they have in the state as more their own money. Whereas, when you look at the federal level — maybe part of it's the fact that we're typically a recipient state — I think people perceive that that issue is more of other people's money. It's always a little more difficult for Republicans with a conservative message to win that argument." The Hill adds Steve Hildebrand, who managed former Sen. Tom Daschle's campaign and Johnson's narrow win over Sen. John Thune two years earlier, said, "They believe Democrats are most successful at getting pork back to the states. So they want Democrats in Washington fighting for their pet projects, whether it's disaster relief, farm aid, Medicaid."

Christian Groups Question Each Other's Finances. The Washington Times (1/11, Pfeiffer) reports the National Council of Churches is "becoming financially beholden to secular groups with liberal political leanings, according to a report by a religious watchdog organization." The Institute on Religion and Democracy, "a group formed by members of the NCC, says the group accepted the majority of its charitable donations last year from nonreligious organizations and has been pursuing an agenda that does not mesh with the majority of its church members, including support for abortion and homosexual 'marriage.'" Politically affiliated groups "who donated to the NCC between 2004 and 2005 include the Sierra Club; the Ford Foundation, which advocated for 'reproductive rights'; the United Nations Foundation, which is funded by billionaire media mogul and philanthropist Ted Turner; and the Connect US Network, which has ties to George Soros' Open Society Institute."

The Washington Post (1/11, A3, Cooperman) reports two "influential Christian nonprofit organizations questioned each other's finances yesterday, each suggesting that the other is beholden to big donors with partisan political motives." The clash "between the National Council of Churches and the Institute on Religion and Democracy was a rarity in Washington, where liberal and conservative advocacy groups fight fiercely over issues but seldom dig deeply into each other's funding." Both groups "call themselves nonpartisan and are incorporated as tax-exempt charitable organizations. But the council, a New York-based alliance of 35 Christian denominations, is deeply involved in liberal social causes, such as reducing poverty and making peace." The institute, "a Washington-based think tank, is allied with conservative groups on issues such as same-sex marriage."

Schwarzenegger Unveils "Restrained" Spending Plan. The Los Angeles Times (1/11, Rau, Halper, 850K) reports, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today unveiled a restrained $143-billion state spending plan that eases some of California's chronic fiscal problems in part by restricting welfare payments and denying public transit systems $1.1 billion they were anticipating. The plan's spending from the state's general fund - where most California taxes go - would be $103 billion, an increase of less than 1% from the current fiscal year, which ends June 1." Schwarzenegger "hailed his plan that would eliminate a multibillion-dollar deficit anticipated for this year and pay off early some of the state's debt incurred during its economic crisis at the turn of the century."

The Wall Street Journal (1/11, C9, Carlton, 2.04M) reports, "At this rate…Schwarzenegger may become known as the Bond-inator. Last year, the former 'Terminator' star persuaded California voters to pass a record bond package totaling $42.7 billion to help rebuild the state's aging infrastructure. This year, he is proposing that California go back to the well for an additional $43.3 billion in bonds, to help expand the rebuilding work -- and that is making even Democratic allies of the Republican governor a tad nervous." The New York Times (1/11, Steinhauer, 1.16M) also reports the story.

California To Require Lower Carbon Content In Fuel. The Christian Science Monitor (1/11, Wood, 59K) reports, "Now that California is on record as mandating a 25 percent cut in the state's greenhouse-gas emissions by 2020...leaders here are starting to lay out how they intend to hit that ambitious mark. First up: requiring transportation fuels sold in California to contain less carbon." Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "announced Tuesday that he will issue, within weeks, an executive order that sets a new 'low carbon fuel standard' in the state. Aimed at petroleum refiners and filling stations, the new standard will give them 13 years...to cut the carbon content of the fuels they sell for passenger vehicles by 10 percent." As the state "moves to implement the new standard, its effect on consumers and the state economy will be closely watched. Several Republican lawmakers and business leaders have expressed early concern that the state crackdown on emissions will encourage businesses to locate outside California, or will increase their overall costs. Consumers worry that new fuels or fuel additives will raise prices at the corner gas station."

Burns Hired By DC Lobby Firm. The AP (1/11, Jalonick) reports former Montana Sen. Conrad Burns (R), "whose ties to lobbyists helped sink his re-election bid, has landed at a new workplace: a Washington lobbying firm." Burns will "work for his former chief of staff, Leo Giacometto, at the firm Gage, which has lobbied for Montana interests and several national technology companies, often making headlines for its connections to Burns and his staff."

Virginia Seeks Deferral In Meeting Some Federal Testing Standards. The Washington Post (1/11, A1, Glod) reports, "Controversy has emerged over how to measure the progress of children learning English." The U.S. Education Department "objected last year to the way Virginia and 17 other states test limited-English students" finding the tests "not demanding enough." But "many Virginia educators" said that "the federal standard is too lofty for students just beginning to understand the nuances of English." The Virginia Board of Education and the state's congressional delegation are "lobbying Education Secretary Margaret Spellings" for a "one-year deferral" in meeting federal testing standards.

Ethiopia Says Eight Militants Killed In Airstrike, Others Being Held. The Financial Times (1/11, England) reports Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Wednesday that a US air strike in southern Somalia Monday "had killed eight suspected militants and wounded five others, who had been captured by Ethiopian forces." Meles "disputed reports that civilians were killed in the US strikes and said he was waiting for DNA tests to confirm the identities of the suspects." Meanwhile, reports of additional airstrikes "were denied by US and Ethiopian officials, who said their aircraft had not launched new attacks." The AP (1/11, Hassan) reports Meles "said Ethiopia and the US have been cooperating on intelligence, and that most of the information has come from the Americans."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (1/11, A21, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports Mogadishu "exploded in violence on Wednesday morning after unknown insurgents attacked a transitional government barracks during the night and soldiers responded by sealing off large swaths of the city, searching house to house for guns." The weapons raids "immediately provoked stiff resistance, and squads of Ethiopian soldiers and troops loyal to the transitional government poured into the streets, where they battled outraged residents and a handful of masked insurgents."

The Washington Post (1/11, A21, McCrummen, 690K) says the situation "is so confused and the city so fractured and armed that the attacks, recounted by witnesses, could have come from any number of groups frustrated with the presence of Ethiopian troops." Many Somalis are also "enraged" over the US airstrike early Monday. Meanwhile at the UN, the Security Council "began debating the conflict" with Ibrahim Gambari, the UN undersecretary for political affairs, urging the interim Somali government "to begin talks" with Islamic militants, saying the deployment of a peacekeeping force would be "problematic" without a political settlement in place.

US Officials Refuse To Confirm Reports Of Terrorist's Death. The CBS Evening News (1/10, story 9, 0:35, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In tonight's news briefing, an eight-year-long hunt for one of the world's most wanted terrorists is over. Somalia's government claims Fazul Abdullah Mohammad was killed during this week's US air attack in that country. He's a suspected Al Qaeda terrorist wanted in the 1998 bombings of two US Embassies in Africa that killed 224 people. However, American intelligence cannot confirm that Mohammad was killed. The Pentagon says there have been no US attacks in Somalia since Sunday."

Congressional Republicans Say State Department "A Mess" Under Rice. Nationally syndicated columnist Robert Novak writes in the Washington Post (1/11, A15, 690K), "Just how career diplomat Negroponte came to be the new intelligence czar in the first place is puzzling. But to pull him out just as his on-the-job training was completed reflects a panicky desire to fill the deputy secretary post, which had been unfilled for an unprecedented six months. Five other key State Department positions are either vacant or are soon to be vacant." Novak says that unnamed Republicans in Congress tell him "that the State Department under Condoleezza Rice is a mess." At a time when "American diplomacy is being tested worldwide -- in Afghanistan, Iran, Israel, Korea and Sudan," Novak says "the judgment by thoughtful Republicans is that Rice has failed to manage that endeavor." Rice's "previous government duties," he notes, "had been as an analyst and staffer rather than as a manager." Lastly, Novak observes that "with the State Department permanent bureaucracy traditionally hostile to Republican administrations, it is remarkable to see two Foreign Service officers, Negroponte and Burns, in the department's No. 2 and No. 3 slots. Insiders relish their confrontation. … That may turn out to be a good show, but it is not reassuring for a country facing myriad challenges worldwide."

China, Russia Denounce US Sanctions Over Arms Sales. The Washington Times (1/11, Gertz, 88K) reports China and Russia "have denounced sanctions imposed on their state-run companies by the Bush administration over missile and weapons of mass destruction sales to Iran and Syria." In Beijing this week, Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao reacted to the sanctions imposed last week by the State Department saying, "It is unreasonable for the American government to invoke its domestic law to sanction on Chinese companies without providing any evidence." He also called on the US to "correct its wrong practice." For its part, the Russian Foreign Ministry called the sanctions "illegal," saying the US "has tried to extrapolate its domestic laws to foreign companies, to make them work under US rules." The State Department "declined to provide details on what triggered the sanctions last week," but Bush administration officials "said they resulted from Russian anti-tank missile sales to Syria that ended up in the hands of Hezbollah terrorists and were used against Israel, as well as goods sent from China sold to Iran that were linked to Tehran's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and missile systems."

Russia Backs Syria In Hariri Probe Request. The Washington Times (1/11, Kralev, 88K) reports a "rift" has developed between Russia and the Western members of the UN Security Council over the probe into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. In "an attempt to help its ally Syria," Russia has asked that "all countries not fully cooperating be publicly named." Russia's UN ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, told the Security Council Tuesday, "If we focus so hard on one country, why should we disregard completely or even not want to know what those countries are?" The US and France "rejected the idea, saying it would distract from more important issues." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters Tuesday, "Syria quite clearly falls into a category of its own, so I wouldn't try to lump them all together" with other countries, noting that "the fact that Syria has been cited as not being fully cooperative in the past with the investigation was important because, let's be frank, the signs pointed to some Syrian involvement [in the Hariri assassination] in some fashion."

Blasts Rock Philippines Ahead Of ASEAN Summit. The New York Times/AP (1/11, A23, Cerojano) reports, "Three bombs within hours of each other rocked the southern Philippines on Wednesday, killing at least six people and wounding 27 others, officials said, amid warnings that Muslim militants may try to disrupt this weekend's Asian regional summits." Officials "insisted security was tight, with police and troops on the highest alert." Philippine National Police Chief Oscar Calderon "had warned that militants may try to embarrass the government, a staunch US ally in the war on terror, by staging attacks" during the ASEAN summit. AFP (1/11, Peugeot, Yu) reports Foreign Minister Alberto Romulo "insisted" the summit "would go ahead later this week," despite the bombings.

Richardson Brokers Ceasefire In Darfur. The New York Times (1/11, A6, Polgreen, 1.16M) reports Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir and leaders of several rebel factions in Darfur "agreed Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in separate meetings with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico." According to a statement issued after Wednesday's meeting, President Bashir "said he had agreed to halt military operations to allow time for a political settlement to the crisis to emerge." Speaking by telephone from Khartoum, Richardson said, "What is lacking is a political process that leads to a UN force," but said the ceasefire is "at least a step." The Washington Post (1/11, A22, Timberg, 690K) notes that despite agreeing to the ceasefire, Bashir "showed little evidence of relenting on his refusal to allow thousands of UN peacekeeping troops into Darfur."

Former State Official Says ICC Complicating Efforts In Darfur. Former assistant secretary of state, Stephen Rademaker, writes in the Washington Post (1/11, A25, 690K) that although the Sudanese government "bears principal responsibility for the continued killing" in Darfur, "recently an unexpected obstacle to ending the bloodshed has emerged: the International Criminal Court (ICC)." Rademaker notes that "much of the world agrees that to end the genocide a highly capable UN peacekeeping force must immediately be deployed to Darfur." The "only footnote to this consensus is China, which, eager for access to Sudan's oil and armed with a veto at the U.N. Security Council, forced the United Nations to accept a precondition to action in August: that the government in Khartoum must consent to the deployment of any UN force." However, he warns that "given China's opposition, such action almost certainly would have to be carried out without Security Council authorization and would be vastly inferior to the deployment of an effective UN peacekeeping force." Coalition military action, he notes, would be "in large measure US military action, and the same would be true in Darfur. No matter how noble our objectives, US military action without UN authorization against another Arab government would prove deeply unpopular in many parts of the world, and America would pay a steep political price. If this is where we end up in Darfur -- or if the genocide continues unabated because peacekeepers cannot be deployed -- there will be three culprits to blame: the bloodthirsty regime in Khartoum, the oil-thirsty government in Beijing and the UN Security Council's shortsighted decision to bring in the ICC."

EU Energy Strategy Aims To Curb Carbon Emissions, Boost Competition. The Wall Street Journal (1/11, Jacoby, Echikson, 2.04M) reports the EU "unveiled an ambitious blueprint for combating global warming and boosting energy efficiency, but key elements of the plan face strong opposition from business interests and could require major battles to get them implemented. The European Commission yesterday published a long-awaited proposal for the bloc's first common energy strategy." The Journal adds, "Business groups expressed alarm at the commission's proposals to cut emissions of carbon dioxide...20% from 1990 levels by 2020." And "France and Germany are likely to block a proposal to boost competition by breaking up European energy companies that control both the supply and distribution networks for oil, gas or electricity." But EC "officials insisted any opposition won't derail efforts to shake up European energy markets. Energy security, and the need to reduce demand for fossil fuels, has risen to the top of the EU agenda in response to continuing concerns about its predominant supplier of gas and oil, Russia."

The New York Times (1/11, Kanter, 1.16M) says EU officials "challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming." The "package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies." EU "officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit." Many of the proposals "are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals."

Belarus Backs Down In Oil Dispute With Russia. The Financial Times (1/11, Ostrovsky) reports, "Belarus backed down in its trade conflict with Russia on Wednesday by abolishing an export duty on oil pipeline transits. The move allows Moscow to resume supplies to Europe via its neighbour." Belarussian President Alexander Lukashenko "appears to have climbed down after a telephone conversation with President Vladimir Putin of Russia." Although "Wednesday's move bolstered Mr Putin's prestige at home and strengthened Moscow's hand in its stand-off with its neighbour, the dispute has dented Russia's reputation and its claim to be a reliable energy supplier."

The AP (1/11, Karmanau) reports, "Russian oil began flowing again through a Belarusian pipeline late Wednesday, a top Belarusian oil official said, resolving a dispute between the countries that had disrupted supplies to Eastern Europe as well to the former Soviet Republic." The dispute "showcased the Belarus regime's reliance on cheap Russian energy imports, and stoked doubts in European capitals about Russia and its dependability as an energy supplier."

The New York Times (1/11, Myers, 1.16M) reports, "The Belarussian prime minister, Sergei S. Sidorsky, said...in televised remarks that his country would revoke a transit fee of $45 a ton on Russian oil that it imposed last week, provoking a dispute with swift repercussions in Europe." Sidorsky "said he would fly to Moscow for more talks on Wednesday, an indication that a final resolution had not been found." Moscow "had said that it would hold no talks until the transit fee was lifted."

The Washington Post (1/11, A22, Finn, 690K) adds, "The Belarusan presidential press service said that the countries' prime ministers had been told 'to propose ways of settling all problems and to submit them to the presidents by Friday.'"

Chávez Begins New Term Vowing Socialist Reforms. The New York Times (1/11, A16, Romero, 1.16M) reports Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez was sworn in to a new six-year term at a ceremony Wednesday vowing "to speed Venezuela's metamorphosis into a Socialist country." In his speech, the president "defended his decision this week to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries and promised to seek greater control over natural gas projects." He also "renewed his request to Congress for decree powers, saying a 'revolutionary law of laws' would allow him to hasten the construction of Socialism."

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (1/11, 850K) warns that "if his drive to consolidate power over the media, the telecommunications industry and other sectors succeeds, by the time his term expires six years from now it may no longer be possible to hold a free election in Venezuela." A country "without an independent media, judiciary or legislature," it continues, "is by nobody's definition a democracy. Venezuela's people may just have succeeded in voting themselves out of power."

UN Agency Denies Receiving Staff Complaints. The Washington Times (1/11, Pisik, 88K) reports Jose Antonio Ocampo, the head of the UN Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DESA), Wednesday "defended his management of the scandal-laden 'good governance' division, saying that he personally had initiated internal investigations and shut down a foundering office within his department." In his first public remarks since the opening of a UN investigation prompted by a Washington Times article last month, Ocampo "also denied having received complaints from staff about concerns that range from mismanagement of government funds to favoritism and intimidation in the hiring and disciplining of employees." His claim "flies in the face of documents and accounts given to The Times showing that several staff members complained to Mr. Ocampo, both in person and in writing, about purported mismanagement, intimidation and favoritism in DPADM between 2003 and 2006," the newspaper writes.

Japanese Lawmakers Fear Healthcare Reforms May Become Too Expensive. In an 2,000-word front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/11, A1, Landers, 2.04M) reports last year Japan's parliament passed a measure that calling "for more cancer specialists and a permanent role for patients in policy making" in a "victory for a spreading movement in Japan among patients who want American-style care and drugs for cancer. But the idea of becoming more like the US raises alarms among policy makers. In Japan, the government guarantees that everyone has health-insurance coverage and it pays most of the bills." Masaharu Nakajima, until recently director general of the Health Bureau at the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare, says Japan "already offers excellent cancer care," and "with a huge national debt and corporations worried about higher taxes, Japan can't afford to throw money into treatments and training that offer little hope of significantly extending lifespans."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hamas Suspects Defended (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Azam Ahmed
Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

Muhammad Salah was trying to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people when he became a pawn of Israeli officials seeking to influence U.S. policy, his lawyer argued Wednesday.

Firing back after two days of prosecution arguments, Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch, attacked the case against his client, a Bridgeview businessman accused of being a leading member of the radical Palestinian group Hamas.

An attorney for Salah's co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, also gave his final argument, telling jurors that Ashqar resisted Israel's occupation of Palestinian territories but insisted on following the law.

Deutsch's argument focused on the heart of the government's case: a handwritten confession and statements that Salah allegedly provided while in Israeli custody in 1993.

To accept Salah's guilt, jurors must accept a confession extracted through torture, Deutsch said.

"You can say we're not going to have a case in an American courtroom that's based on a foreign government's systematic use of torture," Deutsch said.

Prosecutors charge Salah, a U.S. citizen, and Ashqar, a longtime resident, with using the safe haven of this country to transfer funds, coordinate operations and provide other aid to Hamas, an organization responsible for many terrorist attacks.

Arrested by Israeli police in Gaza in January 1993, Salah confessed to being a Hamas military commander during 54 days of interrogation that included physical and psychological torments, Deutsch said.

DOJ_NMG_0115143

Jurors should reject the testimony of two Israeli interrogators, "Nadav" and "Benny," that Salah confessed voluntarily, Deutsch said.

The interrogators, who testified under official aliases, lied constantly on the stand, Deutsch said.

Prosecutors acknowledged in court that Israeli interrogators were permitted to use coercive tactics such as hooding prisoners and forcing them to sit handcuffed in a small chair. Nadav and Benny denied Salah was subjected to such treatment.

"They want you to believe he was a military commander who cooperated without any coercion or torture," Deutsch said.

He told jurors that it was the other way around—Salah had no militant background but was tortured into saying he did.

The purpose of his arrest, torture and confession was an intrigue developed at the highest levels of the Israeli government to convince the FBI that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S., Deutsch said.

While access to Israeli interrogation facilities is extremely limited, a New York Times reporter, through the intervention of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, was permitted to view an interrogation session of Salah.

The reporter, Judith Miller, testified that as a result she wrote a front-page story stating that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S.

"No one in the U.S. government really believed the U.S. was an important haven for Hamas," Deutsch said. Miller testified that her article began to change that skepticism.

Wednesday's arguments by the defense attorneys were steeped in the history of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and the hardships they say the Palestinians have endured.

Palestinians often lack access to basic services such as medical care, fresh water, sewage systems and schools, both defense attorneys said.

Humanitarian issues became a major focus in the trial, as Deutsch argued that Salah carried funds to the territories to ease the suffering of his people, not for militant operations.

Salah was captured in 1993 with $100,000 in cash. Bank records show Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook had transferred him nearly $1 million, which prosecutors said was intended to fund violence.

But the money transfers were completely transparent, and they went through Salah's personal bank account, Deutsch said. That is not the practice of someone funding illicit operations, he said.

Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt, compared the struggle of Palestinians to historic fights against repression, from the American Revolution to the civil rights movement. He showed jurors a mock "wanted" poster charging George Washington with terrorism.

Ashqar is accused of coordinating communication for Hamas and archiving key documents.

Moffitt argued that creating a historical archive was Ashqar's right as a Palestinian.

"They have every right to be the first authors of their history," he said.

Moffitt briefly addressed a series of secretly recorded conversations in which Ashqar discussed violent operations by Hamas. He said that despite the disturbing nature of the calls, Ashqar is never heard planning any militant attacks or recruiting anyone to perform such acts.

Moffitt pointed to a secretly recorded statement by Ashqar in which he told alleged fellow Hamas members, "Anything we undertake must be a studied legal work."

Both defense lawyers questioned the timeliness of the government's 2004 indictment, pointing out that nearly all of the charges in the case stem from events that occurred in the early 1990s.

After Salah was released from Israeli custody in 1997, he returned home to Bridgeview under strict government scrutiny. Yet prosecutors produced no evidence that Salah did anything on behalf of Hamas from the time of his return to the U.S. to the present, Deutsch said.

"This is not a case about terrorism but about fairness and justice," he said.

Terror Trial Defendants Described As Humanitarians (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, January 11, 2007

CHICAGO - Hoarse from hours of talking, defense attorneys said Wednesday that two men accused of bankrolling Hamas terrorists sought to ease the plight of downtrodden Palestinians but never violated the law.

"He's a Palestinian patriot but that doesn't mean he's a killer," William Moffitt said in his closing argument on behalf of Abdelhaleem Ashqar, a former assistant professor of business at Howard University.

Ashqar, 48, of Springfield, Va., and former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, are accused by the federal government of serving as major suppliers of funds and fresh recruits for Hamas terrorist operations.

Salah's attorney, Michael E. Deutsch, said in his closing argument earlier Wednesday, that when his client was arrested in Israel in January 1993 the $97,400 found in his hotel room was for charitable contributions.

He urged jurors not to believe admissions Salah made while being questioned by Israel's Shin Bet security agents at a prison in Ramallah. He said Salah was tortured and said anything the agents wanted to hear.

"In the mind of the interrogators anything is justified if it will secure the State of Israel - they will lie, they will torture people," he said. He said Israel used Salah to get publicity and pressure the U.S. government to crack down on the Hamas fundraising network in this country.

At the trial, two Shin Bet agents, testifying under the aliases Nadav and Benny lest they become targets for reprisals, denied they tortured Salah and said that after much coaxing he willingly told how he delivered cash to leaders in the military underground operated by Hamas.

But the U.S. government was forced to concede that at the time Salah was captured those under interrogation were sometimes hooded, forced to sit handcuffed in a tiny chair and deprived of sleep. Interrogators were authorized to slap detainees at times, the government acknowledged.

The admissions on the part of the U.S. State Department were read into evidence in lieu of classified material the defense could not present.

Both Deutsch, a longtime Chicago civil liberties lawyer, and the Washington-based Moffitt focused hard on the grim living conditions under the Israeli army's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza strip.

Deutsch likened those who fight to reverse the fortunes of the downtrodden Palestinian people to Nat Turner and other leaders of the slave rebellions in the American past. But he insisted that Salah never participated in any Mideast violence.

Moffitt pointed out that those uprooted at the birth of Israel and still living in squalid, poverty-wracked camps on the West Bank resemble victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"They are refugees in their own country," Moffitt said. He cited the writings of Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and told jurors that "in order to be free, you must struggle against oppression."

Moffitt scored a major victory in a similar trial in Florida a year ago, securing the acquittal of professor Sami al-Arian on a number of charges that helped to the the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group.

The Florida jury deadlocked on other federal charges against al-Arian.

Ashqar signed Moffitt as his attorney after the Florida trial.

Moffitt brushed off testimony that Ashqar had convened a convention of Hamas-related groups in Philadelphia in 1993, saying the former professor was merely exercizing his freedom of speech and never proposed violence.

He also scoffed at claims Ashqar funneled money to Hamas, saying doing so was perfectly legal until 1995 as long as the purpose didn't violate the law. Prosecutors say the money bankrolled terrorist attacks.

Moffitt began by recalling how proud he felt that his father had thrown rocks at hooded Ku Klux Klan members in the streets of Atlanta. He quoted from the Declaration of Independence and told jurors that the British had denounced its author, Thomas Jefferson, as a terrorist.

"Its really easy to call someone a terrorist when you haven't walked in his shoes," Moffitt said. He flashed a wanted poster on the screen on the courtroom wall. The picture on the poster was of George Washington.

Prosecutors delivered two days of arguments earlier this week, and assistant U.S. Attorney Reid J. Schar on Thursday is due to deliver the government's rebuttal to defense attorneys' arguments.

CIA Defends Document Secrecy At Trial (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK — The CIA cannot reveal "alternative interrogation methods" used on terrorists because doing so would cause exceptionally grave damage to national security by telling enemies how the agency gathers intelligence, the government has told a judge.

In a document dated Friday and filed in U.S. District Court in New York, the CIA said it cannot reveal more than what President Bush said last summer about the detention and questioning of terrorism suspects.

The American Civil Liberties Union had asked the court to require the CIA to turn over two Justice Department memos discussing interrogation methods and a presidential order concerning the CIA's authorization to set up detention facilities outside the United States.

On Wednesday, ACLU attorney Amrit Singh said in a statement that the CIA court document "uses national security as a pretext for withholding evidence that high-level government officials in all likelihood authorized abusive techniques that amount to torture."

He added: "This declaration is especially disturbing because it suggests that unlawful interrogation techniques cleared by the Justice Department for use by the CIA still remain in effect. The American public has a right to know how the government is treating its prisoners."

On Sept. 6, Bush acknowledged the existence of a CIA terrorist detention and interrogation program and said the agency used an alternative set of interrogation procedures to question some suspects. He said 14 suspected terrorists in CIA custody had been transferred to the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The president said he could not describe the interrogation techniques because doing so would help terrorists determine how to resist questioning.

"Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaida and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," Bush said.

The CIA also told the court that it knows al-Qaida trains operatives in interrogation resistance and would make its resistance techniques more effective if it knew how the CIA operated.

The deputy director of the ACLU's National Security Program, Jameel Jaffer, said the president and his legal advisers used the secret memos to create a legal framework so the CIA could violate U.S. and international law.

"While national security sometimes requires secrecy, it is increasingly clear that these documents are being kept secret not for national security reasons, but for political ones," he said.

3 Relatives Of Plotter Are Held By Officials (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan.

The arrests came a day after the convicted man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced in United States District Court in Brooklyn to 30 years in prison.

The family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country.

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said that Mr. Siraj's father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54, was arrested because a final deportation order had been filed against him. But a lawyer for the family said his case was still under appeal.

The agency spokesman, Mark Thorn, said that the man's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, were arrested and detained on immigration violations.

Mr. Thorn said that the mother and daughter would be given due process and that their cases would be heard by an immigration judge. He said he could provide no more information, because it was the agency's policy not to discuss case details. Mr. Thorn could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions.

The lawyer for the family, Mona Shah, disputed that a final order of removal had been entered against Mr. Rehman. She said he still has an appeal pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

"It's absolutely disgusting that they've picked him up under the guise of a deportation order," Ms. Shah said yesterday. "Fine, punish the son. But why punish them like this?"

She could not offer an explanation for the timing of the move, but suggested that it might stem from pressure on the authorities because the family's immigration status was cited in news reports about Mr. Siraj's case.

The immigration status of Mr. Rehman's wife and daughter hinge on his asylum case, Ms. Shah said. All three were picked up at their home in Jackson Heights, Queens, early yesterday morning. Mr. Thorn said they will be held at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Mr. Siraj, who was convicted on May 24 of conspiring to place an explosive device in the Herald Square subway station in 2004, had also filed for asylum on the same grounds as his father, religious persecution.

Ms. Shah said that all members of the family are Ismaili Muslims, a sect that she said has been mistreated in Pakistan. She said family members had been robbed and attacked several times. "They would be subject to torture and harassment if they returned," she said.

But prosecutors during Mr. Siraj's trial in the bomb plot suggested that he had lied to immigration authorities in his asylum request. They cited his own testimony in an earlier hearing, when he had first told immigration authorities that he did not fear harm if he returned to his native Pakistan. But later, in Mr. Siraj's asylum application, prosecutors pointed out that he said he was afraid.

Also, on tapes secretly recorded by a police informer and played at his trial, he said he had no fear of returning to Pakistan and spoke about influential family members who served as judges and magistrates. He also said he had rich and influential friends and friends on the police force.

He was recorded telling the informer that he planned to conduct surveillance of the subway station tied to his bomb plot immediately after attending an immigration hearing in Lower Manhattan. Testimony also showed that he had discussed entering into a marriage only to get citizenship.

Ms. Shah acknowledged that immigration authorities have some discretion about how to proceed and whether to detain people whose cases are pending, but she was bothered by yesterday's arrests.

"They're not supposed to detain halfway through a case," she said, calling the action "an absolute uneven use" of the discretion.

"You do not give someone the freedom of being not detained and then suddenly pick them up," she said.

Terrorism Convict's Family Held For Deportation (WP)

By Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 10 -- A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them.

Shahwar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced Monday afternoon for plotting to blow up a subway station in the Midtown shopping district known for its Macy's store. Early Tuesday morning, his family was arrested at its home in Jackson Heights, Queens.

Police officials hailed the sentencing of Siraj, a Pakistani immigrant, as a victory against homegrown terrorism.

But Siraj contended that he was entrapped by a police informant, who he said inflamed his anger at the United States by showing him photographs of American acts of abuse against Muslims, including incidents at the Abu Ghraib prison, and prodded him to consider violence. The informant, Osama Eldawoody, was recruited by the New York City Police Department after Sept. 11, 2001, to monitor radical Muslims in the city.

Siraj never obtained explosives, nor made a timetable for an attack. He has no known connection to any terrorist organization.

His family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah.

A spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the agency that detained the family, said that a final order of removal has been issued against the father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54. But Shah said that case is pending in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit.

The immigration cases of Siraj's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, are dependent on the father's case, Shah said.

Mark Thorn, the Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman, could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing.

"The administrative arrests were timed so they would not conflict with the criminal prosecution or sentencing," he said.

But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son.

"It's not American, to punish one person and the next day arrest the entire family," Shah said. "This is basically silencing them."

The family is being held at a detention facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Guantanamo Inmates "Driven Insane" (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Prisoners held at the Guantánamo Bay detention camp in Cuba are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial, according to lawyers and rights activists involved with the US camp.

The lawyers and activists also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility.

Protesters around the world plan to mark Thursday's fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantánamo with demonstrations calling for its closure. American anti-war activists and at least one former British prisoner intend to march to the perimeter of the US-held enclave in eastern Cuba.

Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, says the isolation regime at Guantánamo has tightened in recent months, piling the mental pressure on inmates who have "no fair procedure" that would lead to possible release.

Mr Roth told the Financial Times he had proposed to Angela Merkel, the German chancellor and chairman of the European Union presidency, that EU member states offered to take some of the detainees who cannot return to their home countries for fear of torture. In exchange the US would offer a concrete closure plan that would lead to trials, preferably before a court martial, of remaining prisoners.

Ms Merkel was "intrigued but non-committal", Mr Roth said. But he does not believe the US is looking to close the camp – despite comments by President George W. Bush last year that he would "very much" like to shut it down.

Mr Roth is also sceptical of Mr Bush's claim in September to have closed CIA-run secret prisons when 14 terrorist suspects were transferred to Guantánamo. Human Rights Watch has documented 15 cases of prisoners who "disappeared" into the CIA prison system before September and have not been accounted for since.

Brent Mickum, a defence lawyer, says one of his two clients, Bisher al-Rawi, an Iraqi-born UK resident, "is slowly but surely slipping into madness" because of "prolonged isolation coupled with environmental manipulation that includes constant exposure to temperature extremes and constant sleep deprivation". He says his ration of toilet paper was removed because he used it for shielding his eyes from the light and his prayer rug was taken away because he used it for warmth.

Attorneys representing other prisoners say their clients kept in isolation are going insane.

Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney for the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, says the five years of the Bush administration's detention policy and related practices may have "done more to reverse 200 years of democracy than any other government act in US history".

The answer, he said, was not simply to close Guantánamo but to reflect on how far off constitutional course our practices – and the warped policies on which they are based – had veered and to establish a rights-respecting national security policy for the future.

The US has released more than 300 inmates from Guantánamo and still holds nearly 400 there.

An official told the FT that charges would probably be laid against 60 to 80. Others will be released, but lawyers and activists are concerned that the remaining 200 to 300 will be held indefinitely.

The Pentagon said the detention of enemy combatants was in general "not criminal in nature, but to prevent them from continuing to fight against the US in the war on terror".

Guantanamo Remains Source Of Outrage (AP)

By Ben Fox

AP, January 10, 2007

A black hood covered his eyes, shackles secured his wrists and legs. He felt lightheaded from two days without food and medication that made him sleep during the long flight. Startled by barking guard dogs, he was shouted at by troops in a language he didn't understand.

"We didn't know where we were or what was going to happen to us," Adil al-Zamil, a former Kuwaiti government clerk who was one of the first to arrive at Guantanamo Bay after the base began receiving terror suspects on Jan. 11, 2002. "We were very, very afraid."

In the early days, dogs were used to intimidate prisoners. Detainees were subjected to sleep deprivation and earsplitting rock and rap music. Some, including al-Zamil, said they were shackled in uncomfortable positions for hours.

Today, five years after the first prisoners arrived at the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, the detention camp commander says those aggressive interrogation tactics are gone.

But world outrage over the detention center has grown. Protests around the world will mark the fifth anniversary Thursday of the arrival of the first 20 prisoners at Guantanamo, including a demonstration on the Cuban side of Guantanamo's gate.

Critics say the camp, where hundreds of men face indefinite incarceration, has damaged U.S. credibility and should close.

"It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world ... for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror," said Michael Ratner, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

The military says the detention center is vital as ever. Nearly 400 detainees suspected of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban are still held there.

"What we are doing is an important and integral part of the global war on terror," Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, commander of the detention center, told The Associated Press by telephone on Tuesday. "We're keeping enemies of our nation — enemy combatants, terrorists if you will — off the battlefield."

Al-Zamil, 44, insisted Tuesday that he had no links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. He says he had traveled to Afghanistan to work for a charity before being taken into custody in Pakistan and turned over to U.S. forces. He was held in Afghanistan before being transferred to Guantanamo in what he believes was February or March of 2002.

He and another Kuwaiti, Saad al-Azmi, were forced onto the tarmac in Guantanamo together.

"We were totally cut off from the world. We didn't know what was going on," al-Zamil said by telephone from Kuwait.

Al-Zamil and al-Azmi later appeared before a military panel that designated them enemy combatants, despite their claims of innocence. The panels considered the cases of 558 detainees and found that all but 38 were enemy combatants and should be held.

Al-Zamil said he was roughed up by guards and interrogators and kept shackled for long periods in cold rooms during his more than three years at the prison.

"Guantanamo is a part of hell," he said.

Al-Azmi, 27, described similar experiences, adding that a female interrogator named "Megan" or "Maggie" danced around him partially undressed, then threatened to have a male guard rape him if he did not confess to terrorist links.

The alleged incidents took place before Harris took command.

"We don't do anything today that's coercive in nature," he said. "I believe we are doing things correctly here."

The detention camp itself has undergone a transformation since the early days when prisoners were kept in metal open-air cages and used buckets for toilets.

Harris said conditions for prisoners are better because of the construction of Camp Five and, just last year, Camp Six — steel-and-concrete buildings modeled after U.S. prisons.

Human rights groups argue that the buildings, which have solid-wall one-person cells, leave the prisoners more isolated.

The military plans to charge 60 to 80 of the detainees and expects military trials to start next summer, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, the chief prosecutor. "It certainly looks like we're much closer to getting these guys their day in court," he said.

Most of the remaining detainees, however, may never be tried by a military court, and the Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed in October, deprives them of the right to contest their imprisonment in a civilian court.

Their best hope is that the military's Annual Review Board will determine they no longer pose a threat to the U.S. or possess intelligence value.

So far, the military has released or transferred about 380 detainees. The AP determined that more than half were later released or cleared of charges by their home countries despite former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's description of the detainees as "among the most dangerous, best-trained, vicious killers on the face of the earth."

The two Kuwaitis were sent home in November 2005 and cleared by a court in their home country of all terrorism charges.

"I'm still trying to regain my life, trying to become a normal citizen," al-Azmi said.

Al-Zamil said he worries about the detainees he left behind.

"They are living in hell as we did," he said. "I pray to God to give them patience. If I was still there I'd be a crazy person."

A Voice From Gitmo's Darkness (LAT)

By Jumah Al-Dossari

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, Cuba — I AM WRITING from the darkness of the U.S. detention camp at Guantanamo in the hope that I can make our voices heard by the world. My hand quivers as I hold the pen.

In January 2002, I was picked up in Pakistan, blindfolded, shackled, drugged and loaded onto a plane flown to Cuba. When we got off the plane in Guantanamo, we did not know where we were. They took us to Camp X-Ray and locked us in cages with two buckets — one empty and one filled with water. We were to urinate in one and wash in the other.

At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious.

What I write here is not what my imagination fancies or my insanity dictates. These are verifiable facts witnessed by other detainees, representatives of the Red Cross, interrogators and translators.

During the first few years at Guantanamo, I was interrogated many times. My interrogators told me that they wanted me to admit that I am from Al Qaeda and that I was involved in the terrorist attacks on the United States. I told them that I have no connection to what they described. I am not a member of Al Qaeda. I did not encourage anyone to go fight for Al Qaeda. Al Qaeda and Osama bin Laden have done nothing but kill and denigrate a religion. I never fought, and I never carried a weapon. I like the United States, and I am not an enemy. I have lived in the United States, and I wanted to become a citizen.

I know that the soldiers who did bad things to me represent themselves, not the United States. And I have to say that not all American soldiers stationed in Cuba tortured us or mistreated us. There were soldiers who treated us very humanely. Some even cried when they witnessed our dire conditions. Once, in Camp Delta, a soldier apologized to me and offered me hot chocolate and cookies. When I thanked him, he said, "I do not need you to thank me." I include this because I do not want readers to think that I fault all Americans.

But, why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America.

I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed. I am hopeless because our voices are not heard from the depths of the detention center.

If I die, please remember that there was a human being named Jumah at Guantanamo whose beliefs, dignity and humanity were abused. Please remember that there are hundreds of detainees at Guantanamo suffering the same misfortune. They have not been charged with any crimes. They have not been accused of taking any action against the United States.

Show the world the letters I gave you. Let the world read them. Let the world know the agony of the detainees in Cuba.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Daylight Sought For Data Mining (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Alec Klein

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Key senators introduced legislation yesterday that would require the government to disclose data-mining programs to Congress in an effort to protect Americans' privacy and prevent misuse of personal information.

The bill, introduced by Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) requires federal agencies to report the development and use of data-analysis technologies to "discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity."

Lawmakers introduced similar bills twice in recent years, but they languished in a Republican-controlled Congress.

The new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), vowed that Congress would take a much more active role in the oversight of government surveillance and data-collection programs.

"The American people have neither the assurance that these massive data banks will make us safer, nor the confidence that their privacy rights will be protected," Leahy said at the first in a series of hearings on the subject. He is a co-sponsor of the bill.

Leahy said at least 52 federal agencies use data-mining technologies and at least 199 data-mining programs are operating or planned throughout the government, including 14 within the departments of Defense, Homeland Security, Justice, and Health and Human Services. Those do not include programs run by the National Security Agency. According to Leahy's staff, the NSA has not disclosed to the committee what, if any, data-mining programs it is conducting. An NSA spokesman declined to comment.

Leahy said that the government's terrorist watch list includes names of more than 300,000 people -- including infants and members of Congress. "We also need to understand that a mistake in a government database could cost a person his or her job, sacrifice their liberty and wreak havoc on their life and reputation," he said.

Yesterday's hearing underscored the sensitivity of the debate about privacy and security. Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute, said one of the more aggressive technologies gaining currency is predictive data-mining, which looks for patterns of behavior in data based on a template.

Predictive data mining, he said, "cannot catch terrorists" because there are too few "terrorist patterns" to base a model on. Few terrorists would be caught, he said, and "a lot of" innocent people would be targeted.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy advocacy group, said the administration was "bewitched with this technology" although there was "very little evidence" that predictive data mining works.

But Kim Taipale, executive director of the Center for Advanced Studies in Science and Technology Policy, called data mining "a productivity tool . . . to make better use of limited resources" in fighting terrorism.

"Some innocent people will be burdened in any preemptive approach to terrorism, and unfortunately some bad guys will get through," he said. But if implemented correctly with oversight, "we can correct errors."

Robert L. Barr Jr., a former Republican member of the House from Georgia and also a former federal prosecutor, said the issue is not errors but an administration that he believes is thumbing "its nose at the Congress" and using data mining in a way that potentially "everybody is a suspect."

Citizens Said To Lack Legal Protection From Government Data Mining (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — The government's ability to use computers to gather personal information about citizens and act on it has far outstripped the federal laws designed to protect them from secret federal dossiers, a privacy advocate told Congress on Wednesday.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, asked the Senate Judiciary Committee to update the Privacy Act and other laws to keep pace with the Digital Age.

She was among a handful of think-tank scholars and privacy advocates who testified Wednesday about government data-mining — the computerized searching of large banks of information for clues to the identity of terrorists or criminals. Their broadest area of agreement was that Congress needs to know much more about what the government is doing in data-mining.

Judiciary Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said this hearing, the first since Democrats retook control of the Senate, was the beginning of a series on privacy-related issues.

Noting that congressional auditors in 2004 found 199 data-mining programs operating or planned in federal agencies, Leahy said, "Congress is overdue in taking stock of the proliferation of these databases."

To that end, panel member Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced a bill Wednesday co-sponsored by Leahy and endorsed by several witnesses.

Feingold told the hearing that his proposed Federal Data Mining Reporting Act would require federal agencies to regularly inform Congress about their use of data mining "to discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity — the types of data analysis that raise the most serious privacy concerns."

While acknowledging terrorism is a threat, Harris told the committee: "Especially in the counterterrorism context, a major shift in the data collection and use landscape is taking place without a suitable privacy and due process framework."

"The government is accessing entire buckets of data without a warrant" and without specific suspicion of particular individuals, Harris said.

An individual mistakenly designated as a possible terrorist or associate of terrorists can face "arrest, deportation, loss of a job, more intrusive investigation, discrimination, damage to reputation and a lifetime of suspicion, with little or no opportunity for redress or correction of errors," Harris said.

She said the impact of technological innovations combined with new government powers enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and outdated legal protections was illustrated by the Customs and Border Protection agency's "Automated Targeting System."

The Associated Press disclosed last month that the system had been developing risk assessments of millions of Americans over the last four years without their knowledge. The AP also reported those assessments of people who traveled aboard were to be kept for 40 years and could be shared with state, local and foreign governments and even some private contractors.

Under existing law, "a risk score developed for border screening purposes could easily migrate to other uses (years after the citizen was determined not to be a threat)," Harris said.

Customs officials say the program is legal and essential to keeping terrorists out of the country. Leahy said last month on C-Span's "Newsmakers" program he thought it violated a congressional ban using on data-mining tools to assign risk to passengers not on watch lists.

Both Parties Push Oversight Of Government Data Mining (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Democrats and Republicans found one issue they can agree on during the first 100 hours of the new session -- congressional oversight of government data mining, which both sides say is an unwarranted invasion into the lives of hundreds of thousands of Americans.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, held a hearing Wednesday morning on the privacy and security implications of nearly 200 data-mining programs used by more than 50 federal agencies.

Afterward, he and Sen. John E. Sununu, New Hampshire Republican, introduced legislation that administrations would report such programs and activities to Congress.

"Advances in technologies make data banks and data mining more powerful and more useful than at any other time in our history," Mr. Leahy said. "These can be useful tools in our national security arsenal, but we should use them appropriately so that they can be most effective."

Mr. Leahy warned that the potential for abuse requires oversight. "A mistake can cost Americans their jobs and wreak havoc in their lives and reputations that can take years to repair," he said.

The data mining involves taking information collected by data brokers to detect patterns of behavior or track an individual. The data can include credit-card purchase details, airline-ticket and frequent-flier information, bank and medical records, even magazine subscriptions and phone information.

Data mining is often used to track those who default on student loans or launder money. Homeland Security Department officials hope to use the technology to screen airline passengers and at border crossings.

Mr. Sununu said data mining can be an essential tool to detect patterns that point to terrorist activity.

"However, it is imperative that we understand the impact of such technology on Americans' personal privacy. In order to do this, Congress must be fully informed of the current data-mining technologies, new ones that are being developed, the effectiveness of those technologies, and the privacy protections in place," Mr. Sununu said.

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and co-sponsor of the bill, said: "The possibility of unchecked, secret use of data-mining technology threatens one of the most important values that we are fighting for in the war against terrorism -- freedom."

Former Rep. Bob Barr, a Georgia Republican who recently became an activist for the Libertarian Party, told the panel that data mining poses a "serious threat" to the First, Second, Fourth and Fifth amendments to the Constitution.

"That is nearly half of the Bill of Rights," he said.

"Adding insult to injury, there is no scientific proof that data mining to identify terrorists even works. No scientist has ever demonstrated that the government can predict who will commit an act of terror at some future time. Yet the government spends tens of billions of taxpayers' dollars on data-mining programs each year -- collecting, manipulating, retaining and disseminating the most personal and private information on unknowing American citizens and others," Mr. Barr said.

James Jay Carafano, a senior research fellow with the Heritage Foundation, defended the practice of data mining but agreed oversight is needed.

"The federal government's use of data-mining technology should be strictly limited to national security-related investigations," Mr. Carafano said. "Congress should also require agencies to report on their intent to establish data-mining programs and require annual reports on their implementation, as well as their compliance with federal guidelines."

Hospitals Want Better Coordination During Emergencies (WT)

By Alicia Borgess

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Representatives of area hospitals will meet today and tomorrow to discuss how they can improve communication during mass-casualty events.

Organizers say hospitals rarely have privileged access to information during a large-scale emergency and often must rely on the press for updates. Therefore, hospital workers often have difficulty gauging the extent of a crisis and preparing themselves for a surge of patients.

Washington Hospital Center's ER One Institute is sponsoring the fourth annual conference, to be held at the Leavy Conference Center at Georgetown University.

According to a report by Trust for America's Health, a nonprofit organization, improved communication is one of the major concerns regarding U.S. hospitals involved in emergency preparedness.

Emergency situations such as the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and Hurricane Katrina in 2005 highlighted the need for improvement in disaster response, officials said.

Beverly A. Pritchett, senior deputy director of the D.C. Department of Health, Emergency Health and Medical Services Administration, said the tragic events have resulted in more community support.

The District "now has an emergency health-reserve corps in which anyone can volunteer to help their community," she said.

At the conference, Mrs. Pritchett will talk about how a community can develop disaster-prevention practices.

Information from health officials would help prevent the spread of a pandemic by "connecting with the community to educate them about proper hygiene procedures so that they become a habit now," she said.

The conference also will include discussions on relief efforts and collaboration in combat and foreign disaster zones.

The keynote speaker will be Dr. B. Tilman Jolly, the Department of Homeland Security's associate medical officer.

Other speakers will include Dr. James Aiken, the medical director for Emergency Preparedness at the Medical Center of Louisiana, and Dr. Daniel Laor, the director of the Disaster and Emergency Division of the Israeli Ministry of Health in Jerusalem.

"This conference brings not only Homeland Security, but also representatives from the District, New Orleans, New York and many others, especially from metropolitan areas with high potential terrorist activity," said LeRoy Tillman a Washington Hospital Center spokesman.

Revisiting Parental Leave (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Many companies offer paid parental leave to their employees after the birth of a child, but not Uncle Sam.

Naturally, young federal employees would like the government to offer such family leave, but personnel officials have balked, saying that the government already provides a generous package of vacation and sick leave and that more paid time off would not improve recruitment and retention of employees.

If Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) has his way, however, that debate will be reopened this year. He has introduced a bill that would provide eight weeks of paid leave to federally employed women after childbirth and five days of paid leave for new fathers. The bill also would provide five days of paid leave to federal employees who adopt children.

Federal parents would also receive eight hours of paid leave to take their children to the doctor or dentist and for parent-teacher meetings at schools.

Stevens, a longtime advocate for federal employees, has his eye on the legislative branch, too. An aide said Stevens wants to require senators to offer paid maternity leave to their staffers. (He gives 12 weeks of paid maternity leave to employees in his office.) And while he is at it, Stevens is working on another bill to require companies with more than 50 employees to provide paid maternity leave.

Stevens played a key role in the creation of the Thrift Savings Plan, a 401(k)-type retirement savings program. He also was one of the original sponsors of the 1993 Family Medical Leave Act, which provides 12 weeks of unpaid leave.

The senator has named his federal employee bill the Family Leave Act. In a written statement, Stevens said: "It will provide time for mothers to recover after childbirth without having to worry about the financial burdens that come with unpaid leave. Thousands of Alaska women work for the federal government and could benefit under this new program."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) will join Stevens as a co-sponsor of bill. Other senators also will be invited to co-sponsor the leave bill, the aide to Stevens said.

In recent years, House members usually have taken the lead in sponsoring bills to provide federal employees with six weeks of paid parental leave for the birth of a child or an adoption. Last year, Reps. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), Steny H . Hoyer (D-Md.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) co-sponsored a parental leave bill.

The Bush administration has looked at the issue as part of its budget planning for fiscal 2008. Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, has expressed interest in exploring whether a program could be created to offer short-term disability insurance to federal employees. Such a program might be a way to provide maternity benefits, easing complaints from younger federal employees who often say they run short of vacation and sick leave when caring for a newborn or an adopted child.

Any proposals to expand federal benefits may run up against efforts to erase some of the federal budget's red ink. Congressional leaders hope to hold down government spending as part of an effort to reduce the federal deficit.Bush to Oppose Screeners Union

A House plan to give collective bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration will be opposed by the White House.

The proposal to roll back a Bush administration ban on unions at the TSA was included in a bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The bill was approved 299 to 128 late Tuesday and was sent to the Senate.

"This measure seeks to reverse the flexibility given to TSA to perform its critical aviation security mission," the Office of Management and Budget said in a statement. "The administration vigorously disagrees with these provisions of the bill."

The American Federation of Government Employees, which has sought to represent screeners since 2001, contends that the TSA workers should have the same union rights as other Department of Homeland Security employees.Business.gov

Judge Orders More Mediation In Katrina Lawsuits (FINDLAW/AP)

By Garry Mitchell, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - GULFPORT, Mississippi-A federal judge on Wednesday ordered into mediation dozens of lawsuits policyholders filed against insurance companies after Hurricane Katrina.

Several of the cases sent to mediation, which accuse the insurance companies of denying their claims, are involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims.

A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina.

Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued State Farm and other insurers for refusing to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge.

The 83 lawsuits ordered into mediation Wednesday include ones filed on behalf of U.S. Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, whose Gulf region homes were destroyed by the 2005 hurricane. Each sued State Farm for denying their claims.

Of 55 Katrina cases that have been heard by a mediator, 28 have resulted in settlements, according to the office of U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr.

Insurers say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water, and that the policies exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

State Farm, Hood and plaintiffs' lawyers are nearing an agreement that calls for the insurer to pay at least $50 million (â,¬38.5 million) - but possibly hundreds of millions more - to about 35,000 policyholders who have not sued the company for denying their claim, people with knowledge of the talks said.

A settlement would not involve claims filed by State Farm policyholders in other states.

Meanwhile on Wednesday, State Farm's expert witnesses told a jury that no evidence supports the claim of policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. The trial, only the second such case to be tried in Mississippi, is not part of the settlement talks.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Adds Troops In Bid To Secure Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — President Bush announced Wednesday evening that he was sending more than 20,000 American troops to Iraq to quell the sectarian violence there and conceded for the first time that there were not enough American or Iraqi troops in Baghdad to halt the capital's descent over the past year into chaos.

In a speech to the nation, Mr. Bush dropped his insistence that the United States was making progress toward building a workable Iraqi democracy. But he rekindled his argument that "failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States," saying that it would touch off chaos throughout the Middle East, provide a launching pad for attacks in the United States, and embolden Iran to develop nuclear weapons. (Transcript of the Address)

In documents released just before the speech, the White House acknowledged that his previous strategy was based on fundamentally flawed assumptions about the power of the shaky Iraqi government. He described his new strategy as an effort to "change America's course in Iraq," and gave no indication that the troop increase would be short-lived. He said that "we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties" in the course of more intensive around-the-clock patrols in some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods.

Mr. Bush rejected all calls to begin a withdrawal from Iraq, arguing that the strategies advocated by newly empowered Democrats, restive Republicans and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group were a formula for deepening disaster.

"To step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government," Mr. Bush said from the White House library, a room officials said was chosen to create more of a sense of a conversation with an anxious American public, rather than the formal surroundings of the Oval Office. "Such a scenario would result in our troops being forced to stay in Iraq even longer, and confront an enemy that is even more lethal. If we increase our support at this crucial moment, and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

Mr. Bush also offered his most direct acknowledgment of error in an American-led war that has lasted nearly four years and claimed more than 3,000 American lives. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility lies with me," he said.

Yet for the first time, Mr. Bush faces what could become considerable political opposition to pursuing a war in which 132,000 Americans are already committed, even before the increases announced Wednesday night. Democrats in Congress are drawing up plans for what, at a minimum, could be a nonbinding resolution expressing opposition to the commitment of more forces to what many of them say they now believe is a losing fight. They will be joined by some Republicans, and may attempt other steps to block Mr. Bush from deepening the American commitment. Not since Richard M. Nixon ordered American troops in Vietnam to invade Cambodia in 1970 has a president taken such a risk with an increasingly unpopular war.

"For the safety of our people, America must succeed in Iraq," Mr. Bush said in repeating an argument that he has used for nearly four years — that a retreat from the country before a decisive victory is won would provide terrorists a launching pad for new attacks on the United States and American targets.

In the 20-minute address, Mr. Bush said that for the first time Iraq would take command-and-control authority over all of its own forces, and he said that while more Americans ground troops were being put into the field, they would take more of a background role. He said that the Iraqi government had committed to a series of "benchmarks" — which included another 8,000 Iraqi troops and police in Baghdad, passage of long-delayed legislation to share oil revenues among Iraq's sects and ethnic groups, and a $10 billion jobs and reconstruction program, financed by the Iraqis. In a running series of large and small briefings for reporters that opened a major campaign to market the new strategy, Mr. Bush's aides insisted that the plan was largely created by the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

Yet Mr. Bush sounded less than certain of his support for the prime minister, who many in the White House and the military fear may be intending to extend Shiite power over the Sunnis, or could prove incapable of making good on his promises. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush declared.

The president put it far more bluntly when leaders of Congress came to visit Mr. Bush at the White House earlier on Wednesday. "I said to Maliki this has to work or you're out," the president told the Congressional leaders, according to two officials who were in the room. Pressed on why he thought this strategy would succeed where previous efforts had failed, Mr. Bush shot back: "Because it has to."

Until the summer, Mr. Bush had used the phrase "stay the course" to describe his approach in Iraq, and his decision to describe his new strategy as an effort to "change America's course" appeared intended to distance himself from that old approach. An earlier plan unveiled in November 2005 had been entitled a "Strategy for Victory in Iraq," but Mr. Bush used the word "victory" sparingly on Wednesday night, and then only to diminish expectations.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success," he said. "I believe that it will," saying that if it is successful it would result in a "functioning democracy" that "fights terrorists instead of harboring them."

In some of his sharpest words of warning to Iran, Mr. Bush accused the Iranian government of "providing material support for attacks on American troops" and vowed to "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies." He left deliberately vague the question of whether those operations would be limited to Iraq or conducted elsewhere, and said he had ordered the previously reported deployment of a new aircraft carrier strike group to the region, where it is in easy reach of Iranian territory.

Mr. Bush also announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would leave Friday for the region to build diplomatic support for the American effort in Iraq.

A new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, who replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld, is among the new members of the Iraq team whom Mr. Bush has brought in to execute the strategy announced Wednesday night. In the past week, Mr. Bush has sped the removal of the American commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is to become the Army chief of staff, and replaced him with a counterinsurgency specialist, Gen. Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus , who has embraced the new plan. A new American ambassador has been nominated to Baghdad as well, to replace Zalmay Khalilzad, a Sunni of Afghan heritage, who will represent the United States in the United Nations.

The five-brigade increase in American forces will be accomplished by speeding up the deployment of four units already scheduled to go to Iraq, and by sending one additional brigade that was not scheduled to go. The total increase of American troops in Iraq amounts to roughly 21,000, including 4,000 marines who will be stationed in Anbar Province, the stronghold of elements of Al Qaeda in Iraq and the Sunni insurgency. The increase in Iraqi troops and police amounts, officials said, to about 8,000.

The units heading into Iraq begin with a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, now in Kuwait, expected in Iraq before the end of the month, followed by a brigade of the First Infantry Division, based at Fort Riley, Kan., probably next month. The Army is also planning to announce that the Second Infantry Division, Fourth Brigade, based in Fort Lewis, Wash., and the Third Infantry Division's Second Brigade, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., and the Third Brigade, based at Fort Benning, Ga., should begin preparing to go to Iraq earlier than scheduled. Officials said that the total increase in troops could take three or four months.

The Bush plan also calls for delaying the departure from Iraq of a Minnesota National Guard brigade by four months, an official said. The unit had been planning to depart in the spring and had not been notified that it would be staying longer, Lt. Col. Kevin Olson, a spokesman for the Minnesota Guard, said Wednesday.

While Democrats and some Republicans who have attacked Mr. Bush's plan in advance of the speech have questioned sending more troops, others question whether the Bush plan is too small — and falls short of the numbers needed to make a difference in a violent capital of six million. Nonetheless, one of Mr. Bush's top advisers said at the White House on Wednesday that he expected that Senator John McCain, who has championed a significant, long-term increase in troops, would embrace the president's plan.

The adviser cited a section of the Iraq Study Group's report that said the bipartisan commission could "support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad, or to speed up the training and equipping mission."

But on the same page, the report warns that "adding more American troops could conceivably worsen those aspects of the security problem that are fed by the view that the United States presence is intended to be a long-term "occupation." Similarly, the group urged direct engagement with Iran and Syria; Mr. Bush rejected that approach.

Mr. Bush, one of his top aides said in an interview on Wednesday, simply concluded that "the Iraqi government was running out of time" and would collapse without additional help. Yet at the core of Mr. Bush's new strategy, his own aides said, lies a tension between two objectives: Mr. Bush's commitment to staying in Iraq until the country is a stable, self-sustaining democracy, and his vague threat to Mr. Maliki that the American presence in the country would be cut short if Americans believed that the effort was failing.

His aides hinted that the administration had already come up with a "Plan B" in case the latest strategy failed, with one saying "there are other ways to achieve our objective" that departed from the strategy Mr. Bush outlined. But he would not describe that strategy, or say if it involved withdrawal, containment, or the breakup of the country into sectarian entities.

Mr. Bush said nothing on Wednesday evening about the cost of his plan in money, though he spoke of its cost in blood. The new aid and job-creation plans, his aides said, would likely cost around $1.1 billion.

Admitting Failures, Bush Orders Troop Surge (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Acknowledging that his current strategy had failed, President Bush tonight announced a new approach that called for sending some 21,000 more U.S. troops to Iraqi but also warned its government that "America's commitment is not open-ended."

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people — and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said, acknowledging diminished public support for the war and an increasingly assertive opposition in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress.

"It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq," the president said.

The new plan calls for assigning top priority to ending the sectarian violence in key areas of Baghdad, assigning primary responsibility for security to the Iraqi army and police, and shifting U.S. troops into a supporting role — including embedding more American personnel with Iraqi units.

"Many listening tonight will ask why this effort will succeed when previous operations to secure Baghdad did not," Bush acknowledged. The answer, he said, was that the new effort would have more resources and that Iraqi officials have given the U.S. "a green light" to take action in all neighborhoods of the capital. In the past, powerful members of the Iraqi government have shielded some areas from security crackdowns, often to protect sectarian supporters.

Bush repeatedly warned members of the current Iraqi government that they must step up to the challenge of providing security despite the sectarian tensions and divisions that hamper it.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended. If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," Bush said.

Baghdad must also meet a series of benchmarks — previously imposed but never met — including an equitable division of oil revenues and measures designed to create a broad government of reconciliation, he said.

At the same time, the president again insisted that the United States must not fail in its efforts to stabilize Iraq.

Delivering a nationally televised speech to the nation reflecting the product of a reassessment conducted over several months, Bush, in a far less muscular tone than is his custom, delivered what was in effect half an ultimatum: He warned Iraqi leaders that time was running out but put no time limit on the U.S. role there.

The increased deployment will bring an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, on top of the 140,000 there now. The president is expected to seek $5.6 billion in a supplemental spending request he will send to Congress apart from the 2008 budget he will submit Feb. 5.

According to a Defense Department official, the 21,500-troop increase in Iraq will be achieved by sending one new Army brigade to Baghdad — a unit of the 82nd Airborne Division, which is already en route to Kuwait — and speeding up the deployment of other Army units that were to go to Iraq this spring.

One of these units, the 1st Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, has already begun its early deployment, the official said.

Two Marine battalions in Iraq that were scheduled to depart next month will also have their rotation extended to provide the 4,000 additional troops in western Anbar province, the official said.

Administration officials said they were bolstering forces in the province because it has been an Al Qaeda stronghold but local tribes had begun to turn against it — creating an opportunity for U.S. and Iraqi forces to attack the terrorist organization with the cooperation of local leaders.

Some Marine commanders in Anbar have expressed unhappiness that the Iraqi forces they're working with may be shifted to Baghdad as part of the new strategy of focusing on security in the capital.

The Iraqi army battalions in Anbar were already undermanned and replacement units are of unknown capabilities.

"I'm very disappointed," said Col. Larry Nicholson, commanding officer of the 5th Marine Regiment. "I hope it's only for 60 to 90 days."

Marine Commandant Gen. James Conway said Nicholson and other commanders have to remember "the big picture" and its new priorities.

Among the other Army units that will have their deployments sped up are the 4th Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division and the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division.

In addition, the White House announced it will remobilize units of the Army National Guard to help sustain the buildup, a potentially controversial move that will force some Guard brigades into second tours in Iraq. Until now, Pentagon policy has required such units to deploy overseas only once every six years; the remobilization will reverse that policy.

The only Army unit that could be extended is a Minnesota National Guard brigade that was originally due to return to the U.S. in March.

Also, the administration will request legislation asking for the Army and Marines to be increased.

Although the troop numbers are slightly lower than some advocates of a buildup have advocated, they were cautiously optimistic, noting that the number of individual Army brigades and Marine regiments being sent were largely in line with their recommendations.

Bush will be sending five Army brigades to Baghdad and the equivalent of one Marine regiment to Anbar, only slightly less than the five brigades and two Marine regiments recommended by retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, an influential backer of the buildup.

"We were very careful to focus on the number of brigades, and that's what to look for," said Frederick Kagan, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute and co-author with Keane of a build-up strategy that was largely embraced by the White House.

At its heart, the president's plan puts new reliance on the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to meet the overwhelming security challenges posed by sectarian militia violence and insurgents, and field effective security forces in some of the most strife-torn districts of Baghdad and surrounding communities.

The new plan also calls for stimulating economic recovery as part of an effort to clear, hold and revitalize key areas in the Iraqi capital.

The new strategy, Bush said, "will change America's course in Iraq."

"Only the Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people. And their government has put forward an aggressive plan to do it," Bush said.

The president, who until recent weeks brooked no suggestion in public that the United States was not succeeding in Iraq, changed his tone tonight.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have.'"

At this time a year ago, the president had delivered a series of speeches outlining his strategy for "victory," only to run head-on, as he acknowledged tonight, to a year of sectarian violence that began in February with the attack on the Golden Mosque, one of the most important Shiite shrines, in Samarra.

In documents supporting Bush's argument, the White House detailed shifting assumptions about conditions in Iraq, conceding that "sectarianism is spiking," that security must precede economic and political gains — rather than insisting that political progress demonstrated by the election of the Maliki government would bring security — and recognizing that Iraqis are "increasingly disillusioned" by the efforts of the U.S.-led coalition.

The reliance Bush is placing on Maliki reflects the public support he has given the Iraqi prime minister for months — but runs contrary to the private opinion expressed in a classified memorandum written by the White House national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, and leaked in November just before Bush and Maliki met in Amman, Jordan. The memo questioned Maliki's competence and intentions.

Bush delivered the speech in the White House Library, long ago a basement laundry room but since 1935 the repository of the mansion's literary collection and numerous antiques, which presents a less formal aura.

The president faces a tough sell: Democratic leaders in the House and Senate are planning to put forward nonbinding resolutions on the plan to send additional troops to Iraq, and some Senate Republican have indicated they might support them.

A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last week found that 12% of those surveyed supported sending additional troops; 85% favored withdrawing — either immediately (15%), within 12 months (39%) or over as many years as needed (31%).

Bush and his advisors are loath to call the new plan a last chance for the United States in Iraq, even as their language suggests that it is. At the same time, they are emphasizing the importance that the American goals be met there — and none is suggesting directly that the United States would begin to pull out of Iraq if Iraqis fail again to secure the country, where the American death toll has passed 3,000 as the war nears the end of its fourth year.

The Iraqi toll is so uncertain that estimates have ranged over hundreds of thousands, with the uncertainly itself a sign of the chaos there.

The president's speech was short on specifics, but Bush said Iraq had committed itself to moving three brigades now deployed in relatively quiet areas to Baghdad — one by Feb. 1 and two by Feb. 15.

U.S. officials say that 80% of the violence in Iraq is occurring within 30 miles of the capital. They did not say how they would respond if those responsible for the roadside bombs, assassinations and other attacks move their operations to other quarters of the country that have been relatively peaceful. Bush said that his military commanders reviewed the Iraqi government's security plan and said that it corrected earlier mistakes and that "this plan can work."

He also said that Maliki "has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated," a clear suggestion that the prime minister will stand up to the powerful radical cleric, Muqtada Sadr, who controls the sectarian Shiite Muslim militia known as the Mahdi army.

In the past, Iraqi officials have made commitments to step up and take charge of their country's security, only to fall short of quelling sectarian militias and insurgent violence.

"America," Bush said, "will hold the Iraqi government to the benchmarks it has announced."

With pressure mounting to bring troops home, Bush said that to "step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government," which would mean an even longer deployment of U.S. forces there and creation of a more lethal enemy. But an increase in U.S. support, he said, would "help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence" and speed the return of U.S. forces to the United States.

While Bush presented his plan as a sharp shift in the United States' approach in Iraq, his portrayal of the importance of the war was unchanged. The struggle there, he said, "will determine the direction of the global war on terror and our safety here at home.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will," he said.

While U.S. officials addressed the new reliance on Iraq to meet its security needs, they did not say that Iraq's failure would bring a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Bush's plan has "benchmarks," one official said, but the president "hasn't got a timeline" after which he will pull out the U.S. forces.

On Thursday, Bush plans a reprise of the speech during a lunchtime visit to Ft. Benning, Ga., where nearly all but the newest recruits have served at least one tour in Iraq.

"This is not, give one speech, dust your hands off and walk away. This is the beginning of an important process for the American people and for the political community to think seriously about it," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Several hours before Bush spoke, the president called leaders in South Korea, Poland and Japan to thank them for their support in Iraq and to give them a preview of the speech, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council. Each has combat troops serving there.

Johndroe said Bush also spoke with key Iraqi leaders, representing Kurds, Shiite Muslims and Sunni Muslims, raising the Iraqi government's commitment "to bringing security" to the country.

Bush To Add 20,000 Troops In An Effort To Stabilize Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush appealed directly to the American people last night to support a renewed campaign to pacify Iraq, saying it is necessary to add new troops so that the beleaguered Iraqi government can regain control of the streets of Baghdad and revive the process of political reconciliation and economic rebuilding.

In a nationally televised address, Bush acknowledged for the first time that he had not sent enough troops to provide security in Iraq last year. Standing in the library of the White House, he described the situation in Iraq as "unacceptable" to the American people and to himself. "Our troops in Iraq have fought bravely. They have done everything we have asked them to do," he said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

Bush said he will order more than 20,000 soldiers and Marines to help the Iraqi government provide security in Baghdad and fight the Sunni insurgency in Anbar province. But he emphasized that Iraqi soldiers will take the lead in the new fighting, and he said that the focus of American troops will be to advise and support Iraqi forces, with the additional U.S. troops embedded in Iraqi units.

In some of his sharpest language to date, the president placed the responsibility of improving conditions squarely on the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has not delivered on an array of promised reforms and security measures.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said last night. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act."

Even before the president began speaking, Democrats in Congress were mobilizing against his new plan. Just two months after Republicans lost their majorities in the Senate and the House in an election widely seen as a repudiation of his policies in Iraq, Bush's speech signaled that he is essentially choosing to deepen U.S. involvement, gambling that more focused operations and improved tactics will result in success that has so far eluded the United States.

Bush's new plan acknowledges that security must be the priority of the mission -- not political reform, as many in the U.S. military have argued. "The most urgent priority for success in Iraq is security, especially in Baghdad," Bush said last night.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons," Bush said. "There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have. Our military commanders reviewed the new Iraqi plan to ensure that it addressed these mistakes. They report that it does."

Bush made it clear that his revised strategy involves more than military measures. A central element will focus on expanded economic assistance to complement the new security plan for Baghdad.

"A successful strategy for Iraq goes beyond military operations," the president said. "Ordinary Iraqi citizens must see that military operations are accompanied by visible improvements in their neighborhoods and communities."

The United States will allocate more than $1 billion for three programs to create jobs and help reconstruction in neighborhoods secured by Iraqi and U.S. forces. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have been particularly concerned that any new deployment not happen in an economic and political vacuum.

U.S. officials concede that the previous "clear, hold and build" program managed to clear areas of militants but did not hold or secure them afterward, allowing neighborhoods to fall back under the control of militants.

The United States will also add nine new provincial reconstruction teams, which are joint Pentagon and State Department programs to help rebuild the country from the bottom up, including schools, local government and political interest groups.

Reflecting the revised strategy's heavy focus on only two areas of the country, six of the reconstruction teams will be in Baghdad and three will be in volatile Anbar province, home to the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda extremists, the State Department said. Washington will add about 150 new personnel to the 250 already staffing the reconstruction teams.

The United States will also provide $400 million in quick-response funding to address urgent civilian problems, and add $350 million to the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which allows local field commanders to have discretionary money to help improve the lives of Iraqis.

The U.S. effort is designed to supplement a $10 billion reconstruction and infrastructure program, finally channeling an oil-revenue surplus into rebuilding areas. The administration has long pressed Baghdad to use its own resources, particularly in Sunni areas to prove that the Shiite-dominated government is sincere in wanting to take care of the country's Sunni minority. Offering the Sunnis hope and inclusion is considered critical to helping defuse the insurgency and winning over loyalists to Saddam Hussein.

Bush and his top advisers said they expect their new approach to succeed where previous ones failed because of a new commitment from Maliki to provide resources and crack down on violent sectarian militias, even Shiite ones. But they are placing great faith in an untested Iraqi government that has not yet demonstrated a capacity to bridge the sectarian divisions that have caused an upsurge in violence over the past year.

Bush set no timetable for the removal of the added American troops, nor did he make any U.S. assistance for the Iraqis conditional on meeting political goals such as a new law for the equitable distribution of oil revenue and holding provincial elections, both seen as critical to winning political support for the Shiite-led government from disaffected Sunnis.

He did not embrace the idea of high dialogue with Iran and Syria to stabilize Iraq, a key recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which had been hoping to restore bipartisan consensus around a new Iraq policy.

Even with the increase in troops, moreover, the resulting U.S. total of about 153,000 forces in Iraq will amount to less than the roughly 165,000 deployed in December 2005, the high-water mark for U.S. troop strength in Iraq. His economic proposals last night, including the more than $1 billion in additional funding for economic reconstruction and jobs, are largely expanded versions of current programs.

U.S. and Iraqi troops began a plan to rid Baghdad of illegal militias and death squads that were fomenting sectarian violence just last summer, but the U.S.-designed effort faltered when Iraq failed to produce two-thirds of the troops Maliki had pledged. The difference now, U.S. officials say, is that Maliki put forward the plan himself and wants Iraq to take the lead, with a goal of assuming military command of the entire country in November. Iraq now has control over only three of its 18 provinces.

Bush had tough words for Iran and Syria. In stark contrast to the Iraqi Study Group's recommendations last month, the Bush administration intends to increase its operations against both countries, Bush said. He vowed to "interrupt the flow of support" from Iraq's two key neighbors and to "seek out and destroy" networks providing weapons and training to U.S. enemies in Iraq.

"Succeeding in Iraq also requires defending its territorial integrity, and stabilizing the region in the face of the extremist challenge. This begins with addressing Iran and Syria," he said.

In a clear warning to the hard-line government of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Bush also announced that the United States will deploy Patriot air defense systems and expand intelligence sharing "to reassure our friends and allies."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will depart for the region tomorrow to rally support for Iraq, particularly among the new "six plus two" bloc of conservative states that includes Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and five sheikdoms in the Persian Gulf region, he said.

The White House hopes the president's speech will trigger new support for his Iraq policy, and Bush said he will convene a bipartisan working group of lawmakers to work on anti-terrorism policies, including increasing the size of the military. But on Capitol Hill yesterday, sentiment seemed to harden against the president on Iraq in the opposition party, even among the most hawkish Democrats.

Both Senate and House Democrats moved toward introducing resolutions of disapproval, with House Democrats contemplating simply introducing the president's speech and asking members to vote for or against it. Democratic leaders made clear that such nonbinding resolutions would be only a first step. If sentiment against the president continues to grow, senior Democrats said they will try to use their power of the purse to quell what they call an escalation.

Meanwhile, divisions continued to emerge among Republicans. While GOP leadership was backing the president, backbenchers continued to revolt. "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who is considering a run for the White House, said in a written statement issued from Baghdad, where he is visiting. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Bush Pledges 21,500 More Troops For Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

George W. Bush on Wednesday night unveiled what many see as his last chance to salvage the deteriorating situation in Iraq with the pledge of 21,500 new US troops and an admission the current strategy was failing.

“Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me,” Mr Bush said in a live prime-time broadcast.

“It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq…In our discussions we all agreed that there is no magic formula for success in Iraq. One message came through loud and clear: Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States.”

Mr Bush told Americans that previous efforts to stabilise Baghdad had failed for two reasons: “There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighbourhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have.”

In his 20-minute broadcast, the US president also warned that a withdrawal of US forces would lead to killings in Iraq on an “unimaginable scale”. “If we increase our support at this crucial moment, and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home,” he said.

However, leading Democrats and some Republicans on Wednesday night were swift to condemn Mr Bush’s “new way forward” saying it would only worsen the situation on the ground. Republican critics included Sam Brownback, the social conservative senator, who last month declared his candidacy for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

In a statement immediately following Mr Bush’s broadcast, Democratic leaders reiterated calls for a phased withdrawal of US forces over the next six months as a way of pressuring the Iraqi government to take responsibility for the country’s future. They said the much-anticipated troop “surge” went against the verdict of congressional elections last November and would be challenged by resolutions that could be tabled as early as Friday.

“This proposal endangers our national security by placing additional burdens on our already over-extended military thereby making it even more difficult to respond to other crises,” Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, said a statement.

The new approach that Mr Bush laid out in his broadcast is built on a plan drawn up by Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq's prime minister, that is aimed at stabilising the level of sectarian violence in Baghdad, which is the epicentre of Iraq's emerging civil war.

Mr Bush said that Mr Maliki has promised to follow a series of performance "benchmarks" that were drawn up in Baghdad. Mr Bush on Wednesday declined to offer a timeline for Iraq to meet its self-imposed benchmarks. But he said America's commitment to Iraq would not be "open-ended".

"The president is trying to put a good face on the reality," said Jack Reed, a Democratic senator. "So far the Iraqis have not responded to our request to perform. I'm very sceptical these benchmarks will be anything more than they've been in the past - just platitudes that are ignored."

A senior US administration official said there would be new rules of engagement for Iraqi and US commanders that would enable them to succeed where previous efforts to pacify Iraq's capital had failed - most recently last summer.

Iraq's government would send three new brigades into Baghdad within the next month in addition to the six already there. The US would add five brigades to its Baghdad presence. The US would also send an additional 4,000 troops to Anbar province, which is the seat of al-Qaeda in Iraq.

The overall level of US forces in Iraq will rise from 132,000 to more than 150,000 – although officials did not say by when.

"This will be an Iraqi plan that will be Iraqi-led and we believe will fix the problem," said the official "If our previous strategy was "clear, hold and build" – we cleared, did not hold and the build never arrived."

Senior US officials also on Wednesday ruled out following the regional "diplomatic offensive" that had been recommended in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report last month. The report, which was led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic lawmaker, recommended that Mr Bush open talks with Iran and Syria in particular.

On Wednesday a US official said that a large proportion of the 79 ISG recommendations had been accepted by Mr Bush including the advice that more US army trainers were embedded "deep down at the company level" of the Iraqi military. Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, will testify on Capitol Hill on Thursday about Mr Bush's new way forward in Iraq.

Tactical Shift In Iraq Combat (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, justifying his decision to send 21,500 more troops and more than $1 billion in aid to Iraq amid sweeping public opposition to the war, said in a prime-time TV address Wednesday night that the new push would speed the day when U.S. forces could come home.

With the Democratic Congress poised to cast no-confidence votes on his policy as early as next week, a somber Bush acknowledged that the public's patience with the war is wearing thin and took responsibility for mistakes.

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

But he said that stepping up the U.S. military presence and financial commitment was vital to averting disaster in Iraq, warning of greater dangers should the mission fail.

Bush put no timetable on the new troops -- the first of which arrived in Baghdad hours before his 9 p.m. speech -- even as he said Iraqis would have to do their part and that the American commitment is "not open-ended."

The president, who has repeatedly laid out revised goals and strategies for Iraq only to see them crumble amid sectarian violence and a mounting death toll, argued that his plan would "change America's course in Iraq."

Even Bush's posture and backdrop seemed calculated to signal a change in course; he delivered the roughly 20-minute speech standing in the White House Library, not from his customary seat at his Oval Office desk.

The plan came after a monthlong buildup in which Bush promised a new approach to address previous mistakes. Nevertheless, critics said it bore striking resemblance to past moves that were billed as course-corrections, including the promise of more robust U.S. military support and more effective Iraqi cooperation.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat and one of the most vocal critics, said Bush is "not only going to stay the course, he's going to escalate the course."

Bush said Iraqis understand they must step up by providing more troops, taking the lead role in securing Baghdad and barring militias from interfering in security efforts. They have committed to meeting benchmarks, including key reconciliation measures, Bush said.

Entering the final two years of his term, Bush faces a newly hostile environment on Capitol Hill, where Democrats vehemently oppose his Iraq policy and Republicans are increasingly skeptical.

Thursday, he is to continue his campaign to sell the plan to a war-weary public with an appearance at Fort Benning, Ga. Meanwhile, a coalition of liberal groups -- the same band that hammered at Bush's Social Security overhaul plan before it collapsed -- announced a full-scale "anti-escalation" push, promising a public-relations showdown between the White House and Democratic activists over the war.

Under the latest plan, the U.S. will send five additional Army combat brigades, or about 17,500 troops, to Baghdad. An additional 4,000 Marines will go to Anbar province, an al-Qaida stronghold and the base of the Sunni insurgency. The increase would cost an additional $5.6 billion, a senior administration official said.

Iraqis will, in turn, send three more brigades into Baghdad, Bush added.

As part of the plan, the United States will spend $1.2 billion for enhanced reconstruction and civil affairs projects, including job creation.

The plan relies heavily on the ability and will of Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister who has failed to stabilize his fledgling government and calm Sunni-Shiite violence. Bush still believes that al-Maliki is capable of doing so, White House officials said, but many lawmakers and analysts have substantial doubts.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people, and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act," Bush said, adding that al-Maliki "understands this."

White House officials were quick to reject the idea that the president's latest ideas for Iraq were a last-ditch effort to turn things around in the shattered war zone, but it seemed clear that some of Bush's closest allies saw it that way.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, after a meeting with Bush hours before the speech, said, "many members of Congress are skeptical about, 'Will this plan work?'" given the failure of previous approaches. But he said the president's latest iteration is "a good plan" that represents "our best shot at victory in Iraq."

Democrats, including those from Maryland, roundly criticized Bush's proposal, which they said ignores the anti-war message of the 2006 elections and will amplify a failed mission.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, called Bush's plan "reckless."

"We are in a hole in Iraq, and the president says that the way out is to dig deeper," she said in a statement.

Democratic leaders said they would press for a swift vote opposing Bush's plans, and some support a Kennedy measure requiring that Bush get congressional approval for the troop increase.

"We in the Congress are very frustrated," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, a Baltimore Democrat, adding that Bush had not answered the fundamental question of how to get U.S. forces out of Iraq.

"It's the American people who are paying for this war, and it's the American people who have been very patient with this president. It's the American people who have given the benefit of the doubt to this president, and now, I think, the American people have run out of patience," Cummings said.

Most leading Republicans said they support Bush's plan, applauding him for adjusting tactics in the face of a chaotic situation.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said the plan is "not without risk" but is "the best chance" for Iraq.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a likely presidential contender, and Democratic Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut were among those who cheered the bulked-up U.S. troop presence.

But other Republicans cast a skeptical eye, voicing doubts about the Iraqi government's ability to quell factional tensions and crack down on violence.

DOJ_NMG_0115165

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, a likely Republican presidential candidate who is traveling in the Middle East, said the United States should not send more troops "until Sunnis and Shia are more willing to cooperate with each other instead of shooting at each other."

Some conservatives suggested Bush was sending too few troops to solve Iraq's problems.

"This undertaking will require a sustained, not a temporary, surge, in order to secure the country and enable the Iraqi government to take control and determine its own future," Rep. John Shadegg, an Arizona Republican, said in a statement. "It will require the commitment of not a minimal, but a substantial number of additional troops, perhaps as many as 50,000."

Bush nodded to congressional criticism of his plan, saying he would consider "improvements," but he pointedly signaled that the White House will challenge opponents to step forward with their own proposals.

"It is fair to hold our views up to scrutiny. And all involved have a responsibility to explain how the path they propose would be more likely to succeed," Bush said.

The president proposed no new diplomatic push to enhance outreach to Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, a key recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's December report. Bush said only that he would "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria" to armed groups attacking American forces in Iraq.

Bush Asks For More While He Has Less (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has been in this position many times—speaking solemnly to Americans from the White House about war and terror—but he has never been in this place.

He finds himself asking for more—of the military, of Congress, of the Iraqi government and of the American people—but possessing so much less. Now, he lacks the safety net of a Republican-run Congress, the political capital of which he famously boasted, and most decidedly, the support of the public weary of the war's grim narrative.

Many in the military opposed his call Wednesday night for a sharp increase in troops, though they will carry it out as ordered. Democrats were blunt in decrying the president's plan, and an escalating number of Republicans on Capitol Hill share that view. Fewer than two in 10 Americans support the idea, and it is certainly not welcome in many precincts in Iraq.

To be sure, the president conceded some mistakes, for the first time admitting that there were not enough troops and resources in Iraq and in the process disavowing the war doctrine of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. But the admissions were framed as failures in tactics rather than in strategy. He tried to proffer his address as a new direction that "will change America's course in Iraq," though much of what he suggested has been tried before.

So has this stated rationale: "The challenge playing out across the broader Middle East is more than a military conflict," Bush said. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of our time."

Bush hitched winning that struggle to two rather shaky propositions: American soldiers performing more of a policing function in Baghdad and the Iraqi government's ability to bring an end to seemingly intractable sectarian violence and establish a functioning democracy.

The burden of persuasion on waging war rests with the president, but Bush has, since the conflict began, essentially confined his arguments to Republican ears. He seems to be paying a price for that approach, with some newly empowered Democrats not only rejecting the idea of what the administration calls a "surge" in troops, but also suggesting that funding won't be automatic either.

Or, they asked, if he wanted to adopt this approach, why did he not do it some three years ago? The appeals of Gen. Eric Shinseki, who in 2003 said that the U.S. needed several hundred thousand troops to prevail in the war, and of Lawrence Lindsey, the former top economic adviser who left his post after having the temerity to say that the war could cost $200 billion, now seem prophetic.

And there were the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by one of the Bush family's trusted counselors, James Baker. The president seemed to disregard nearly all of its advice, save the proposal to increase the embedding of American advisers in Iraqi Army units.

"It's not only not an adoption, it seems to be moving in almost the opposite direction," said former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.), a member of the Sept. 11 commission. "Many of these people on the Iraq Study Group are from his father's administration….who were pretty successful and established a respectable record of public diplomacy. These principles were not just put on the shelf, but were rejected by the current president."

The role of the military, however, will be different in that troops will be put in even greater danger on a daily basis as they wade deeper into the swamp of Baghdad.

"There will never be true peace in Iraq as long as there are American combat forces in the streets of Iraq," said Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), a decorated Vietnam veteran who has advocated a phased withdrawal of troops after intensive diplomacy.

Few presidents have faced wartime choices with so few good options. Truman did not at the end of World War II. Eisenhower did not in Korea. Lyndon Johnson chose to leave it to his successor when he declined to run for a second term. But in some sense, what Bush is doing is likely to have the same effect in that it will prolong the conflict in Iraq, almost certainly pushing the hard decision of when to leave to the next occupant of the Oval Office.

During Vietnam both Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon made numerous speeches offering new ways to try to summon public support--bombing pauses by Johnson, peace proposals by Nixon--but neither swayed majorities to their views.

"This is in significant part an exercise in shoring up their political support," said historian Robert Dallek. "But this rhetoric that Johnson made, Nixon made and Bush is making really in the long run doesn't amount to a hill of beans. He may get a rally effect, an increase in backing in the short run, but if the realities on the ground don't change and people continue to see this war, like Vietnam, as a failing enterprise, it won't make any difference."

Democrats, many of whom couldn't find the same voice when the war began, now are eagerly and openly critical of the president. Those considering running for president are climbing all over one another to try to put the most distance between their position and Bush's.

Following the rebuke of voters in the midterm election, which many saw as a referendum on the war, the president finds himself more isolated than at any time in his term. And for at least one Republican who would like to replace him, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, strong support for the president might help rather than hurt. But if McCain, who served heroically in Vietnam where he was tortured as a prisoner of war, were to win the presidency, it might well fall to him to end this war with so many echoes of Vietnam.

Inviting A Battle On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — By stepping up the American military presence in Iraq, President Bush is not only inviting an epic clash with the Democrats who run Capitol Hill. He is ignoring the results of the November elections, rejecting the central thrust of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and flouting the advice of some of his own generals, as well as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq.

In so doing, Mr. Bush is taking a calculated gamble that no matter how much hue and cry his new strategy may provoke, in the end the American people will give him more time to turn around the war in Iraq and Congress will not have the political nerve to thwart him by cutting off money for the war.

The plan, outlined by the president in stark, simple tones in a 20-minute speech from the White House library, is vintage George Bush — in the eyes of admirers, resolute and principled; in the eyes of critics, bull-headed, even delusional, about the prospects for success in Iraq. It is the latest evidence that the president is convinced that he is right and that history will vindicate him, even if that vindication comes long after he is gone from the Oval Office.

Mr. Bush long ago staked his presidency on Iraq, and to the extent he can salvage the war he can also salvage the remaining two years of his administration. So he is taking a risk, challenging not only the Democratic leadership in Congress but also some members of his own party, who are openly skeptical that the new policy will work and who, unlike the president, will be running for re-election.

But there are no guarantees that Mr. Bush's reading of the country and the Congress will prove correct.

"It's more than a risk, it's a riverboat gamble," said Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group and former chief of staff to President Bill Clinton. "There's no question that under our system he's going to be able to deploy these troops without Congress being able to stop him. But he's going to face so many battles over these next few months, on funding for the war, on every decision he makes, that he's basically taking the nation into another nightmare of conflict over a war that no one sees any end to."

The White House orchestrated an elaborate rollout for the speech, including a presidential briefing for network news anchors before Mr. Bush addressed the nation. On Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates are scheduled to appear at a news conference before testifying on Capitol Hill — a show of cabinet comity that might have been unthinkable when Donald H. Rumsfeld was still at the Pentagon.

Acknowledging that any mistakes in Iraq were his own and that Americans would face "trying hours" in the months ahead, Mr. Bush took pains to say he had consulted with members of Congress. But Democrats complained the consultation was perfunctory. Standing outside the White House after meeting with the president just hours before his speech, Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised to force a vote on Mr. Bush's plan.

That vote would be nonbinding. But in the months to come, Democrats could go further, tying Mr. Bush's hands by setting conditions on the use of tax dollars, as Congress did during the Vietnam War and in Lebanon and Central America.

Wartime clashes between presidents and the Congress are a familiar thread in American history. But perhaps no president since Richard M. Nixon has so boldly expanded an unpopular war. Explaining his decision to invade Cambodia in April 1970, Nixon said: "A majority of the American people, a majority of you listening to me, are for the withdrawal of our forces from Vietnam. The action I have taken tonight is indispensable for the continuing success of that withdrawal program."

Likewise, Mr. Bush has concluded that he must scale up American involvement in order to scale it down. The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said on Tuesday that Mr. Bush hoped to "bring the public back to this war." But the president's aides are under no illusions.

"The reality is, conditions on the ground have to change," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president.

In the meantime, some Republicans are already jumping ship. Moderates like Senators Gordon H. Smith of Oregon and Susan Collins of Maine, both up for re-election in 2008, oppose sending more troops to Baghdad, and on Wednesday, a conservative, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, joined them.

After Democrats swept the November midterm elections, people both inside and outside the administration expected the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to provide Mr. Bush with a face-saving exit from the war. Mr. Bush made favorable reference to the study group on Wednesday night, noting that he had accepted some of its 79 recommendations.

But he rejected its central notion, that the United States should set a timetable for scaling back combat operations and mount a new diplomatic offensive to engage Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush concluded that those recommendations were not a recipe for victory, but rather, as he said after a meeting with Mr. Maliki in November, a recipe for "a graceful exit," a path he did not want to pursue. At their meeting, Mr. Maliki presented Mr. Bush with a plan calling for Iraqi troops to assume primary responsibility for security in Baghdad, shifting American troops to the periphery of the capital. Instead, Mr. Bush concluded that the United States would have to take a central role, because the Iraqis were not capable of quelling the sectarian violence on their own.

In a sense, it is a predictable path for Mr. Bush. This, after all, is the same president who lost the popular vote in 2000, was installed in the White House by a 5-to-4 vote of the Supreme Court and then governed as if he had won by a landslide. And this is the same president who, after winning re-election in 2004, famously told reporters that he had "earned capital in the campaign, political capital, and now I intend to spend it."

But no American president has been able to prosecute a war indefinitely without the support of the American public. With polls showing fewer than 20 percent of Americans supporting increasing troop levels in Iraq, Mr. Bush and those Republicans who support him know that the new policy will be a tough sell.

"The American people have no reason in the world to think it's going to work just like the president paints it," said one of those backers, Senator Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, "but I think the American people, in their usual good sense, are going to wait around for a while and say, 'Mr. President, you've taken us down a lot of roads in Iraq, let's go down this one and see if it works.' "

The question for Mr. Bush is just how long the American people, and their elected representatives, will wait.

As He Touts A 'Way Forward,' Bush Admits Errors Of The Past (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

As his reelection campaign geared up in 2004, President Bush was asked to name his biggest mistake. He couldn't think of one. By the time he was asked again last year, he had thought of one, his inappropriate "tough talk." Last night, Bush acknowledged that some of the most fundamental assumptions underlying the U.S. venture in Iraq were wrong.

The evolution tracks the sharp deterioration not only of the U.S. position in Iraq, but also of Bush's position at home. As he argued to send even more troops into a war that has lost public support, Bush labored to convince Congress and the American people that he understands where he went wrong and has learned from those errors.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he told the nation. "It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq." He added that generals have "reviewed the new Iraqi plan to ensure that it addressed these mistakes" and "they report that it does."

A chart released by the White House before Bush's "Way Forward" speech went even further, outlining a succession of basic assumptions made in the past about Iraq that as of yesterday it has disavowed -- including the notion that building a democracy would defuse the insurgency and bring down violence. It was the sort of chart Bush's critics might have put together, not a White House traditionally loath to admit mistakes.

Still, the president's admissions were calculated to advance his current political aims and came with significant limitations. He offered no regret for the March 2003 invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein and still argued for staying in Iraq until the job is done. His tone was sober but came without apology or contrition. As one aide put it, "This is not a speech being given on bended knee."

But it was a speech being given arguably with his knees cut out from under him. The spiraling violence in Iraq has turned two-thirds of the American public against him, according to polls, and with Democrats now in charge of Congress, Bush appears increasingly isolated in Washington. Despite his post-election talk of bipartisanship, Bush chose a path almost guaranteed to generate open resistance even from within his own party. Republican officeholders who did stick with him last night appeared largely unenthusiastic.

"He's pretty much alone on this," said William S. Cohen, a former Republican senator from Maine who served as defense secretary under President Bill Clinton. Bush had an opportunity to draw Democrats in by embracing at least some recommendations of the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group, Cohen said: "It would buy you bipartisanship for five or six months. . . . By simply ignoring it and allowing it to die in the crib, so to speak, Democrats are now free agents."

To admirers, that is a virtue. "He's going to do what's in his heart of hearts and nobody can deter him from that course," said James Jay Carafano, a Heritage Foundation scholar. "He's never going to make everybody happy and he's not going to make even most people happy, and he shouldn't try. So the politics of this are going to suck, but he's going to do what he thinks he should do."

For some in the capital, the speech and the president's dilemma brought back haunting memories of another era. "The administration is making the same mistakes now that we made in Vietnam and I'm really sorry about that," said Jack J. Valenti, an aide to President Lyndon B. Johnson. "I learned in Vietnam when the public loses support for a war, forget about it -- it's all over."

Harry McPherson recalled the March 1968 speech he wrote that shifted the direction of the war and that Johnson used to end his reelection bid. Like then, McPherson said, there are no good options. "Many of the same consequences are being bruited about. What happens if we pull out of there? What happens if they win in Iraq? What happens to American prestige in the world? That's what we talked about all the time." While the Iraq war was "a gigantic mistake," he said, "there is a big cost to leaving."

The White House recognized that a speech will not convert critics. "Nobody is under illusions that the public is going to be turned around on this," said the Bush aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record. "What you hope to accomplish with a speech like this is to show the public that there is a genuine, deep and fundamental change and there's a good chance of success."

To make the case that he has embraced fundamental change, Bush had to concede mistakes in a more meaningful way. For the past year or so, he has acknowledged that tactics were flawed but not core decisions. Asked about mistakes at a joint news conference last year, British Prime Minister Tony Blair cited the purge of tens of thousands of members of Hussein's Baath Party from the Iraqi government, one of the most consequential moves after the invasion. Bush, by contrast, said he should not have taunted insurgents by declaring, "Bring 'em on."

Bush went further in his analysis last night. The plan to secure Baghdad, he said, "failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents." He also agreed with Blair that de-Baathification went too far.

In the speech, Bush did not dwell on these mistakes, but the White House elaborated in the chart comparing past "key assumptions" with current ones, showing how its understanding of Iraq has changed. In the past, the chart said, the White House believed "political progress will help defuse the insurgency." But now it has concluded that "political and economic progress are unlikely absent a basic level of security." In the past, the White House assumed the "majority of Iraqis will support the Coalition and Iraqi efforts to build a democratic state." Now, it said, "Iraqis [are] increasingly disillusioned with Coalition efforts."

The chart went on to say that the White House wrongly assumed that dialogue with insurgent groups would reduce violence, that other countries in the region have a strategic interest in a stable Iraq and that Iraqi security forces were gaining strength to handle threats. Now, it said, dialogue has not worked, Arab states have not fully supported the Iraqi government and many Iraqi forces are "not yet ready to handle" the security threat.

Bush must now make the case that those new assumptions are more valid than the last and that his plan will address them. "To be persuasive, President Bush needs to show what specific results an escalation will achieve and when," said Anthony Lake, who was one of Clinton's national security advisers. "And his problem is, he will then be held accountable for those results."

Bush Outlines New Tactics For Iraq, But Faces Big Obstacles (MCT)

By William Douglas And Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush laid out his "New Way Forward" in Iraq Wednesday night, calling for beefing up U.S. forces there by extending tours of duty for 21,500 troops, adding $1.2 billion in new reconstruction aid and letting Iraqi forces take the lead in joint combat operations.

"The changes I have outlined tonight are aimed at ensuring the survival of a young democracy that is fighting for its life in a part of the world of enormous importance to American security," Bush said in a nationally televised address. "The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will."

Bush's latest Iraq plan faces two immediate obstacles:

-Leaders of the new Democratic-led Congress oppose his proposed troop buildup, as do many influential Republicans. They may try to block it, though they haven't agreed on a firm plan to do so.

-Bush's plan relies on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Shiite Muslim-dominated government to crack down on its allies in the country's Shiite militias, which it has so far refused to do.

Questions abound: Will an additional 21,500 American troops in Iraq, taken mostly from units to be held longer in Iraq or sent there sooner, be enough to help restore order both in Baghdad and in violent, Sunni-dominated Anbar Province?

Will an additional $1 billion in aid make a dent in the country's economic problems?

Last, will Bush's efforts to reassure Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Kuwait and Iraq's other Sunni Muslim neighbors calm their fears that Shiite power may expand from Iran through Iraq to Lebanon? Bush has sent an aircraft carrier battle group and some Patriot missile defense batteries to the Persian Gulf to calm Sunni Arab nerves. But he has largely ignored recommendations to open talks with Iran and Syria and to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

The president acknowledged previous failures.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. Past efforts to quell violence in Baghdad failed, he said, because "there were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods" and "there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have." He said his plan would remedy such flaws.

He warned of a "bloody and violent" year ahead in the war-torn country, despite his new proposals.

"This new strategy will not yield an immediate end to suicide bombings, assassinations, or IED (improvised explosive device) attacks," Bush said. "Our enemies in Iraq will make every effort to ensure that our television screens are filled with images of death and suffering."

Bush appeared to signal a more aggressive policy toward Syria and Iran, saying the U.S. would take unspecified steps to "disrupt" attacks on U.S. troops by terrorists and insurgents who use Iranian and Syrian territory to move in and out of Iraq.

Specifically, Bush proposed:

-Boosting U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 by extending tours of duty, with about 17,500 to Baghdad and 4,000 to Anbar Province. The increase will be staggered, with the first combat brigade arriving in Baghdad on Jan. 15 and the second on Feb. 15. Additional brigades will be added every 30 days.

-Increasing economic reconstruction aid by $1 billion.

-Having Iraq deploy 10,500 additional Iraqi troops and nine additional 800-man police brigades in Baghdad, with all of the new military units in place by Feb. 15.

-A new command structure that will put Iraqis in charge of security in Baghdad, with U.S. troops deeply embedded in Iraqi units. U.S. troops would remain under U.S. command.

-An end to the open-ended commitment of U.S. troops, but no timetable for withdrawal.

-Having Iraqis take the lead responsibility for security throughout the country by November, with continued U.S. help after that.

-The deployment of additional civilian reconstruction teams, including teams embedded with troops to hasten rebuilding efforts in newly secured areas.

-New diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's neighbors and a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

-More pressure on Iraqis to follow through on plans for provincial elections, a new law for distributing oil revenues and other measures intended to foster Iraqi unity.

In addition, Bush's plan appears to abandon a key point of previous U.S. strategy - it no longer emphasizes disarming and disbanding Shiite militias, leaving both to the Iraqi government, which depends on those militia for support.

Bush put Iraq on notice that America won't stay forever.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said. "If we increase our support at this crucial moment and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

Bush's immediate audience is a Democratic-controlled Congress already hostile to his plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq. Democratic House and Senate leaders issued a statement following his speech repeating their opposition.

Both House and Senate Democrats plan floor votes soon on resolutions opposing the president's troop buildup, but they'll be nonbinding.

Democratic congressional leaders don't appear to have an immediate consensus, however, on what, if any, binding legislation they should push or how fast to move. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., hopes to pass legislation that would require congressional approval of any increase in troops, but party leaders concede that they lack the votes to make that stick at this time, especially over a Bush veto.

Bush, however, can no longer count on solid Republican support in Congress.

"I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said Wednesday on the Senate floor. "If Iraq is to fulfill its role as a sovereign and democratic state, it must start acting like one."

Similarly, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who's exploring a bid for the presidency in 2008 as a social-values conservative, declared himself against a troop increase Wednesday.

"I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer," Brownback said while traveling in Iraq. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Wednesday he's weighing a Senate resolution endorsing the approach of the Iraq Study Group, which called last month for urgently shifting responsibility to Iraqi forces so that most U.S. combat troops could be withdrawn by early next year.

In the House of Representatives, eight Republicans sent a letter Wednesday to Bush urging him not to increase troop levels.

Many of Bush's new proposals - a limited increase in U.S. troops, Iraqis taking the lead in security matters, billions in reconstruction aid - have been tried before and failed to reduce violence or quell the insurgency.

Last fall, for example, an Iraqi-led joint U.S.-Iraqi military mission to secure some of Baghdad's most violent neighborhoods produced complaints from U.S. military commanders about the ineptness of Iraqi forces.

U.S. military officials complained that the daily missions started late and some Iraqi troops failed to show up for work. Some Iraqi soldiers would do their job only in front of American forces and slack off if only Iraqi commanders were around.

Some top U.S. military officials in Iraq say for Bush's plan to work, Iraqi officials must go after Sunni and Shiite extremists. U.S. troops have aggressively targeted Sunni areas, conceding they can't enter Shiite strongholds, such as Sadr City, because of Iraqi political pressure. Shiite support is the backbone of al-Maliki's government.

Americans have already soured on Iraq. In recent polls, public support for sending more troops to Iraq ranged from 12 percent to 36 percent of Americans, depending on how the question was phrased.

"This is his last chance to convince the American public that he knows what he's doing and victory is possible," said Dennis Goldford, a political science professor at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa. "He's tied his whole presidency to this. He got us into this situation. He thinks there's a way out. This is his last chance at a last chance."

If it fails, Goldford said, Iraq "could become the all-consuming issue" for the final two years of Bush's term, crowding other presidential initiatives. "If he's totally ineffective, he leaves this ravaged sore on the body politic as well as foreign relations."

President Bush's New Plan For Iraq Could Soon Run Into Old Obstacles (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush unveiled what the White House called a "New Way Forward" in Iraq on Wednesday night, but the plan faces old obstacles that have defied solution ever since the United States invaded Iraq nearly four years ago.

Bush's plan relies even more than past stratagems on a weak Iraqi government to fulfill promises it's repeatedly broken to take on sectarian militias and end political squabbles.

It calls for Iraqis to beef up their forces in Baghdad to help quell raging violence there, four months after the Iraqi government failed to contribute four of the six battalions of troops it promised to a similar security effort.

The plan calls for reordering Iraq's Interior Ministry, something that American officials have been insisting on since last spring, when Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki came to office.

Bush also said that Iraq's government would pass a new law on distributing oil revenues and revise its de-Baathification program, which keeps members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party out of government. But both efforts have been stymied by opposition in Iraq's parliament.

The biggest course change is the declaration that Iraqis will be in charge of the effort to secure Baghdad, which al-Maliki has been pushing for.

Bush aides, who detailed the plan in a series of documents and briefings, insisted Wednesday that this time is different. Al-Maliki has pledged to deploy more Iraqi forces to stabilize Baghdad, and the full U.S. troop contingent and financial aid package won't flow unless he follows through on that and other steps, they said.

But if al-Maliki fails to deliver, the president appears to have little leverage other than to bring U.S. troops home - and abandon the "victory" in Iraq that he insists is vital to U.S. national security.

"An awful lot depends on the Iraqis. We don't control the Iraqis anymore," said Daniel Serwer, a vice president of the government-funded U.S. Institute of Peace.

Some current and former U.S. officials said they believe that by placing so much of the burden on the Iraqis, Bush is preparing to blame them for the debacle in their country and withdraw American troops.

Bush for the first time Wednesday said that the U.S. commitment in Iraq isn't open-ended - though he put no time limit on how long Americans would wait to see whether al-Maliki fulfilled his promises. The first test will come Feb. 15, when the additional Iraqi troops are to be deployed in Baghdad.

The president's strategy, the product of a more than two-month review, does abandon some key tenets that have guided U.S. strategy in Iraq for more than a year.

Gone is the attempt to reach out to Sunni insurgents; previous efforts to bring them into the political process didn't reduce violence, and the U.S. is ending any effort to do so.

Gone, too, is the rapid effort to replace U.S. troops with Iraqi ones, captured in the mantra "As they stand up, we will stand down." While training Iraqi troops remains the key U.S. mission, the No. 1 U.S. goal in Iraq is the defeat of al-Qaida and its supporters.

Outside analysts said they saw some positive elements in the plan, such as a focus on protecting Iraqi civilians and jump-starting the economy from the grass roots - both classic elements of counterinsurgency doctrine. Bush proposes almost $1.2 billion in new economic assistance in Iraq and a doubling of U.S. civil-military reconstruction teams.

But many said they feared Bush's modified tactics are too little and too late to make up for past blunders in Iraq. Those include invading with too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, underestimating the cost of the venture and misjudging the rapid growth of Iraq's insurgency.

"The problem is the solutions applied three years ago or two years ago might have stabilized the situation. . . . I find it hard to see they will apply today," said Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at the National Defense University.

At best, the current and former officials said, Bush's plan might produce measurable improvement in Baghdad's security - perhaps returning it to the situation before February 2006, when the bombing of an important Shiite mosque in Samarra set off Iraq's civil war.

The core of Bush's "New Way Forward" is a bid to end the endemic violence in Baghdad by deploying 17,500 more U.S. troops and thousands of additional Iraqi troops and police and adopting new rules of engagement.

White House officials said Iraqi forces would take the lead, with American troops embedded in Iraqi units.

That's been tried before, too, and failed, in last summer's joint effort to bring security to Baghdad, called Operation Forward Together.

For the new plan to work, the Iraqi government must crack down on both Sunni and Shiite extremists, top military officials in Baghdad said.

But al-Maliki has refused to move against the militias of powerful Shiite politicians, including firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who are the bedrock of his political support. It is unclear why he'd do so now.

Sunnis, representing Iraq's now-dispossessed minority, criticized the U.S. troop increase even before Bush formally announced it. Sunni insurgents are certain to react with more violence to joint security sweeps by U.S. troops and forces of the Shiite-led Iraqi government.

On Tuesday, some in Iraq thought they saw what a security plan under al-Maliki could look like when Iraqi forces struck Haifa Street in central Baghdad, a longtime Sunni insurgent trouble spot.

U.S. and Iraqi forces fought suspected insurgents for 12 hours in an operation that Sunni politicians charged was sectarian. After Sunnis responded to an attack by al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, they charged, the Iraqi army came in with American forces and struck the Sunnis but did nothing about the Shiite extremists who were there earlier.

The Iraqi government has long claimed that if it quells the Sunni insurgency, the violent reaction from the Shiite militias will end and they'll be disarmed. That approach has been tried and failed, but there's no sign that the al-Maliki government is rethinking it.

Whether Iraqi troops will be up to the task of helping pacify Baghdad neighborhood by neighborhood is as questionable as ever.

During Operation Forward Together, some Iraqi forces did their jobs well. But most daily missions started late, as Iraqi commanders and U.S. forces counted how many Iraqi troops came to work that day.

While U.S. and Iraqi troops were in troubled neighborhoods, such as Amariyah in western Baghdad, crime did fall. But as soon as the troops left, the insurgents moved back in, and the violence, including sectarian killings, car bombings and explosions, surpassed previous levels.

Many wonder where the Iraqi government will find fresh troops for Baghdad. U.S. military transition team leaders in the northern Iraqi city of Sulaimaniyah told McClatchy Newspapers last month that predominantly Kurdish brigades there would dissolve if they were ordered to the capital.

How al-Maliki might bring about political reconciliation, another aspect of Bush's plan, also is unclear. There's intense skepticism that he can move beyond his Shiite base and deliver his half of the bargain, as even a senior Bush aide acknowledged Wednesday.

"There is obviously skepticism, and the president has made that very clear to this (Iraqi) government: People are skeptical - your people are skeptical, our people are skeptical. I will support you, but you need to perform," said the official, briefing reporters anonymously under White House ground rules.

Larry Diamond of Stanford University's Hoover Institution said Bush should have demanded action from the Iraqis before pledging additional U.S. troops and money.

"They've made commitments many times before, and they aren't delivered upon," said Diamond, who served as a democracy adviser in postwar Iraq. "The deadlines and goals are constantly slipping - and they're like mush."

Analysis: A 'Make-it-or-break-it Moment' On Iraq (USAT)

By Susan Page

WASHINGTON — Not since the Vietnam War has a president faced such a daunting policy challenge: Rallying Americans behind a costly military venture that already has lost much of its support among the public and in Congress.

President Bush chose the unusual setting of the White House library — where Jimmy Carter donned a cardigan for his 1977 energy speech — to deliver a long-awaited address outlining his "new way forward" in Iraq.

He chose not so much a change of direction as an acceleration, committing 21,500 more U.S. troops and demanding political progress from Baghdad. Even Arizona Sen. John McCain, a supporter, calls the plan a "last chance" to avoid a decisive setback in Iraq.

And, some say, to his presidency.

"This is a make-it-or-break-it moment," says Ken Duberstein, a chief of staff in the Reagan White House. "This is as much about Bush and his leadership for the last two years as it is about Iraq."

After the congressional elections in November, Bush seemed ready to change course in Iraq. He said voters had delivered "a thumpin' " by handing control of Congress to Democrats in an election driven in large part by anxiety about the war. He replaced Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Then, in December, the Iraq Study Group, headed by Bush family consigliere James Baker, issued a report it titled "the way forward — a new approach." It called for increased regional diplomacy, threats of cuts in U.S. support if the Iraqi government didn't meet political goals and the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by March 2008.

While he called the commission's recommendations "thoughtful," Bush mapped a course largely at odds with its key provisions.

He's committing more troops and calling on Iraq to meet political goals, but without the threat of U.S. penalties if they don't. While the commission endorsed negotiations with Iran and Syria, Bush calls for increased efforts — and the deployment of a new carrier strike group — to disrupt supply lines from the two countries to Iraqi fighters.

Except for the troop increase, none of the ideas is new. All are familiar parts of the administration's strategy in Iraq and Bush's prior speeches defending it.

Leon Panetta, a White House chief of staff for President Clinton and one of the 10 members of the Iraq Study Group, says the members were concerned from the start whether the White House would listen to what they had to say.

"The president is pretty obstinate about what he thought were the right answers, and obviously we weren't delivering good news, so I can't say it was unanticipated," he says. Panetta called it "disappointing."

"The most important thing we did was to identify the realities of what's happening there," Panetta adds. "If you accept those realities, it leads you to many of the recommendations that we made. If you refuse to accept those realities, then you're going to repeat the same old mistakes. I think unfortunately that's where the president seems to be."

The stakes for Bush, already high, have been raised because he has become so isolated politically when it comes to the war. Six in 10 Americans oppose increasing troop levels, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. Seven in 10 disapprove of his handling of Iraq.

Congressional Republicans, who since the 2003 invasion generally have stood behind the administration, are now divided. And congressional Democrats are considering proposals that would either express disapproval of the troop escalation or try to block funding for it.

"Generally, presidents have a very difficult time changing public opinion," especially once opposition has gelled, says Brandice Canes-Wrone, a professor at Princeton who has studied the power of White House addresses. But Bush's speech may well "buy him some time" to proceed because he is "taking ownership" of a controversial policy.

"If this doesn't work out," she says, "then Bush is to blame solely."

Early in his address, the president acknowledged for the first time that the administration had erred in sending too few troops. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. He called the current situation "unacceptable."

Still, he portrayed retreat as unthinkable, describing the war as a critical part of the larger struggle against global terrorism.

That is an argument Bush often has made — indeed, in a speech on Iraq he delivered precisely one year earlier, to the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Washington.

"When victory comes and democracy takes hold in Iraq, it will serve as a model for freedom in the broader Middle East," he declared on Jan. 10, 2006. He predicted U.S. combat forces would be reduced within a few months and derided some Democratic critics of the war as "irresponsible."

On Wednesday, a subdued Bush made no such predictions of democracy's spread, and his tone toward congressional Democrats was conciliatory rather than confrontational. "Honorable people have different views," he said.

His basic message, though, was unchanged. To "step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear that country apart and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale," he said, creating new dangers for Americans. The year ahead, he said, "will demand more patience, sacrifice and resolve."

Past Troop Surges In Iraq Produced Mixed Results (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Troop surges like the one announced by President Bush last night have been tried before in Iraq to stabilize the country for elections or dampen an upswing in violence -- with mixed results.

The real test for the president's new strategy is how this surge will differ from the past. For example, Mr. Bush ordered more forces into Iraq in July to stop sectarian violence in greater Baghdad. More than 15,000 U.S. soldiers joined 40,000 Iraqi forces in block-by-block sweeps.

But the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki never cracked down on Shi'ite militias, some loyal to a key political supporter, Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr. In the end, the Baghdad command acknowledged the offensive did not meet its objectives.

This time, Mr. Bush pledged that events will be different. The Iraqi army will go after Shi'ites, not just Sunnis. And the buildup will not have a time limit.

Baghdad will be divided into nine military sectors. Mr. al-Maliki will appoint a Baghdad military commander. From the 17,000 U.S. soldiers going to the capital, battalions will be joined with each Iraqi brigade, creating training and operations all in one, said a military source.

On Iran, part of the plan is already in place: a buildup of naval forces in the Persian Gulf. Plus, the source said, the U.S. will capture and hold Iranians helping the insurgents in the hope that this will provide some leverage against Iran's aid to the insurgency.

"The surge will work as long as the Iraqis do their part, and our hands are untied to be tough where required," said retired Army Lt. Col. Robert Maginnis, a military analyst. "Maliki must decide between working with the U.S. and his misplaced loyalties to al-Sadr. I believe the militia issue is the real center of gravity, not necessarily Baghdad. It happens that militia problems are worse in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush has ordered surges before with mixed results. In May 2004, forces were declining to 115,000. But violence in Sunni-dominated Fallujah, and in Shi'ite towns around Najaf, forced the Pentagon to halt the drawdown and rebuild back to 138,000.

The results: A Marine-led force ultimately retook Fallujah that November. Army brigades clashed with Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi Army in a series of battles, reducing the militia to a few hundred.

But Sheik al-Sadr escaped death or arrest. He methodically rebuilt his army, with the help of Iran. Today, he controls thousands of fighters, some of whom break off into death squads and hunt down, torture and kill Sunnis. Hundreds of the bodies have been found strewn around Baghdad.

The Pentagon also surged troops three times for elections: a transition assembly; a constitution and a permanent parliament in December 2005. In each case, the surge was targeted to improve security in the run-up to balloting and then to create a safe atmosphere for voters. The strategy worked. All three elections were deemed successful by international observers. But they had limited impact on long-term violence.

The last buildup came this past summer. Mr. Bush again ordered an increase, from 127,000 to 150,000 to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. The offensive did not work, and Republicans lost control of Congress in part because of larger number of voters turning against the war.

The president then began a far-reaching review, which ended last night with his announced decision to try a troop surge for the sixth time with new tactics.

In Congress, Bush's Plan Unites Dems, Splinters GOP (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq has further united Democrats on Capitol Hill, who nearly unanimously condemned the president's proposals Wednesday night.

Republicans, meanwhile, have splintered in the face of widespread popular discontent over the war and Bush's plans to escalate it.

The congressional reaction Wednesday to the president's prime-time television address underscored how dramatically Bush's proposal has changed the political dynamic in Washington less than a week after Democrats assumed control of the House and Senate.

Emboldened Democrats, who for years struggled to find common ground in challenging the White House, have found a target in the plan and are coalescing around the demand that troops be withdrawn.

And once-united Republicans now face an unpleasant choice: stand behind a deeply unpopular troop buildup or take on the head of their party.

"There is a lot of anxiety and heartburn here," Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., said outside the House chamber, noting the conflicted feelings of many GOP lawmakers toward Bush. "He's our guy. No one wants to go against our guy. And he's the commander in chief and the guy who campaigned for all of us. But he is Iraq." LaHood and many Republicans stood by the president Wednesday, praising Bush for his commitment to reducing the sectarian strife in Iraq.

"The president should be commended for adapting to the reality on the ground in Iraq," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "And although the new plan is not without risk, it provides the best chance for helping the Iraqi people form a country that can defend itself and is an ally in the war on terror."

But McConnell does not head a united front.

A number of Republican senators expressed deep reservations about the president's proposals Wednesday.

"I want real evidence that a potential surge in troops will do more good than harm and will not exacerbate the existing violence in Iraq," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, who was invited to the White House to discuss the plan. "I am skeptical."

Other GOP dissenters include Sens. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sam Brownback of Kansas, a presidential candidate who once staunchly supported Bush's foreign policy.

Continuing their strident criticism of the Bush administration's war strategy, Smith called the plan a "Hail Mary pass" and Hagel said it was "dangerously wrongheaded."

Also withholding support was Georgia Republican Rep. Jack Kingston, whose district is the home of the U.S. Army's 3rd Infantry Division, which has served two tours in Iraq.

Democrats, by contrast, rallied Wednesday in vigorous opposition, taking to the floors of the House and Senate and stepping before television cameras to condemn the president.

"There are no timelines, no real goals .... I was very disappointed," California Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN. "It is an escalation. And I'm hard-pressed to see how we come out of that kind of escalation as victors."

Feinstein and other Democrats have voiced increasing alarm about sending more troops into the middle of a burgeoning civil war that they say can only be quelled by Iraqis themselves.

Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who ran as an independent last year but still caucuses with the Democrats, was a lonely supporter of the president, whom he praised for pushing a "correct and courageous course."

"It is a dangerous illusion to believe that we can depart Iraq and the inevitable killing fields, and terrorist violence will not follow us in retreat, even to our own shores," Lieberman said.

The war continues to pose difficulties for Democrats.

The party's plans to focus on a 100-hour domestic agenda packed with popular measures like ethics reform and a minimum wage hike were overshadowed by the debate over Bush's much-anticipated Iraq speech.

And Democrats, who rode to power on voter discontent with the war, are being forced to articulate a real strategy to match their rhetoric.

But Bush's plan appears to have galvanized Democrats -- who just last summer were put on the defensive by Republicans who induced nearly a quarter of the House Democrats to back a GOP resolution expressing support for Bush's war policies.

Wednesday, House and Senate leaders were confidently gearing up to introduce resolutions opposing the president's plans.

"My bet is that if an up-or-down vote happened on the Senate floor on whether we should send a significantly increased number of troops, that that vote would be overwhelmingly against sending the troops, and a significant number of Republicans would vote not to send more troops to Iraq," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., who helped quarterback Senate Democrats to their November election success.

Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Mass., were lining up co-sponsors for their bills, which would go even further and cut off funds for increasing troop levels in Iraq.

Among their supporters are Sens. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and John F. Kerry, D-Mass.

"Last year ... there was some squeamishness about the war," said Kerry, who pushed an unsuccessful measure last spring to require a troop withdrawal. "Now there is a unanimity in our caucus."

President Bush's announcement that he is sending more troops to Iraq sets up the first major test of wills between his Republican administration and the new Democratic-controlled Congress. Both sides are digging in.

The political stakes raised by Bush's prime-time television address were high on both sides.

Democrats, who came to power in midterm elections two months ago in large part because of growing public opposition to the war, must walk a fine line between criticizing Bush's plans and appearing to be obstructionists or undermining the military.

And they presently rule Congress with insufficient numbers to block Bush's plan.

For Bush, the decision to send more troops to Iraq — rather than begin a withdrawal of combat forces as recommended last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — is a huge gamble.

If it fails, he will have few if any options left.

Defying public opinion polls and the newly empowered Democratic leadership, Bush on Wednesday moved to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq while saying it was a mistake not to have had more forces there previously.

He recognized the risks ahead. "Even if our new strategy works exactly as planned, deadly acts of violence will continue and we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties," Bush said in Wednesday's address to the nation. But, he added, "to step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear that country apart, and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale,"

Democrats served notice they would challenge his plan, with aggressive hearings that begin on Thursday and with votes in both the House and Senate in the coming days on a nonbinding measure opposing any increase in troops.

"American voters expect us to help get us out of Iraq," said Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and a 2008 presidential hopeful.

Congress voted in October 2002 by wide margins to authorize Bush to take military action in Iraq. That authority stands.

Since they now run Congress, even though by thin majorities, Democrats also now share with the president some responsibility over the unpopular war.

Despite their vows to carefully scrutinize Bush's troop increase, their near-term options are limited.

While it's true that Congress controls the government's purse strings, politically about the most it can do is hold hearings and pass symbolic resolutions.

If, even if with the help of some Republicans, Congress is able to pass legislation, such as that proposed this week by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., to require Bush to get congressional approval before sending more troops to Iraq, Bush will surely veto it.

And, given the slim margin of Democratic control, such a veto would almost certainly be sustained.

"The Democrats may control Congress but they can't block the president this time without potentially being accused of losing the war. I think an awful lot of this is staging for the next time," the 2008 presidential and congressional elections, said Anthony Cordesman, an Iraq expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

For Bush, many dangers lurk in the new plan.

The new troops might not be enough to stabilize the country. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki might not rise to Bush's challenge to do more in controlling sectarian violence and shutting down private militias. The new U.S. troops could present more targets to militants.

"We have to succeed. We must succeed. The consequences of failure are catastrophic in the region," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who has long advocated more troops.

Furthermore, Bush risks losing more and more Republican support, which in turn would hasten his lame-duck status. Next week's votes are, in part, a strategy to divide Republicans by forcing them to take a public stand on the war.

"At this point, the battle lines have been drawn pretty deeply. And the concrete is setting," said Stephen Wayne, a professor of government at Georgetown University. "I regard this as a last gasp for the president to try to get a successful resolution of the Iraq quagmire."

Both parties are divided on what to do next.

More and more Republicans are trying to distance themselves from Bush and the war.

And Democrats are divided on how far to go in fighting Bush's plan or in pressing for troop withdrawals, even as the party's liberal base pressures them to do more to bring troops home.

"If the question is whether Congress would cut off funds, the answer is no. But you had an election in November that was widely interpreted as a rejection of the president's war policy," said John Isaacs, president of the Council for a Livable World, an arms control advocacy group.

"While Americans are not sure about how to get out, and only a small proportion back immediate withdrawal, they certainly aren't inclined to support a new increase, an escalation," said Isaacs.

Before his speech, Bush personally briefed both Democratic and Republican leaders on details of his plan. The leaders emerged in agreement on just one thing — that Americans are understandably skeptical and that the war so far has gone badly.

Then, they respectively sounded what are sure to be battle themes for the coming days.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi renewed their opposition to additional troops. But, said Reid, "We as senators have had no ability to have any input in the president's position on this."

House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the plan might be distasteful to some but he called it "our best shot at victory in Iraq."

Intensified Combat On Streets Likely (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's plan to send tens of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi reinforcements to Baghdad to jointly confront Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias is likely to touch off a more dangerous phase of the war, featuring months of fighting in the streets of the Iraqi capital, current and former military officials warned.

"The terrorists and insurgents in Iraq are without conscience, and they will make the year ahead bloody and violent," the president said last night in explaining his revised approach. "Even if our new strategy works exactly as planned, deadly acts of violence will continue -- and we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties."

The prospect of a more intense battle in the Iraqi capital could put U.S. military commanders in exactly the sort of tough urban fight that war planners strove to avoid during the spring 2003 invasion of the country. The plan to partner U.S. and Iraqi units may compel American soldiers to rely on questionable Iraqi army and police forces as never before. And while the president insisted there is no timetable associated with the troop increase, military officials said sustaining it for more than a few months would place a major new strain on U.S. forces that already are feeling burdened by an unexpectedly long and difficult war.

Most of all, the White House's insistence on confronting all insurgents and militias, both Sunni and Shiite, may mean that the U.S. military will wind up fighting the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. That militia is estimated by some U.S. intelligence officials to have grown over the past year to about 60,000 fighters, and some in the Pentagon consider it more militarily effective than the Iraqi army. Fighting it could resemble on a citywide scale the sharp combat that took place this week along central Baghdad's Haifa Street, in which U.S. jets and attack helicopters conducted airstrikes just north of the U.S. Embassy in the protected Green Zone.

"There will be more violence than usual because of the surge, and a surge with more casualties plays up on the international stage," said a senior Army official. Sadr "is going to have to make a choice, and if he decides on a confrontation, it will be pretty significant," added a senior Pentagon official.

Sadr is one of the most powerful figures in the Iraqi government, and he has forced it and the U.S. military to back down in the past. Yet if the Mahdi Army is not confronted, the entire offensive may falter and the sectarian conflict may intensify, because Sunnis will feel it is just one more way of attacking them while letting Shiite death squads go free, military experts said. "If our troops do not enter Sadr City, they belittle the notion of a surge because they would leave a leading militia unscathed," said Patrick Cronin of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a defense think tank.

The last time the U.S. military fought both Sunni and Shiite elements in Iraq was the spring of 2004, which became one of the most difficult times in the war. U.S. commanders were stunned to face a two-front conflict against Sunni insurgents in Anbar province and Shiites in Baghdad and across a broad swath of south-central Iraq. Troops from the Army's 1st Cavalry Division fighting in Sadr's stronghold of about 2 million Shiites in eastern Baghdad became enmeshed in a series of clashes resembling the movie "Black Hawk Down." Sadr's militias besieged isolated U.S. patrols and took over police stations, schools and municipal buildings.

An Army officer who recently commanded a battalion in Baghdad predicted last night that the plan would fail because Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government "will do things to maintain protection" of Sadr's forces. He also dismissed as "happy talk" the president's notion that the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army and police could reassure pro-insurgent Sunni neighborhoods by conducting foot patrols through them.

Bush said it is now clear that there have not been sufficient troops in Baghdad, and that part of the difference in this approach is that the plan will be adequately resourced. Yet the total number of U.S. troops in Iraq after the planned increase will be about 153,000, less than the peak of about 165,000 in December 2005. Military experts last night wondered, as one said, how a "thin green line" of 17,500 additional soldiers in Baghdad could affect the security situation in a city where many of the 5 million residents are hostile to the U.S. presence. "Too little, too late -- way too late," said retired Col. Jerry Durrant, who has worked as a trainer of Iraqi forces.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted Bush's push for more troops, according to officials familiar with internal deliberations, but recently gave in to the president's wishes. Bush said last night that top commanders reviewed the new plans to add a total of 21,500 Army and Marine forces in Baghdad and Anbar province and approved of them.

"The 'surge' is actually quite small," said retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, who compared it with the 206,000 additional troops that Gen. William Westmoreland requested in Vietnam in 1968. "In effect, Bush is counting on the Iraqis to pull our bacon out of the fire," Bacevich said, adding that there is no evidence that the Iraqi military and government are capable of doing so.

The plan calls for the Iraqi government to designate one overall commander for all Iraq army and police personnel in Baghdad. The city would be divided into nine sectors, each with an Iraqi commander and with a U.S. Army battalion assigned to it to support the Iraqi forces.

In the short to medium term, the U.S. military increase in Iraq will involve accelerating some troops into Iraq and extending the tours of others, creating an overlap that raises the overall troop level. At least one Army brigade not originally scheduled to rotate into Iraq -- the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division -- has begun moving into Iraq from Kuwait.

Four more Army brigades in the United States that are already part of the planned 2007 Iraq rotation are expected to deploy beginning in February, between two weeks and two months earlier than scheduled. In Iraq, three Army brigades will be extended past their scheduled one-year tours, in one instance for about four months. Meanwhile, a large Marine combat unit now in Anbar province will have its tour of duty extended.

In the longer term, sustaining elevated troop levels will probably require remobilization of Army National Guard and Army Reserve units. Senior Army officials said they were concerned that soldiers will have longer tours in the war zone or less time at home to see their families, train and repair equipment. Speeding up deployments also carries risks by curtailing time units have to train and receive equipment.

Bush Rhetoric Hard To Square With Facts (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, January 11, 2007

President Bush promised a diplomatic offensive to win support for Iraq from Middle Eastern countries that, if anything, have become more hostile to U.S. policy in Iraq since Saddam Hussein's execution.

In doses of rhetoric hard to square with facts in the region, Bush portrayed the ordinary people of the Middle East as being behind U.S. goals in Iraq, in his speech to the nation Wednesday night.

And he declared the need to address Iran's and Syria's support for insurgents, without acknowledging his refusal to engage either country diplomatically, as many U.S. allies and the Iraq Study Group proposed.

The war that toppled Saddam Hussein's Sunni-run regime has rekindled the centuries-old divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims through Middle East, suspicions that have grown stronger since Saddam's Dec. 30 execution.

Bush, who often invoked the Iraqi leader and his "evil mind" in the past, ignored him in the speech.

In Saudi Arabia, the religious establishment — rooted in the hard-line Wahhabi stream of Sunni Islam — has stepped up its anti-Shiite rhetoric. Last month, about 30 clerics called on Sunnis around the Middle East to support their brethren in Iraq against Shiites and praised the insurgency.

Despite such vitriol, Bush said that from "Afghanistan to Lebanon to the Palestinian Territories, millions of ordinary people" are asking: "Will America withdraw and yield the future of that country to the extremists or will we stand with the Iraqis who have made the choice for freedom?"

Also in his speech:

_Bush declared "al-Qaida is still active in Iraq" and a failed U.S. mission would give such terrorists a safe haven from which to plot attacks against Americans.

Although few quarrel with that appraisal now, it is also the case that Iraq — contrary to assertions at the time — was not a magnet for al-Qaida before the U.S. invasion.

_Bush proposed $414 million to double the number of U.S. civilian workers who help coordinate local reconstruction projects. These State Department-led units, dubbed Provincial Reconstruction Teams, are to focus on projects both inside and outside Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone. Some will be merged into combat brigades.

He also proposed $400 million in quick-response funds for the teams to do local reconstruction and rebuilding projects.

However, the special inspector general for Iraq said in an October report that continued violence and the lack of security seriously impeded reconstruction. Workers have been prevented from traveling to project sites and the lives of contractors at rebuilding sites are in danger.

The report quoted Iraq's minister of electricity as saying: "Every day I send repair teams, but they can't get to the area; there are too many insurgents ... no one can help."

_The speech also reflected Bush's evolving qualifications about the U.S. commitment to Iraq, not as ironclad now as when he said just over a year ago, "We will stay until the job is done."

The president said in his speech that he made it clear to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders "that America's commitment is not open-ended."

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people — and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

Overall, Bush presented a sobering account of the situation in Iraq, in marked contrast to past statements by the president and his commanders that the U.S. was "on the brink of success," insurgents had been "brought to their knees," and "we have broken the back of the insurgency."

His once-confident challenge to the insurgents — "Bring 'em on" — was replaced by grimmer realism.

Even so, Bush rested much of his case on unknowables — among them whether Iraqi leaders can live up to their pledge to free their forces of the sectarian pressures that have severely limited their effectiveness and made some matters worse.

He declared unequivocally that when U.S. and Iraqi forces sweep insurgents out of Baghdad neighborhoods this time, they won't just rush back in. "This time, we have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," he said.

Promising Troops Where They Aren't Really Wanted (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 10 — As President Bush challenges public opinion at home by committing more American troops, he is confronted by a paradox: an Iraqi government that does not really want them.

The Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has not publicly opposed the American troop increase, but aides to Mr. Maliki have been saying for weeks that the government is wary of the proposal. They fear that an increased American troop presence, particularly in Baghdad, will be accompanied by a more assertive American role that will conflict with the Shiite government's haste to cut back on American authority and run the war the way it wants. American troops, Shiite leaders say, should stay out of Shiite neighborhoods and focus on fighting Sunni insurgents.

"The government believes there is no need for extra troops from the American side," Haidar al-Abadi, a Parliament member and close associate of Mr. Maliki, said Wednesday. "The existing troops can do the job."

It is an opinion that is broadly held among a Shiite political elite that is increasingly impatient, after nearly two years heading the government here, to exercise power without the constraining supervision of the United States. As a long-oppressed majority, the Shiites have a deep-seated fear that the power they won at the polls, after centuries of subjugation by the Sunni minority, could somehow be pried from their fingers once again.

There are misgivings, too, among other Shiite leaders, including some whom Mr. Bush has courted recently in a United States effort to form a bloc of politicians from the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities that can break Mr. Maliki's political dependence on the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who leads the Mahdi Army, the most powerful of the Shiite militias that are at the heart of sectarian violence in Iraq.

Hadi al-Ameri, the leader of the security committee in Parliament and a close associate of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim — a prominent Shiite leader who met with Mr. Bush last month in Washington, and who has quietly supported the American push to reshape the political landscape in Baghdad — was unequivocal in his opposition to a troop increase.

"You can't solve the problem by adding more troops," said Redha Jawad Tahi, another Shiite member of Parliament from Mr. Hakim's party. "The security should be in the hands of the Iraqis. The U.S. should be in a supporting role."

Still, the Iraqis seem to be getting some of the increased authority they have been demanding. The plan Mr. Bush sketched out involved the appointment of an Iraqi commander with overall control of the new security crackdown in Baghdad, and Iraqi officers working under him who would be in charge of military operations in nine newly demarcated districts in the capital. The commanders would sit in a new office of commander in chief directly under the authority of Mr. Maliki. The arrangement could allow Mr. Maliki to circumvent the Ministry of Defense, which is controlled directly by the American military.

The arrangements appeared to suggest that Mr. Maliki could halt any push into Sadr City, the Mahdi Army stronghold that American commanders have been saying for months will have to be swept of extremist militia elements if there is to be any lasting turn toward stability in Baghdad. But Mr. Bush's new plan appeared to have safeguards of its own to prevent sectarian agendas from gaining the upper hand. Bush administration officials said that Americans would be present in the commander in chief's office and that an American Army battalion — 400 to 600 soldiers — would be stationed in each of the nine Baghdad military districts. That means Mr. Maliki will not have complete freedom of movement. In the past, American commanders have been reluctant to hand over operational control to the Iraqis, worried that Iraqi forces will be used as a weapon in a civil war.

Still, Mr. Abadi said that the Iraqis are expecting that the Americans will base themselves on the outskirts of Baghdad and that the Iraqis will take command of the city itself.

"There is a dialogue going on between the prime minister and Bush," he said. "The U.S. agrees that the government must take command."

Shiite suspicions of the American troop increase reflect a tectonic shift in the political realities here. Shiites, the principal victims of Saddam Hussein's repression, had joined with Iraqi Kurds in hailing the American-led invasion in 2003, seeing it as opening their way to power. But once they consolidated their control through two elections in 2005, they began distancing themselves from the Americans, seeing their liberators increasingly as an impediment to the full control they craved.

By contrast, moderate Sunnis, who were deeply alienated by the American occupation at an earlier stage of the war, are now looking to Americans for protection, as Shiite militias have moved into Sunni neighborhoods in a deadly cycle of revenge. On Wednesday, moderate Sunni politicians hailed the idea of more American troops.

The Shiite leaders' frustrations have grown in recent months as American commanders have retained their tight grip in Baghdad. While the Americans have argued for a strategy that places equal emphasis on going after Shiite and Sunni extremists, the Shiite leaders have insisted that the killing is rooted in the Sunni attempt to regain power and that Shiite militias and revenge killings are an inevitable response.

American officials have warned that with lessening American oversight, Shiite leaders might shift to a sectarian strategy that punished Sunni insurgents but spared Shiite militias. The execution 11 days ago of Saddam Hussein, carried out in haste by the Maliki government over American urgings that it be delayed until the legal paperwork was completed, only reinforced such fears. With as many as 17,000 additional American troops in Baghdad, the American force level in the capital will rise above 30,000, and many of those, under the Bush plan, will be in American units that are twinned with Iraqi units, or in expanded teams of military advisers that are embedded with the Iraqis, down to the company level.

American generals have acknowledged that the twinning of American and Iraqi units, and the rapid increase in the number of American advisers, will serve the dual purpose of stiffening Iraqi combat performance and providing American commanders with early warning of any Iraqi operations that run counter to American objectives. In effect, the advisers will serve as canaries in Mr. Maliki's mine, ensuring the American command will get early notice if Iraqi operations threaten to abandon the equal pursuit of Sunni and Shiite extremists in favor of a more sectarian emphasis. Some Iraqi politicians have expressed bitter opposition to the expansion of the advisory teams, saying they will amount to "spies" at the heart of Iraq's war.

But if that appeared to set the stage for future tensions between the Americans and the Iraqis, there was much else in the Bush plan that appeared to have been fashioned to avoid an early confrontation with the Maliki government. While the plan set out political benchmarks, it appeared to lack any timelines to force compliance on Mr. Maliki, who has shown in the past months that his willingness to pledge action on issues urged on him by the Americans is more than matched by his resourcefulness in finding ways to defer steps that might incur resistance among Shiite religious groups.

The wish list set out by White House officials was the same as the one the Americans laid down in May, when Mr. Maliki took office: an oil law that promises a fair distribution of future oil revenues between the Shiite and Kurdish populations that sit atop most of Iraq's oil wealth, and the Sunnis whose heartland is mostly bereft of proven oil reserves; constitutional revisions that will assuage Sunni complaints that their interests were swept aside when Shiite and Kurdish voters approved the charter 15 months ago over Sunni objections; a new de-Baathification law that will sweep aside the barrier that thousands of Sunnis have found in seeking government jobs; and, most important, a militia law that will lay the groundwork for disarming and demobilizing armed groups like Mr. Sadr's that challenge the government's monopoly on armed force.

Hard-line Shiite politicians have been saying with growing vehemence that these American goals amount to an attempt to deprive them of the victory they won at the polls, and that instead of placating Sunnis, a minority of about 20 percent in Iraq's population of 27 million, the United States should stand aside and "allow the minority to lose." For Americans, whose best road home lies in drawing the Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds together, it amounts to a collision with the hard history of Iraq.

Only time will tell whether Mr. Maliki and his associates, with the trends in the war running against them, will take the "breathing space" that White House officials said the American troop reinforcements will give them to decide, at last, that history is theirs to command.

Bush Troubled by Video of Hanging

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — President Bush told a private gathering of television news anchors and hosts on Wednesday that he was deeply troubled by the handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein.

"I asked the president if he had seen the execution video of Saddam Hussein," Brian Williams, the NBC News anchor, said on the "Nightly News." "He indicated that he had and said in his view the way it was handled ranked just below the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in terms of mistakes made thus far in the war."

A grainy unauthorized recording of the execution showed some of the guards in the room taunting Mr. Hussein moments before his hanging.

In Iraq on Wednesday, The Associated Press reported that Mr. Maliki has named Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, an Iraqi general who was taken prisoner of war by American forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf war, as the overall commander of his troops.

General Gambar, a Shiite, will have two assistants, one from the police and one from the army, Iraqi military officers said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information. General Gambar will report directly to Mr. Maliki, The AP reported.

At least 91 people were killed or found dead in Iraq on Wednesday, [a news agency] reported.

A day after Iraqis and Americans battled insurgents in downtown Baghdad, the area was quiet and empty on Wednesday. The American military said it had detained 21 Iraqis in two raids there.

Bid To Secure Baghdad Relies On Troops And Iraqi Leaders (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — With his new plan to secure Iraq, President Bush is in effect betting that Iraqi leaders are committed to building a multisectarian state, and his strategy will stand or fall on that assumption.

The plan differs in several respects from the faltering effort to bring stability to Baghdad that began last summer. It calls for a much larger American force. There are to be no safe havens for renegade militias. And, importantly, Iraqi security forces throughout the city are to be put under the direct control of a new Iraqi commander — and backed by American Army battalions.

But the new plan depends on the good intentions and competence of a Shiite-dominated Iraqi government that has not demonstrated an abundant supply of either.

"Everybody raises a question about the intentions and capabilities of this government," a senior American official said, referring to the Iraqi government. "Is this a government that really is a unity government or is it in fact pursuing, either explicitly or implicitly, a Shia hegemony agenda?"

It was just in August that the Bush administration hailed the advent of "Operation Together Forward II," a plan that was intended to provide security to Baghdad's violence-ridden neighborhoods but did not stop the rise in sectarian violence.

Based on the assumption that the establishment of security in Baghdad was a bedrock condition for the broader push to stabilize the country, that plan called for American and Iraqi forces to clear contested neighborhoods in the capital, which would then be held with Iraqi police. That was to be followed to an energetic effort to fix sewage lines and generally rebuild neighborhoods, an effort intended to win public support and help remedy Iraq's chronically high unemployment.

That plan was backed by only modest resources from the start.

With an increase of only 7,000 American troops, the number of Americans participating in the operation was only about 15,000. The Iraqis sent only two of the six battalions that they had promised as reinforcements, bringing the number of Iraqi soldiers involved to 9,600. Some 30,000 Iraqi policemen were to help secure Iraqi neighborhoods, but many police units were infiltrated by the Shiite militias they were supposed to control or ineffectual. Much of the reconstruction that was to have been carried out by the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government was never undertaken or was directed away from Sunni areas.

The failure of the old plan led to a new strategy. Instead of emphasizing the turning over of security responsibilities to the Iraqi forces as quickly as possible so American troops could begin to withdraw, a new priority was to be put on protecting the Iraqi population.

The new strategy required more American forces, and the generals offered different recommendations as to how large the American troop reinforcement should be.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the leader of the United States Central Command, who have long argued that sending too many troops would put off the day when the Iraqis would take responsibility for their own security, initially recommended a more modest approach. According to a senior administration official, they recommended that two additional American combat brigades be sent to Baghdad. A third would be held in reserve in Kuwait and two more would be on call in the United States.

But Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, whom Mr. Bush has selected to replace General Casey, wanted to ensure that he had enough troops to carry out what by all accounts will be an extremely challenging mission. He sought a commitment that all five combat brigades would be sent.

Mr. Bush opted for the larger commitment. Five brigades are to be sent to improve security in the greater Baghdad area — an increase of about 17,500 troops that will more than double the American force involved in security operations there.

Beyond the capital, about 4,000 additional marines have been earmarked for Anbar, the volatile province in western Iraq that is the base for many Sunni insurgents. American and Sunni Arab forces are essentially locked in a stalemate there, and some officers have long complained that the effort in the west is under strength. This relatively modest reinforcement is intended to buttress the Americans' ability to interrupt insurgent supply lines from Syria and to make it harder for the insurgents to concentrate their efforts on Baghdad.

Critics of the troop-increase plan have complained that 17,500 more soldiers are too few to control a capital of six million people. Supporters say that by concentrating these soldiers in crucial neighborhoods, along with the 15,000 American troops already involved in the operation, the reinforcement can be effective.

An unknown variable is the performance of the Iraqis. The Iraqis are to reinforce Baghdad with three more Iraqi Army brigades, bringing the total number of Iraqi brigades in the city to nine — or 20,000 troops if the units are at full strength.

The Iraqi brigades, along with Iraqi National Police units and regular Iraqi police units, will be deployed in nine sectors of Baghdad, each under an Iraqi commander. In an innovation, an American battalion will be assigned to each sector, a way to stiffen the Iraqi forces and monitor them should some harbor sectarian agendas.

In carrying out the old operation, Americans conducted patrols from large American bases in and around the city. This time, according to Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking American command in Iraq, some American troops will remain in contested areas "24/7" to deter death squads and insurgents from infiltrating the sectors once the neighborhoods have been cleared.

In explaining the genesis of the new strategy, administration officials described its formation as essentially the product of a process of elimination. Other options were discarded until the White House was left with what it considered to be the least bad choice in a difficult situation.

Strikingly, Mr. Bush in his speech did not exclude the risk of failure. After listing all the reasons why the new plan has a better chance of succeeding than the old one, Mr. Bush stressed that he had informed Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki that the United States commitment to the new operation was not open-ended.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lost the support of the American people," Mr. Bush said. "Now is the time to act."

Bush's Iraq Plan Faces Obstacles On Two Fronts (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Greg Jaffe And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The success of President Bush's controversial strategy for stabilizing Iraq depends on the cooperation of an Iraqi government paralyzed by sectarian tensions and a Democratic Congress that appears increasingly eager to challenge the administration's handling of the war.

In a prime-time speech to a nation wearied by the violence in Iraq, Mr. Bush acknowledged a litany of American failures and announced plans to send at least 20,000 new U.S. military personnel to Baghdad and the restive Anbar province. White House officials said the first brigade of additional forces would arrive in Iraq later this month, with the remainder of the forces streaming into the country over the next four or five months.

The additional troops are the centerpiece of a broad administration push to retool the military, economic, and political aspects of its Iraq strategy -- and to find a way of staunching the continued decline in American support for the war. In addition to the extra troops, administration officials said they would ask Congress for more than $1 billion in new funding for programs designed to boost reconstruction, economic growth and job creation in Iraq, including $350 million to expand a program that gives military commanders money they can use on small-scale development projects in the areas they patrol.

Speaking from the White House library, Mr. Bush used unusually pessimistic language to describe the situation in Iraq and conceded mistakes in prior strategies in the war, saying: "The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me," Mr. Bush said.

The president said that earlier efforts to secure Baghdad had failed because there weren't enough U.S. military personnel to hold neighborhoods after they had been cleared of insurgents, and because the Iraqi government prevented American personnel from conducting operations in the Shiite districts that house the militias responsible for most of the current violence. The new surge strategy, by contrast, would ensure that "we will have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," and enter Shiite areas of the city, Mr. Bush said.

Still, the administration's ability to control events on the ground in Iraq is rapidly diminishing, and it's far from clear that the strategy will find enough support in either Baghdad or Washington to have much chance of success.

Mr. Maliki has long opposed the deployment of additional U.S. forces to Iraq, and his government crippled earlier U.S. efforts to stabilize Baghdad by failing to deliver the Iraqi security forces it had promised and by refusing to allow a crackdown on the Shiite militias responsible for much of Iraq's current violence.

The surge plan also comes amid increasingly hostile sentiment toward the White House's Iraq strategy on Capitol Hill among both Democrats and Republicans -- and amid signs that the newly Democratic Congress is testing how far it can go in influencing the White House's handling of the war going forward.

Democrats now hope to capitalize on the mounting displeasure among lawmakers of both parties by putting forward nonbinding resolutions in the House and Senate opposing the troop increase, starting as soon as Thursday. Their strategy involves persuading more Republicans to go on record opposing the White House plan, as a way of gauging the depths of opposition to the war plan. Even before Mr. Bush spoke Wednesday night, conservative Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, eyeing a 2008 presidential bid, said he was opposed to sending more troops to Iraq, while Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska derided the move as "a dangerously wrong-headed strategy that will drive America deeper into an unwinnable swamp."

Beyond rhetorical opposition to Mr. Bush's strategy, Democrats may test in coming weeks whether to use Congress's power of the purse to impede the troop increase.

White House officials previewing Mr. Bush's speech acknowledged that its success depended on a new level of cooperation of Mr. Maliki and his government, and said that the administration had received firm Iraqi commitments to deploy significant numbers of Iraqi security personnel to the new push to secure Baghdad and -- more crucially -- to allow American and Iraqi forces to confront forces loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

One of the most noteworthy aspects of the new strategy deals with Iraqi, rather than American, troops. A senior White House official said Mr. Maliki had pledged to send three additional Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad in a broad restructuring of security operations in the city. Individual Iraqi officers -- instead of U.S. generals -- will be given responsibility for each of Baghdad's nine districts, and will answer to a single Iraqi commander who will have command authority over the capital.

A senior Bush administration official described the new push to bring order to Baghdad as Iraqi-planned and Iraqi-led, with American troops in support roles. To assist the Iraqis, the U.S. will increase the number of embedded U.S. advisors that live and fight with Iraqi soldiers.

Mr. Maliki has made similar promises in the past, however, only to renege on those deals when the fighting started and pressure from Shiite militia leaders grew to curb the offensives. Mr. Maliki owes his position as prime minister to Mr. Sadr, who remains his strongest political patron.

Senior U.S. military officials, who remain skeptical about the Iraqi Army's abilities and Mr. Maliki's will to take tough stands, downplayed the Bush administration's suggestions that Iraqi forces would be in the lead initially. Instead, they suggested U.S. troops would take the more prominent role until the situation was stable enough for Iraqi troops to move to the front. "We first have to set the conditions for an Iraqi-led defense of Baghdad to work," said one senior military official involved in planning the operation.

The first two attempts to stabilize Baghdad this summer and fall were plagued by the uneven performance of Iraqi forces, sectarian agendas and a shortage of both U.S. and Iraqi troops, military officials said. The Bush administration hopes the troop influx will remedy those shortfalls. But the surge of about 20,000 more soldiers -- all the overstretched U.S. military can provide – is far less than what most proponents of a "surge" have called for. Hawks like Sen. John McCain and Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, have called for a minimum of 30,000-35,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad.

White House officials said another big element of the new plan is a greater U.S. demand for accountability on the part of the Iraqis. They said that Mr. Bush had made clear to the Iraqi leader that the U.S. commitment to Iraq wasn't open-ended.

But the officials acknowledged that Mr. Bush hadn't threatened specific consequences -- such as a reduction in U.S. military and economic assistance, or a withdrawal of U.S. forces -- if Mr. Maliki again failed to meet his commitments to provide additional Iraqi forces or to permit a crackdown on Shiite fighters.

"When you're trying to empower a government, you don't talk to them in those terms -- 'You must do this, or else,' " a senior administration official said.

On Capitol Hill, doubts about Mr. Maliki's capabilities and intentions are fueling growing opposition to the administration's new Iraq strategy -- and triggering talk of legislative maneuvers, like trying to restrict Mr. Bush's ability to send more troops to Iraq, which would have been unthinkable even a few weeks ago.

The Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, Rep. Pelosi and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, both back the idea of a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop increase. Others want to go farther. Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts introduced a bill earlier this week that would prohibit any additional troops from being sent to Iraq unless explicitly approved by Congress. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), a military veteran who chairs the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, recently introduced a similar measure outlining options that would restrict any troop escalation if it meant reducing readiness at home or extending the tours of troops now in the war zone.

One possible financial pressure point could come as soon as next month, when a stopgap spending bill that has been funding most of the government since October due to expire in mid-February. That is a powerful political tool for Democratic critics of Mr. Bush's policy. Failure to extend the stopgap funding could shut down many agencies -- making any amendment risky. But by the same token, if an Iraq amendment or funding limitation were attached by Congress, the president couldn't simply brush it aside.

Many Democrats are loath to take steps that would portray the party as undermining the troops in Iraq. But measures could gain more support in coming weeks -- especially if proponents succeed in making the point that by opposing additional troops, they are not undermining those already in Iraq.

Balancing concerns about seeming to oppose the military, Democrats run some risk within their own ranks if they are seen as being too pliant toward Mr. Bush in the weeks ahead -- especially after having won control of Congress partly because of the public's antiwar sentiment. A significant chunk of vocal Democratic voters think the U.S. should begin an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, but Democratic leaders have begun to shy away from that plank. Some of the louder liberal groups, such as MoveOn.org, plan to hold a series of rallies in coming days to protest the president's plan and to demand that Congress oppose it.

Indeed, Democratic opposition to the administration's handling of Iraq war is growing markedly across the party, with some of the most conservative Democratic leaders joining some of the most liberal ones in not only opposing the troop increase but also calling for the beginnings of a military withdrawal from Iraq.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who has staked out an array of liberal positions as he campaigns of the 2008 presidential nomination, has strongly condemned the surge proposal in recent days and instead argued for sharp troop reductions.

Wednesday, he was joined by one of the more conservative members of the new Democratic congressional majority, former Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, who said that the "bottom line is that the way forward is not to add more troops, but to set a deliberate timetable for re-deployment from Iraq -- at least by the end of this year -- to serve as a catalyst for the Iraqis to accept responsibility for their country."

Bush's New Plan For Iraq Echoes Key Parts Of Earlier Memo (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's new Iraq policy was said to be the product of weeks of meetings, discussions and analysis by the president and his national security advisers. Yet core elements of the plan were contained in a classified memo that national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley sent to members of Bush's Cabinet on Nov. 8 -- a month before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issued its report.

Most news accounts about the Hadley memo, which was published by the New York Times in late November, focused on his critique of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. But the 1,800-word document was composed mostly of recommendations for Bush on how to bolster Maliki and improve the security environment.

One key recommendation: filling "the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad with coalition forces if reliable Iraqi forces are not identified." A brigade contains 3,000 to 5,000 troops, so the Hadley memo contemplated roughly 16,000 additional troops.

The president announced yesterday that he would send five additional brigades to Baghdad. An aide said that would total 17,500 troops.

In rebutting criticism that the administration ignored most of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, a senior administration official pointed yesterday to the fact that the White House accepted its suggestion to embed additional U.S. forces with Iraqi troops. Now, they will go all the way down to the company level.

But the Hadley memo explicitly urged such a step. "If we expect him to adopt a nonsectarian security agenda," he wrote of Maliki, "we must ensure he has reasonably nonsectarian security institutions to execute it -- such as through a more robust embedding program."

Hadley also called for an "intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S. action."

As part of the new plan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East tomorrow, stopping in Riyadh, to enlist greater Arab support for the Iraqi government -- and to try to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian talks, a key concern of Saudi leaders.

Much of the memo focused on how to help Maliki "form a new political base among moderate politicians," allowing him to free his government from the sway of radical Shiite elements. The United States "would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc," Hadley wrote.

Under the new plan, the Iraqi government is supposed to allow a "moderate coalition" to emerge as its new political center.

Hadley also described steps that Maliki could make to "demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities," such as "shake up his cabinet by appointing nonsectarian, capable technocrats."

This happens to be another key goal of the new plan. The White House said yesterday that the Iraqi government made a commitment to "reform its cabinet to provide even-handed service delivery."

A White House official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, acknowledged that "many of the ideas in the Hadley memo are in the strategy."

But he said that "when we say the strategy is new, we mean we -- us and the Iraqis -- weren't doing it before, say, November 7. We don't mean no one thought of it before that date."

Bush, Allies At Odds On Iraq (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Norm Coleman, the Minnesota Republican, would rather not be in the position of publicly disagreeing with President Bush.

But when it comes to Iraq, Republican lawmakers on Capitol Hill are breaking away, leaving Bush to lay out his new plan without the usually reliable array of GOP support.

"I don't want to embarrass the president, but my position is clear," said Coleman, who visited Iraq last month. "I do not believe that a surge in troops is going to solve the fundamental problem we have."

Coleman and other Republicans are becoming increasingly public with their view that the ongoing violence in Baghdad requires a political solution, not a military one. "Iraqis have to decide they're going to stop killing themselves," he said.

That Democrats are aggressively opposing Bush's plan to boost the number of troops in Iraq is hardly surprising. The midterm elections that brought them to power this year turned, in large part, on voters' dissatisfaction with the war.

Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate say they are talking to their Republican colleagues, hoping to persuade many of them to support a non-binding resolution that would express disapproval about escalating the war.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Wednesday that while those conversations are taking place, Republicans are arriving at their opinions independent of Democratic persuasion.

"I think you're seeing the Republicans respond to what is the overwhelming sentiment of the country, and to what is the reality of the military's observation that the proposals will not work," Hoyer said.

Sen. Dick Durbin, the assistant Senate majority leader from Illinois, said in an interview there is no question that Democrats could pass some sort of resolution expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq and with Bush's handling of that war.

"But many of us believe the most effective message from Capitol Hill is a bipartisan message," said Durbin, who later gave the official Democratic response to Bush's speech. "If the president believes support from his own party at risk, he may have second thoughts." Many Republicans say they have formed their opinions from traveling to Iraq and the surrounding region and talking to military officials there.

"Based on the trip I took to Iraq last month, I concluded it would be a mistake to increase the overall level of troops in Iraq," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine).

Collins said she shared her opinion with Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert Gates that a political solution is required to address the civil unrest, not a boost in troops.

So did Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who delivered a lengthy speech on the Senate floor in December, outlining his increasing frustration with the war. He has told the president that he opposed a so-called "surge" in troops.

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) was similarly unimpressed with the idea of putting more troops at risk, describing her view as "deep skepticism."

Also not persuaded is Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"At this point I am skeptical that a surge in troops alone will bring an end to sectarian violence and the insurgency that is fomenting instability in Iraq," Voinovich said. "The generals who have served there do not believe additional troops alone will help. And my faith in Prime Minister [Nouri] al-Maliki's political will to make the hard choices necessary to bring about a political solution is fragile at best."

Like many of his colleagues, Voinovich said he wants to see a political solution between Sunni Arabs and Shiite militias.

"And I want real evidence that a potential surge in troops will do more good than harm and will not exacerbate the existing violence in Iraq," he added.

Lawmakers who are typically supportive of the president's policies gave themselves some distance in the hours before Bush's address Wednesday.

"I'm open to the president's plan, but I need to learn a whole lot more of the details," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.).

His constituents have grown weary of the war, he explained. "I don't know anyone who's not," he said. "It doesn't mean we shouldn't or can't go forward, but it makes it a lot more difficult."

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, has expressed his own reservations, but urged his colleagues to spend some time mulling Bush's proposal in the coming days.

"What he says merits thoughtful consideration by the Senate," Warner said.

Still, Warner is unhappy with the strife dominating Iraq, something he has witnessed firsthand.

"Young men and women in uniform should not be caught in the crossfire of a civil war started with who should have succeeded Muhammad in 650 A.D.," he said.

Bush Accepts Responsibility For 'mistakes' (USAT)

By David Jackson

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Wednesday that he will raise U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 to try to break "the current cycle of violence" there, and he conceded for the first time that he has not sent enough military forces.

Although Bush warned of more bloodshed, he said benefits will be seen over time. "If we increase our support at this crucial moment … we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

ON DEADLINE: Share your thoughts on Bush speech

Bush's plan includes $5.6 billion for the troop increase and more than $1 billion in new economic aid for Iraq. It also calls for better performance by the Iraqi government to control its own security.

The president said previous plans failed because there were not enough U.S. and Iraqi troops to protect Iraqi neighborhoods and to contain violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people, and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

Democrats and some Republicans criticized the plan even before Bush addressed the nation from the White House library.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., new chairman of the House panel overseeing Pentagon spending, said Bush will have to make a strong case to justify more money for troops. "We really have an ability to stop this thing," said Murtha, a Vietnam veteran. "Not today, but later on."

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said committing more troops is the wrong answer. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution," he said.

Bush stressed that the goal of his revised plan will be to train Iraqi forces so they can control their country's security by November. He said his troop commitment "is not open-ended."

Bush described the consequences of failure for Iraq and the United States: radical Islamic extremists growing in strength in the Middle East, and terror rising throughout the world.

The president said he had sent another carrier strike group to the Middle East, and he warned Iran and Syria against aiding Iraqi insurgents. He said the United States will "interrupt the flow of support" from Iraq's neighbors.

In Iraq, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has told Shiite militiamen, including supporters of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, to surrender their arms or face an assault by U.S. and Iraqi forces, the Associated Press reported. The AP quoted an unnamed Shiite legislator who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for al-Maliki.

Bush said he told al-Maliki and his aides that they risk losing the support of Americans and Iraqis if they do not improve security. "A democratic Iraq will not be perfect, but it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them," the president said.

There are now 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. The retooled plan calls for 17,500 troops to be committed over the next several months to Baghdad, site of most of the sectarian violence. That would more than double the 15,000 troops now there. An additional 4,000 Marines are headed to Anbar province in western Iraq, which the administration says is a base for al-Qaeda terrorists.

Bush said the new money for reconstruction and jobs programs would help Iraqis see "that military operations are accompanied by visible improvements in their neighborhoods."

Bush Vows Surge To Fix 'Mistake' (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

President Bush last night conceded that he made a mistake by failing to increase troops in Iraq last year and committed to boosting more than 21,000 troops, setting up a battle with the congressional Democrats, who vowed to fight the new war strategy.

In rejecting the Iraq Study Group's call to withdraw most combat troops within 15 months, the president will push the U.S. military presence in Iraq to its highest level in more than a year.

His plan, revealed last night in a prime-time address to the nation, came with no timetable, and senior administration officials said yesterday that the so-called "surge" in troops has no set end.

But the president said the U.S. commitment to help Iraqis secure the war-torn nation is finite. In the 20-minute speech, the president demanded swift action by the fledgling government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has refused to crack down on the Shi'ite militias responsible for the recent spike in sectarian violence.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended. If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act. The prime minister understands this," he said.

The new strategy will increase U.S. troops in Iraq to about 153,500 at an extra cost of $5.6 billion through the rest of this fiscal year.

The first of five brigades will arrive by Monday; the next, a month later, with the rest coming in monthly increments. The bulk of the "new" troops will be soldiers and Marines already scheduled to go to Iraq, but whose deployments will be extended.

Although he has previously acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, Mr. Bush yesterday said he was wrong both in his decision-making and in his assumptions.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. "The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me."

But by pushing for an escalation, Mr. Bush runs smack into Democrats, the new majority party in Congress, who say they reflect American voters' desire to begin bringing troops back home.

"This is the third time we are going down this path. Two times this has not worked," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. "Why are they doing this now? That question remains."

The president called top Democrats and Republicans to the White House hours before yesterday's speech to brief them. The late hour drew scorn from Democrats, who said that didn't fit with Mr. Bush's postelection promise to consult them more.

"The president's practicing his speech right now," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "We had a conversation today that has no impact on what he's going to say."

Congress' four top Democrats -- Mrs. Pelosi, Mr. Reid, Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland -- issued a joint statement after the speech, saying that the proposal "endangers our national security by placing additional burdens on our already overextended military" and discourages the Iraqi government from taking "the necessary steps to achieve a political resolution to the sectarian problems."

Some Republican lawmakers said they also are skeptical that a surge in troops can achieve much.

"The generals who have served there do not believe additional troops alone will help," said Sen George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, who said he also lacks faith in Mr. al-Maliki "to make the hard choices necessary to bring about a political solution."

But Mr. Bush said that fighting in Iraq makes the United States safer and that his plan will bring the troops home faster.

"If we increase our support at this crucial moment and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home," he said.

The president promised lawmakers that if they "have improvements that can be made, we will make them," and took the suggestion of Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, to form a new bipartisan working group to improve relations between the administration and Congress on the war on terror.

But he also challenged critics to prove how their alternatives would "be more likely to succeed."

The new strategy sets up a fierce conflict on Capitol Hill, one that could create a constitutional issue over presidential war powers.

Some Democrats, led by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, want to rescind the resolution authorizing the president to use force in Iraq. But Democratic leaders prefer a less bruising strategy, calling for a nonbinding resolution that would signal Congress' opposition to the surge in troops.

The president said that despite two previous shifts in strategy that failed, his new plan takes into account the source of the violence, and sets "benchmarks" for Iraqis to meet.

Iraqis will take the lead in battling sectarian violence as Americans step back into a support role, and the young government will deploy three additional Iraqi army brigades -- up to 12,000 soldiers -- in and around Baghdad, where the administration says 80 percent of the violence occurs.

"Only the Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people. And their government has put forward an aggressive plan to do it," he said.

After nearly four years of war, the president redefined what victory in Iraq will look like.

"Victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved. There will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship," he said, alluding to the end of World War II. "A democratic Iraq will not be perfect. But it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them -- and it will help bring a future of peace and security for our children and grandchildren."

But he also was grim about the coming year in Iraq, which he predicted would be "bloody and violent" and bring "more Iraqi and American casualties."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a proponent of increasing U.S. forces, agreed with that forecast: "Is it going to be a strain on the military? Absolutely. Casualties are going to go up."

DOJ_NMG_0115191

The president's speech also was uncharacteristically equivocal when he sought to assure Americans that his plan will work.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will," he said.

In documents supporting the speech, the White House said Mr. Bush had assumed that other governments would back Iraq's new leaders. But Iraq's neighbors "remain wary of throwing their full support" behind Mr. al-Maliki's government. And the White House acknowledged that the U.S.-led coalition has lost the confidence of the Iraqi people, who are "increasingly disillusioned."

Mr. Bush's plans call for more than 17,000 U.S. soldiers to be deployed to Baghdad to handle sectarian violence. Also, 4,000 Marines will be sent to the Anbar province, where al Qaeda is the problem. In addition, the president said he has "recently ordered the deployment of an additional carrier strike group to the region."

He said he was accepting the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to embed U.S. troops with Iraqi units to help with on-the-job training.

But he didn't accept the panel's suggestion that the U.S. begin direct talks with Iran and Syria and pledged instead to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria," which he said is aiding attacks on U.S. troops.

He also acknowledged the failures of several previous efforts to secure Baghdad but explained why he thought this effort would be different.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents," the president said. "And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have."

He said American commanders have reviewed the Iraqi plan "to ensure that it addressed these mistakes."

"This time, we will have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," he said, adding that Mr. al-Maliki has promised to give his commanders enough authority, including going after sectarian militias.

Right now, Iraq's military is in control in three of the nation's provinces, but Mr. Bush said the government has committed to taking control in all 18 provinces by November.

The president said the new plan relies on a strategy the Iraqis drew up themselves and presented to the president when he met Mr. al-Maliki in Jordan after Thanksgiving.

The speech drew about 50 protesters, who chanted outside the White House: "Stop the war" and held up signs dismissing the speech as "words of mass deception."

The Real Disaster (NYT)

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

President Bush told Americans last night that failure in Iraq would be a disaster. The disaster is Mr. Bush's war, and he has already failed. Last night was his chance to stop offering more fog and be honest with the nation, and he did not take it.

Americans needed to hear a clear plan to extricate United States troops from the disaster that Mr. Bush created. What they got was more gauzy talk of victory in the war on terrorism and of creating a "young democracy" in Iraq. In other words, a way for this president to run out the clock and leave his mess for the next one.

Mr. Bush did acknowledge that some of his previous tactics had failed. But even then, the president sounded as if he were an accidental tourist in Iraq. He described the failure of last year's effort to pacify Baghdad as if the White House and the Pentagon bore no responsibility.

In any case, Mr. Bush's excuses were tragically inadequate. The nation needs an eyes-wide-open recognition that the only goal left is to get the U.S. military out of this civil war in a way that could minimize the slaughter of Iraqis and reduce the chances that the chaos Mr. Bush unleashed will engulf Iraq's neighbors.

What it certainly did not need were more of Mr. Bush's open-ended threats to Iran and Syria.

Before Mr. Bush spoke, Americans knew he planned to send more troops to pacify lawless Baghdad. Mr. Bush's task was to justify that escalation by acknowledging that there was no military solution to this war and outlining the political mission that the military would be serving. We were waiting for him to detail the specific milestones that he would set for the Iraqis, set clear timelines for when they would be expected to meet them, and explain what he intended to do if they again failed.

Instead, he said he had warned the Iraqis that if they didn't come through, they would lose the faith of the American people. Has Mr. Bush really not noticed that the American people long ago lost faith in the Iraqi government — and in him as well? Americans know that this Iraqi government is captive to Shiite militias, with no interest in the unity, reconciliation and democracy that Mr. Bush says he wants.

Mr. Bush said yet again that he wanted the Iraqi government to step up to the task of providing its security, and that Iraq needed a law on the fair distribution of oil money. Iraq's government needs to do a lot more than that, starting with disarming the sectarian militias that are feeding the civil war and purging the police forces that too often are really death squads. It needs to offer amnesty to insurgents and militia fighters willing to put down their weapons. It needs to do those things immediately.

Iraq's Shiite-dominated government has heard this list before. But so long as Mr. Bush is willing to back that failed government indefinitely — enabling is the psychological term — Iraq's leaders will have no reason to move against the militias and more fairly share power with the Sunni minority.

Mr. Bush did announce his plan for 20,000 more troops, and the White House trumpeted a $1 billion contribution to reconstruction efforts. Congress will debate these as if they are the real issues. But they are not. Talk of a "surge" ignores the other 132,000 American troops trapped by a failed strategy.

We have argued that the United States has a moral obligation to stay in Iraq as long as there is a chance to mitigate the damage that a quick withdrawal might cause. We have called for an effort to secure Baghdad, but as part of the sort of comprehensive political solution utterly lacking in Mr. Bush's speech. This war has reached the point that merely prolonging it could make a bad ending even worse. Without a real plan to bring it to a close, there is no point in talking about jobs programs and military offensives. There is nothing ahead but even greater disaster in Iraq.

Mr. Bush's Strategy (WP)

PRESIDENT BUSH is right to recognize that U.S strategy in Iraq is not working and to seek a different policy. He is right to insist that the United States cannot afford to abandon the mission and to reject calls for an early withdrawal. But the new plan for the war Mr. Bush outlined last night is very risky. It envisions new missions and dangers for U.S. troops and counts on unprecedented military and political steps by the Iraqi government. The plan is likely to cause a spike in U.S. casualties, while the chances that it will stabilize Iraq are far lower. Moreover, Mr. Bush appears prepared to embrace this approach despite strong opposition from Congress and the public -- setting up a conflict that in itself could hurt the war effort.

The president could have adopted a course that would have attracted broad support domestically and from Iraqis. That was the strategy -- outlined with small variations by U.S. military commanders, the Iraqi government and the Iraq Study Group -- that called for an acceleration of training of the Iraqi army and a gradual handing over of responsibility for fighting insurgents. The U.S. military presence would have decreased in the coming year, but enough troops would have remained to prevent the government's collapse, strike al-Qaeda and prevent intervention by Iraq's neighbors.

Instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to increase the number of Army troops and Marines and to broaden their mission. U.S. forces will be asked to pacify Baghdad in conjunction with Iraqi army and police units. Two attempts last year to stop sectarian war in the capital failed; the president says this effort will be different because more U.S. and Iraqi troops will be involved and because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has promised to prevent "political and sectarian interference." If the plan proceeds, we hope U.S. forces succeed without heavy casualties. But even if they do, the victory will be temporary. U.S. forces cannot sustain the planned "surge" for long, and Baghdad will not be truly pacified until Iraqis can enforce the peace.

The administration hopes that in the window of security opened by U.S. troops, economic reconstruction will resume and political leaders will reach the accords necessary to end sectarian warfare. Much is expected of the Iraqis in the coming months: First, the government will have to deliver promised army units to the capital and send them into action, including against Shiite militias; then it will have to work out deals on sharing Iraq's oil revenue, rehabilitating former members of the Baath Party and reshaping the constitution. It will have to hold local elections and begin delivering services to all parts of the country.

Mr. Bush decided against the consensus strategy favored by the Iraq Study Group because he believed it would not prevent sectarian war from escalating. That may be right. But the president's policy poses a different danger: that Iraqi troops and Iraqi leaders won't deliver on the steps expected of them during what must be a relatively short time, even as American soldiers fight to secure Baghdad -- and, almost certainly, die in larger numbers than before. It also means launching a mission that -- until now, at least -- has not had the domestic support that should accompany the commitment of troops to battle.

If the United States is not to abandon Iraq to its enemies, the U.S. mission needs to be sustainable, in both military and political terms, over the years it may take Iraqis to stabilize their country. Mr. Bush is betting that a boost in U.S. troops and aid can accelerate that process. If he is wrong, a continued American presence in Iraq may become untenable. The president must do more to persuade the country that the sacrifice he is asking of American soldiers is necessary. And if Iraqis do not deliver on their own commitments in the coming weeks, he must reconsider his strategy -- and suspend the U.S. reinforcements.

The Last Way Forward (LAT)

Bush's speech, like his strategy, was unsatisfying. But there are no good options left for the U.S. in Iraq.

PRESIDENT BUSH'S latest plan for Iraq has the feel of an overdue high school book report. It looks nice, reads well and is persuasive in parts. If only he had handed it in on time.

The "new way forward" outlined by the president in a prime-time address Wednesday makes too many obvious points (Iraqis must have more of a stake in their nation's success) and includes too many tired tropes (the war in Iraq is a central front in the war against terrorism). But the core of Bush's speech — the reason to maintain at least some flicker of hope — was an absolute-final-we're-really-serious-this-time ultimatum to the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Represent all Iraqis, Bush said, and do not prevent U.S. and Iraqi troops from cracking down on Shiite militias, or face U.S. disengagement. The test of this strategy will be whether Maliki, who owes his position to Shiite support, understands that the U.S. will not take sides in an Iraqi civil war — and whether Bush means it when he says his commitment is not open-ended.

The president said he will order an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, to be deployed mostly in Baghdad, and their goal will be to help Iraqi forces make the city safe. This is hardly new. Just last summer, to much fanfare, Maliki announced something called Operation Together Forward to provide security to "all neighborhoods of Baghdad." That effort failed miserably because Iraqi forces too often abandoned their posts or contributed to the sectarian violence instead of preventing it. Just last month, Bush's own national security advisor questioned Maliki's commitment to the rule of law and his ability to enforce it.

To his credit, Bush acknowledged this. "Many listening tonight will ask why this effort will succeed when previous operations to secure Baghdad did not," he said. "Here are the differences. In earlier operations, Iraqi and American forces cleared many neighborhoods of terrorists and insurgents, but when our forces moved on to other targets, the killers returned. This time, we'll have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared. In earlier operations, political and sectarian interference prevented Iraqi and American forces from going into neighborhoods that are home to those fueling the sectarian violence. This time, Iraqi and American forces will have a green light to enter those neighborhoods — and Prime Minister Maliki has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated."

Bush said he told Maliki that "America's commitment is not open-ended." He continued: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people — and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

It is unlikely that the additional troops will be enough to make a difference, or that Maliki will honor his latest pledge. But America, and Iraq, will know in a matter of months whether U.S. troops can operate freely and whether Maliki's government is worth defending.

It would have been nice to have this answer months ago, and Bush deserves the blame for not demanding it sooner. At least he is finally making that demand. For his sake, and for the hundreds of thousands of U.S. troops and millions of Iraqis, we hope it's not too late.

The Fog Over Iraq (NYT)

By David Brooks

DOJ_NMG_0115194

If the Democrats don't like the U.S. policy on Iraq over the next six months, they have themselves partly to blame. There were millions of disaffected Republicans and independents ready to coalesce around some alternative way forward, but the Democrats never came up with anything remotely serious.

The liberals who favor quick exit never grappled with the consequences of that policy, which the Baker-Hamilton commission terrifyingly described. The centrists who believe in gradual withdrawal never explained why that wouldn't be like pulling a tooth slowly. Joe Biden, who has the most intellectually serious framework for dealing with Iraq, was busy yesterday, at the crucial decision-making moment, conducting preliminary fact-finding hearings, complete with forays into Iraqi history.

The Democrats have been fecund with criticisms of the war, but when it comes to alternative proposals, a common approach is social Darwinism on stilts: We failed them, now they're on their own.

So we are stuck with the Bush proposal as the only serious plan on offer. The question is, what exactly did President Bush propose last night? The policy rollout has been befogged by so much spin and misdirection it's nearly impossible to figure out what the president is proposing.

Nonetheless, here's my reconstruction of how this policy evolved:

On Nov. 30, Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki presented Bush with a new security plan for Baghdad. It called for U.S. troops to move out of Baghdad to the periphery, where they would chase down Sunni terrorists. Iraqi Shiite and Kurdish troops, meanwhile, would flood into the city to establish order, at least as they define it.

Maliki essentially wanted the American troops protecting his flank but out of his hair. He didn't want U.S. soldiers embedded with his own. He didn't want American generals hovering over his shoulder. His government didn't want any restraints on Shiite might.

Over the next weeks, Bush rejected the plan and opted for the opposite approach. Instead of handing counterinsurgency over to the Iraqis/Shiites, he decided to throw roughly 20,000 U.S. troops — everything he had available — into Baghdad. He and his advisers negotiated new rules of engagement to make it easier to go after Shiites as well as Sunnis. He selected two aggressive counterinsurgency commanders, David Petraeus and Raymond Odierno, to lead the effort. Odierno recently told John Burns of The Times that American forces would remain in cleared areas of Baghdad "24/7," suggesting a heavy U.S. presence.

Then came the job of selling the plan. The administration could not go before the world and say that the president had decided to overrule the sovereign nation of Iraq. Officials could not tell wavering Republicans that the president was proposing a heavy, U.S.-led approach.

Thus, administration officials are saying that they have adopted the Maliki plan, just with a few minor tweaks. In briefings and in the president's speech, officials claimed that this was an Iraqi-designed plan, that Iraqi troops would take on all the primary roles in clearing and holding neighborhoods, that Iraqis in mixed neighborhoods would scarcely see any additional Americans.

All of this is designed to soothe the wounded pride of the Maliki government, and to make the U.S. offensive seem less arduous at home. It's the opposite of the truth.

Yesterday, administration officials were praising Maliki lavishly. He wants the same things we want, they claimed. He has resolved to lead a nonsectarian government. He is reworking his governing coalitions and marginalizing the extremists. "We've seen the nascent rise of a moderate political bloc," one senior administration official said yesterday.

But the selling of the plan illustrates that this is not the whole story. The Iraqi government wants a unified non-sectarian solution in high-minded statements and in some distant, ideal world. But in the short term, and in the deepest reptilian folds of their brains, the Shiites are maneuvering amid the sectarian bloodbath all around.

This is not a function of the character of Maliki or this or that official. It's a function of the core dynamic now afflicting Iraqi society.

The enemy in Iraq is not some discrete group of killers. It's the maelstrom of violence and hatred that infects every institution, including the government and the military. Instead of facing up to this core reality, the Bush administration has papered it over with salesmanship and spin.

War's Rorschach Test (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0115195

By Danielle Trussoni

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MY father once told me that he and his mother read the body count in the newspaper together. He didn't tell me the exact day or time, or precisely where they were when they read it, but I like to imagine that they sat at the long, wooden table in the kitchen of the farmhouse where the Trussoni children, all 12 of them, used to eat. It was only a month or so before my father left for the war, the winter of 1967, a time of year when Wisconsin is cold and harsh and so dismal that the red barn sitting just beyond the house would have appeared as a splotch of divine color in a field of gray.

I imagine my grandmother pressing the sheets of crisp, ink-smeared paper against the grain of the kitchen table. The numbers were there, for both of them to see.

The farmhouse was a narrow stone structure, tall and close fitting, nestled between high bluffs just east of the Mississippi River. Row after row of corn and tobacco undulated from the back of the house, rising and falling with the curvature of the land. Like the rest of America, the family got its news from a black and white Zenith television set and the local paper.

Reading the body count in the paper was my father's way of preparing for the war. The American dead, the Vietnamese dead, the Communist dead, each group had its own tally. Similar body counts were broadcast on the nightly news, and he would watch the images of fighting, trying to anticipate his own fate.

But my grandmother, I imagine, read the numbers to steel herself against her fourth son's departure. She had sent three sons to Vietnam already — Richard, Albert and John — and would now send a fourth. A third of her children would be in a war zone and still I imagine she looked much as she did when I knew her: sharp, cool eyes steady, a perennial I've-seen-it-all-and-then-some look about her. My grandmother was normally imperturbable, but my father's draft notice, this fourth boy conscripted, had shaken her.

The numbers signified different things to each of them. By the end of 1967, 15,000 American soldiers had died in Vietnam. For my grandmother this meant that 15,000 other people's children had died. To my father, the numbers seemed decent odds: Yes, the American troops were losing men, but the Communists were faring much, much worse. Of particular interest were what he called the "kill ratios," the number of Vietnamese to every American dead. For Dad, the high ratio of Communist casualties was a sign of hope. He believed, he once told me, that the numbers proved that "the good guys" were winning; the numbers, he said, meant that he had a "better shot" than the enemy; the numbers were "on his side."

Years after his tour, when my father knew just how quickly the numbers could turn — he landed in Vietnam during the Tet offensive and fulfilled his tour during the bloodiest year of the war — he never hesitated to tell me of his swift disillusionment with the numbers. The distinct American advantage in the "kill ratio" said much about winning the battles — it was true, they were killing lots of Vietnamese — but little about winning the war: the Vietnamese were willing to give every man, woman and child for victory, a sacrifice that Americans were simply not prepared to make. In the end, for our 58,000 dead, the casualties on the Vietnamese side were in the millions.

There are no kill ratios in Iraq. We know very little about civilian casualties. But we do know that even as President Bush speaks about a new strategy for the war, more than 3,000 Americans have been killed in four years of fighting. And as I think of those lives cut short, I think of my father and my grandmother on that winter afternoon in 1967, a newspaper open between them, each with their own interpretation.

Perhaps my father is peeling an apple; perhaps he is gazing out the window at the endless frozen cornfields, the pane of glass so thin and ill fitted that a draft of freezing air slips through the kitchen, ruffling the edge of the paper whose reality will soon enough be indisputable.

Mission Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

President Bush's challenge last night was to convince Americans that his new plan to secure Iraq won't mean risking more lives on a conflict that critics say has become "unwinnable." We think he offered compelling reasons for skeptical Americans of good faith to back him, but the key will be deploying enough forces to accomplish the task.

Mr. Bush's words offered the hope that the new plan won't simply mean employing more troops to carry out a strategy that hasn't been working. Though widely described in the press as a troop "surge" or even "escalation," the number of additional soldiers being sent to Iraq is significant but not overwhelming. The real difference will be how America uses its troops in Iraq. Put in simplest terms, Mr. Bush seems finally to have decided that the way to defeat the insurgency is to protect the population, especially in Baghdad.

For the past couple of years, every visitor to the Iraqi capital has been struck by the near invisibility of American troops on the city's streets. Sure, there were a few in the Green Zone, and lots out by the airport and a bit north at the airbase in Balad. But instead of using them to provide order, Generals George Casey and John Abizaid limited them largely to search and destroy missions while waiting for Iraqi forces to step up to the task of protecting civilian neighborhoods. There were reasonable arguments to be made for this strategy at the beginning -- it might have prevented Iraqi resentment of U.S. occupation -- but it couldn't survive the onslaught of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's car bombs and the reaction of the Shiite militias.

The new plan grew out of ideas presented by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki when he met Mr. Bush in Jordan last year. And under it, U.S. forces are slated to become more visible in the Iraqi capital than they have since the invasion in 2003. Instead of being confined to large bases outside the city, a U.S. combat battalion will be garrisoned in each of nine districts into which the city will be divided. Their job will be to support an Iraqi Army brigade (3,000-5,000 men) that likewise will be dedicated to each district, as well as a national police brigade and the local police.

Iraqis will take the lead in security operations, as they have in recent days in anti-insurgent fighting along Haifa Street. But there seems to be agreement on both sides that the Iraqis will perform with more confidence if they have close American support. The visibility of American forces will also reassure Baghdad's Sunni population, which has had justifiable worries about the infiltration of Iraqi police by Shiite militias.

Thus one question is whether one American battalion -- 600 to 1,000 soldiers -- is enough to do that job in these large areas of Baghdad. The tragedy would be if, after so much buildup, the U.S. only provided enough troops for an expanded version of Operation Forward Together, which failed last year.

Outside Baghdad, meanwhile, another U.S. combat brigade will be dedicated to Sunni-dominated al Anbar province. Ramadi will have to be a main destination, because that insurgent stronghold has to be tackled lest its car-bomb factories disrupt progress in the capital. There are also plans to increase the size of the Iraqi Army by five brigades, from the current 36, though we have our doubts that even this will be enough since the Army is so much more effective than the police.

Crucial to all of this will be the new U.S. ground commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who not only recruited and trained the Iraqi Army starting in 2004 but also oversaw the drafting of the U.S. Army's latest Counterinsurgency Manual. His job will be to execute the "clear, hold and build" strategy Mr. Bush has talked about for some time. General Casey has resisted the deployments necessary to make the "hold" and "build" phases work, and General Petraeus will have to insist that he has them.

Iraqi leadership will also be important to the new strategy, as the President noted last night. Mr. Maliki will have to show that Shiite criminals will be dealt with just as Sunni terrorists are. That means no more special treatment for the thugs of Sadr City. Rapid completion of a new oil law that guarantees equitable revenue distribution would also ease Sunni fears that they are going to lose out in the new Iraq. But we continue to believe that the best way to help Mr. Maliki accomplish these goals is not overt American pressure but consistent and overt American support. He will need it, because some compromises will alienate portions of his political base. * * *

In any case, last night's address was at least a tacit acknowledgment that the U.S. has placed far too much emphasis on a political progress as the solution to the violence. The truth is that political compromise won't happen without better security, or as the Petraeus Counterinsurgency Manual puts it, "security is essential to setting the stage for overall progress." There's also the outside meddling by Iraq's neighbors, particularly Iran and Syria. This remains primarily an indigenous Iraqi conflict. But showing those countries that they will pay a price for helping to kill Americans is also necessary for counterinsurgency success.

With the new strategy, new forces and new generals President Bush is putting in place, we have a fighting chance to create a virtuous circle whereby better security leads to more anti-insurgent cooperation from the public -- which in turn leads to still better security. If Congressional Democrats have better suggestions, we'd love to hear them. But the one "strategy" that simply isn't credible is the idea that anybody's interests would be served by a hasty U.S. exit from Iraq.

The Iraqis Must Step Up To The Plate (WSJ)

By L. Paul Bremer

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

"Looking back, I think that if we had then realized the confusion and chaos which existed we would indeed have thought ours a hopeless task. Certainly the authorities in Washington who had prepared (the occupation policy) did not visualize these conditions." -- Gen. Lucius Clay (1950). * * *

As in Germany a half-century ago, the American experience in Iraq has proven more difficult than anticipated. Mistakes were made -- including my own. Denying government positions to officials in the top 1% of Saddam's Baath party was correct. But it was a mistake to turn implementation over to Iraqi politicians rather than to judges. And in requesting American money to help rebuild Iraq's economy, I put too much emphasis on large-scale projects when smaller ones would have shown quicker results to the average Iraqi.

The president has frankly acknowledged the need for a new approach. He has assessed the various options and has courageously, and in my view wisely, rejected the politically popular course of withdrawing. Over the past four years, progress in Iraq has always depended on the interplay among the political, economic and security sectors. Clearly only Iraqis can design the necessary means to bridge their sectarian and ethnic divisions. The Shiites need to show they understand that democracy involves the proper respect for minority rights. The Sunnis must be brought to understand that while there is a place for them in liberated Iraq, their centuries-old domination of the country is over. The Kurds, with longer experience in elected government, must show patience as their Arab brothers wrestle with these and other issues.

Iraqis cannot make the necessary political compromises in an atmosphere of sustained violence. And although Iraq's economy has done well since the liberation, reconstruction, too, has been severely hampered by the lack of security. So security for Iraq's population is the sine qua non for success. By committing additional American forces, the president's new approach recognizes this fundamental reality. It is no secret that I would have preferred that we would have sent in more forces much sooner. But we are where we are today.

Now the Iraqis must step up to the plate. For months, they have promised additional Iraqi forces for Baghdad, forces which until now have never arrived. And Iraqi and Coalition forces operating in the capital have been subjected to constant political interference, hampering the effectiveness of those operations. An early test of the new approach will be whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki now makes good on the promised Iraqi reinforcements, and on his commitment to allow them to deal with the militia, especially those of the radical Moqtada al-Sadr.

Even a successful campaign in Baghdad will not end violence there. But a significant reduction in attacks in the capital would give the Iraqi government the political latitude needed to broaden its political base. The prime minister will also be watched carefully in Washington and in Iraq, to ensure that he delivers on his promises to move on the sensitive issues of oil policy and provincial elections, both important to encouraging an atmosphere of reconciliation. If he does not, then surely the Iraqi people will hold his government accountable, as is provided in the Iraqi constitution. * * *

The president's new approach is bold, unpopular and risky. But he is right to reject calls for American withdrawal. Those who advocate such a course need to be frank about the drastic consequences of such a course.

First, it would abandon 27 million Iraqis to broader and much bloodier violence. Some Americans seem prepared to accept this outcome, arguing, "It's their country. Let them sort it out." This is shortsighted and uninformed. Broader sectarian violence between Iraq's Arabs would certainly provoke the Kurds to declare their independence from Iraq. Over the past four years, I have often spoken about this issue with the Kurdish leaders. They have made clear that their decision to join a liberated Iraq depends on a government which can provide security for all its people and which is not dominated by sectarianism. An independent Iraqi Kurdistan would have an irresistible attraction for the millions of Kurds living in Syria, Turkey and Iran, and would surely lead to a wider regional war. Such a war would threaten American interests and allies throughout the region and lead to American military re-engagement, probably on a very large scale.

Most importantly, an American defeat in Iraq would immediately endanger Americans. By confirming Osama bin Laden's analysis that America is a "weak horse" driven out of Lebanon in 1983 and Somalia a decade later, defeat would be a major recruiting poster for Islamic extremists everywhere. If force again rules Mesopotamia, there is a real risk that extremists will establish themselves there as they had done in Afghanistan, but this time with major economic resources and an operating base not on the periphery of the Middle East, but at its heart.

These, then, are the stakes in Iraq. The president has acknowledged the need for new leadership and a new strategy. He is to be commended for rejecting the easy popular course.

Mr. Bremer was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in 2003-04.

More Troops -- "Escalation"? Or "Surge"? (USNEWS)

By Chris Wilson, Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 11, 2007

What do you call a decision to send 20,000 or more additional troops to Iraq?

It depends on whom you ask. President Bush and his team call it a "surge." Increasingly, Democrats and those who oppose the increase are calling it an "escalation," invoking an old specter from the Vietnam era. Even David Letterman, in last night's " target="new">"Top Ten Features of Bush's New Iraq Plan," used the word in No. 2: "Raise money for escalation by robbing Mick Jagger's apartment."

Escalation is a highly loaded term. The U.S. News library team tracked the earliest uses of the word in a military context during the Vietnam era and found that it first surfaced in a series of increasingly critical New York Times editorials in the spring and summer of 1965. The word gained traction from there and by 1968 was showing up on protest signs and in the language of the antiwar movement.

Surge, on the other hand, owes its recent popularity to use by Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and other military officials. Speaking from Baghdad last month after meeting with Army generals, Gates said they "discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish." The term also cropped up a few weeks earlier in the Iraq Study Group's statement that it would support "a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad." "'Surge' suggests it's a short, time-limited event, but at the moment the president is not willing to put any time limit on the whole enterprise," Democratic pollster Geoff Garin said. So far, Bush hasn't said how long his "surge" would last. He might make that clear in his prime-time address to the nation tonight, but don't bet on it.

White House officials say it all depends on how successful the troops are in stabilizing Baghdad in the larger pursuit of what Bush calls "victory," and that won't be known for months. The battle over "surge" or "increase" vs. "escalation" echoes other emotionally weighted word battles of the past, such as "prolife" vs. "prochoice" in framing the abortion debate and "estate tax" vs. "death tax" in describing taxation of inherited assets.

And let's not forget "taxes" vs. "revenue enhancers."

Democrats Aim To Block Funds For Plan (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Senior House Democrats said yesterday that they will attempt to derail funding for President Bush's proposal to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, setting up what could become the most significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over military policy since the Vietnam War.

Senate Democrats at the same time will seek bipartisan support for a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan, possibly as early as next week, in what some party officials see as the first step in a strategy aimed at isolating Bush politically and forcing the beginning of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from the conflict.

The bold plans reflect the Democrats' belief that the public has abandoned Bush on the war and that the American people will have little patience for an escalation of the U.S. military presence in Iraq. But the moves carry clear risks for a party that suffered politically for pushing to end an unpopular war in Vietnam three decades ago, and Democratic leaders hope to avoid a similar fate over the conflict in Iraq.

were there said. House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), a quiet, hawkish supporter of the war, stunned many of his colleagues when he came out strenuously against Bush's proposal and suggested the war is no lon ger militarily winnable.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense and the party's leading voice for withdrawing troops, is to report back to Appropriations Committee members today on hearings and legislative language that could stop an escalation of troops, said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of Murtha's subcommittee.

Those plans could attach so many conditions and benchmarks to the funds that it would be all but impossible to spend the money without running afoul of the Congress. "Twenty-one thousand five hundred troops ought to have 21,500 strings attached to them," said House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.).

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said Democratic leaders have made no decision to hold back funds, but he added: "We are not going to give the president a blank check. We will subject any proposal to escalate the war to harsh scrutiny, and we will set benchmarks he has to attain to get that money."

Although Democratic leaders offered a united front last night in their response to Bush's speech, they have long struggled to forge consensus on the details of an alternative policy. Democrats have widely divergent views of the timing of any future withdrawal of U.S. forces and differ on whether there should be a timetable for bringing all troops home. Now in the majority, they will be challenged in the months ahead to outline a policy that will achieve the twin goals of ending U.S. involvement in Iraq without leaving that country in greater chaos.

Democratic reaction to Bush's prime-time speech last night was overwhelmingly negative, setting the stage for a series of legislative moves that will play out over the next few months.

"By calling for the rapid escalation of American troops in Iraq, the president rebuffed his commanders, thumbed his nose at the Baker-Hamilton commission and, worst of all, ignored the will of the American people," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said after the speech.

Bush had hoped to persuade congressional leaders to withhold judgment until last night's speech, meeting with more than 125 lawmakers in the run-up to the speech, including House leaders yesterday. But rank-and-file Democrats were unwilling to wait before laying the groundwork to thwart what they call an escalation.

House Democratic leaders have said they will not use the power of the purse in any way that would harm troops in the field, a position that had run afoul of the party's liberal activists. Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said that pledge is being calibrated to apply only to troops in the field now.

Tauscher said Democratic policy must "satisfy the American people that we're putting a speed bump in front of the president that will actually hold," adding: "The White House is used to doing business on their own, but they're realizing things have changed. This is vastly different."

House Democrats also expect to introduce soon a resolution of disapproval for Bush's new policy but have moved farther than Senate Democrats toward an outright funding confrontation with the White House.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) called Tuesday for the administration to ask for renewed authorization from Congress before sending additional troops to Iraq. "I don't believe there's a single member of the U.S. Senate that would have voted for the authorization bill in October 2002 if they thought the authorization was going to commit American forces to be involved in a civil war," he said yesterday.

But Democratic strategists said that, at this point, there is limited support for the Kennedy proposal.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who with Pelosi co-signed a letter to the president last week urging him not to send more troops to Iraq, has begun meetings with other senior senators, including Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) to develop specific responses to Bush's new policy.

Antiwar activists continued to press congressional Democrats to block Bush's plans. "The bottom line is that when voters elected the Democrats, they did that on the promise that the Democrats would lead the country out of the war," said Eli Pariser, director of the MoveOn political action committee. "Democrats need to fulfill on that promise, and they're going to."

Democrats Reject Bush's "Way Forward" (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Bill Nichols

WASHINGTON — Democrats launched an immediate counterattack against President Bush's new Iraq strategy Wednesday. Rep. John Murtha vowed to try to block Bush's plan from his perch as chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee.

"Escalating our military involvement in Iraq sends precisely the wrong message, and we oppose it," the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate said in a statement released after the speech.

Hours before Bush outlined his "new way forward" in Iraq to the nation, Murtha told USA TODAY that he plans to use his subcommittee's control over the Pentagon budget to force a new direction in Iraq.

Specifically, Murtha, a former Marine and Vietnam War veteran from Pennsylvania, said he'll focus on the administration's supplemental spending request for Iraq, which is expected to be as high as $160 billion.

Murtha says he will hold extensive hearings on the budget request. "We're going to make them justify every cent," he said. He also said he may use the funding bill to hamstring the efforts to add more troops to Iraq.

Among the options Murtha said he's considering: barring the redeployment to Iraq of troops who haven't had the recommended one-year respite in the United States and prohibiting those who are in Iraq from having their tours of duty extended.

Bush said he plans to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500. Before the speech, the White House acknowledged that policies covering the Pentagon's access to the National Guard and Reserves may have to be changed to allow for more or longer mobilizations.

Murtha said that by inserting language into the administration's request for more money to fund the Iraq war, he can avoid a Bush veto. Murtha said legislation introduced Tuesday by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., that would require congressional approval of Bush's plan could be vetoed with little consequence. If Congress adds conditions to the Iraq funding bill, Bush will have to accept them or cut off money for the troops. "The supplemental is where the money is," Murtha said. "Nothing else means anything. They can veto anything else."

Murtha said it is unclear whether the full House will take up Bush's plan in coming weeks, as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's preference is to focus on domestic issues first.

Pelosi complained to reporters after congressional leaders met with Bush earlier in the day that the administration had already tried surging troops into Baghdad to improve security conditions twice before.

"Two times this has not worked," said the California Democrat. "Why are they doing this now? That question remains."

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly stopped short of saying whether she would back Murtha's tactics, but added: "She supports what Murtha is doing generally, which is that we should subject it (Bush's proposal) to harsh scrutiny."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., plans to introduce a resolution next week to force senators to vote for or against the plan, spokesman Jim Manley said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., predicted a "significant number of Republicans" would vote against Bush's new strategy.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., plans to offer amendments that will give Democrats heartburn, said spokesman Don Stewart. "We're not the only ones who are going to have to take tough votes around here," Stewart said.

McConnell said of Bush's speech that he is "convinced the military can handle it and we'll be successful."

Another supporter of Bush's strategy is Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an independent Democrat after losing his Democratic primary last year.

"I applaud the president for rejecting the fatalism of failure and pursuing a new course to achieve success in Iraq," Lieberman said.

In the speech, Bush praised Lieberman's "good advice" for urging him to establish a bipartisan working group to try to forge congressional consensus on Iraq.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said in the official Democratic response that the Democratic leadership had a plan for Iraq. He said their plan calls for "shifting greater responsibility to the Iraqis for their security," beginning the withdrawal of U.S. forces in the next four to six months and implementing "an aggressive diplomatic strategy" to help stabilize Iraq and help achieve a political settlement, including the amending of Iraq's constitution.

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry said more U.S. troops will not be able to stop the violence. He said he supports setting a date for the withdrawal of troops to force the Iraqis to step up and stop the violence.

"This plan is neither new nor forward-looking," Kerry said after Bush's speech. "This is more of what's taken us backwards. There's no military solution in Iraq. There is only a political solution, and the president has no plan to achieve it."

Democrats Ready To Fight New War Plan (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Democrats yesterday attacked President Bush's new plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq and began laying the groundwork for a showdown between the executive and legislative branches over war powers.

"Escalation of this war is not the change the American people called for in the last election," Democratic Whip Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois said last night in his party's response to Mr. Bush's prime-time presentation of his Iraq strategy changes.

"Instead of a new direction, the president's plan moves the American commitment in Iraq in the wrong direction."

The new Democratic-led Congress plans to grill Bush administration officials during Capitol Hill hearings on the Iraq war -- beginning this morning when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates testify before congressional committees.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said Americans want to know whether Mr. Bush's strategy is a "change of course."

"Or is this simply more of the same with slightly different rhetoric?" Mr. Schumer said.

Miss Rice will testify before the Senate and House foreign relations committees today, and Mr. Gates, who replaced the war's architect Donald H. Rumsfeld last month, will testify before the House Armed Services Committee today and the Senate Armed Services Committee tomorrow.

Democratic leaders also are drafting a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop surge, which they want to put up for a vote in both the House and Senate next week and which they think some Republicans will support.

"The issue is: Do you support the president's policy? That will be the vote," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican and a favorite of conservatives, last night said Mr. Bush's troop surge is not the answer.

"Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution," he said.

Mr. Bush said he will send more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad and 4,000 Marines to the Anbar province to try to break the cycle of violence and "hasten the day our troops begin coming home." He said Iraq has responsibilities that it must meet.

"The president knows there is no silver bullet to make our mission there easier, but he is committed to a new, better strategy that will move us toward a stable Iraq," said House Republican Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri.

"It is not the responsibility of members of Congress to dictate strategy to the commander in chief, who is ultimately responsible, along with the commanders on the ground, for implementing a winning strategy."

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said that if neither the hearings nor the anti-troop surge resolution change Mr. Bush's stance, he will move forward with a bill in "a matter of days" that would require the president to seek congressional approval for a troop increase.

"What we really ought to be having is a surge of political initiatives, rather than a surge of military initiatives," Mr. Kennedy said.

Some senators said yesterday that they would support such a move, but Democratic leaders on Tuesday appeared to brush aside Mr. Kennedy's proposal.

If Mr. Kennedy's idea gains momentum and comes to the Senate floor, the president's war powers under the Constitution's Article II would be at issue.

Congress voted to authorize the use of force against Iraq in 2002, and under the Constitution, the president is the "commander in chief" of the nation's military and has authority to prosecute a war as he sees fit.

Mr. Kennedy's bill, however, says that the 2002 authorization no longer applies to the current situation, which Democrats view as a civil war with U.S. troops caught in the crossfire.

"The mission of the Armed Forces of the United States in Iraq no longer bears any resemblance to the mission of the Armed Forces authorized by Congress in the Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution of 2002," Mr. Kennedy's proposal reads.

Mr. Bush's position is that Iraq is a central front in the war on terror and that al Qaeda and other terrorist groups, some backed by Iran, want to drive U.S. troops out of Iraq and then launch attacks on American soil.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, said the president "did not take the easy path, but he took the correct and courageous course."

"Defeat in Iraq would result in a moral and strategic setback in our global struggle against Islamist extremists who seek to strike our interests and our homeland," Mr. Lieberman said.

Likely Democratic presidential hopefuls in 2008 have taken a range of views on Iraq.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, called the troop increase "a mistake that I and others will actively oppose in the days to come."

"Escalation has already been tried and it has already failed, because no amount of American forces can solve the political differences that lie at the heart of somebody else's civil war," he said.

Former Sen. John Edwards, North Carolina Democrat, wants an immediate withdrawal, while Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has said she opposes a surge but has kept a low profile this week on Capitol Hill.

Among Republican 2008 hopefuls, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, is one of the strongest supporters of sending more troops.

Mr. McCain has said such an increase must be "substantial and sustained" to make any difference in Iraq. He said last week that, at a minimum, five brigades of 3,500 to 5,000 soldiers should be sent to Baghdad, and two more brigades should be sent to the troublesome Anbar province.

Democrats Plan To Fight Expansion Of Troops (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The new Democratic leaders of Congress on Wednesday accused President Bush of ignoring strong American sentiment against the war in Iraq and said they would build a bipartisan campaign against his proposed military expansion.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California said House Democrats intended to turn the precise words from Mr. Bush's speech into a symbolic resolution, compelling Republicans to support or reject the idea of sending more troops to Iraq. The Senate was developing a similar nonbinding resolution to be considered as early as next week.

"The president's response to the challenge of Iraq is to send more American soldiers into the crossfire of a civil war," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, responding for his party immediately after Mr. Bush spoke. "The escalation of this war is not the change the American people called for in the last election."

The criticism from Democrats resounded in near unison on Wednesday evening, a rare moment for a party that for more than four years has struggled to present a unified policy on Iraq.

Of more immediate concern to the administration was the bleak assessment from some Republicans.

Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, delivered a strong rebuke to the plan in a speech on the Senate floor only hours before the presidential address. A recent trip to Iraq, Mr. Coleman said, confirmed his fears that Baghdad was besieged by irreparable sectarian violence.

"I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," said Mr. Coleman, who is up for re-election in 2008.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, one of the administration's staunchest allies on Iraq, disagreed. Public opinion was not entirely against the war, Mr. McCain said, adding, "Americans want to be told how we can prevail in Iraq and how we can get out."

Even though Mr. Bush proposed a bipartisan Congressional working group on Iraq, he set the stage for a major confrontation with Democrats, who won the majority last fall after the lingering war soured the climate for Republicans. The clash begins Thursday as Democrats open a series of hearings to scrutinize the president's approach on Iraq.

"In the coming days and weeks, we should undertake respectful debate and deliberation over this new plan," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat turned independent singled out by Mr. Bush for recommending a new bipartisan group focusing on the war on terror. "Excessive partisan division and rancor at home only weakens our will to prevail in this war."

The White House had asked Republicans to reserve judgment on the Iraq strategy — or to at least stay silent — but several Republicans distanced themselves from the president Wednesday. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, conducted a series of calls and meetings Wednesday in an effort to stem political damage.

"This is a dangerously wrongheaded strategy that will drive America deeper into an unwinnable swamp at a great cost," said Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska. "It is wrong to place American troops in the middle of Iraq's civil war."

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he had reservations about increasing troops, but declined to condemn the president's plan until Congress had had the opportunity to study it.

"Blow the whistle, time out, until Congress has done its homework and its analysis," Mr. Warner said. "But each day that goes by, all of us are pained by the casualties. We cannot dither about."

Six hours before the president delivered his address to the nation, Congressional leaders from both parties were called to the White House for a briefing. Democrats dismissed the meeting as a last-minute procedural briefing, saying the administration had failed to consult with them, as the president promised to only a week ago.

"This conversation that we had with the president just now would have been much better a week ago, a month ago, six months ago," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, as he walked from the White House.

As they prepared their reaction to the president's prime-time address, Democratic Congressional leaders did not ask television networks for broadcast time for a formal response. Instead, they settled on responding with the symbolic resolutions.

Debate over the administration's Iraq policy has been a central focus of the early stages of the 2008 presidential campaign. As several senators and representatives responded to Mr. Bush's speech in Washington, one potential Republican contender, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, weighed in skeptically from Baghdad in the midst of an extended trip through the Middle East.

Mr. Brownback, who is chronicling his travels in a daily blog, issued a statement Wednesday urging the administration to "transfer more security responsibility to the Iraqis and reduce the threat to American troops."

"The United States cannot sustain a war effort without broad public support," he said. "And we cannot count on such support unless the situation in Iraq improves and American casualties decrease."

How Congress May Block A Troop "Surge" (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

If Congress decides to block the president's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq, it has all the clout it needs - at least on parchment - to trim war funding through its power of the purse. Call it the Murtha plan.

Congress can also opt to push back with hearings, investigations, and resolutions that condemn an escalation of the war or require President Bush to return to Congress for approval before committing troops. Call that the Kennedy plan.

Choosing which strategy to pursue is causing heated debate within the new Democratic majority, which believes it owes its power to an election-season promise to begin withdrawing US troops. They are joined by a growing number of Republicans who

- at least in the run-up to Mr. Bush unveiling his Iraq plan Wednesday - were reluctant to send more Americans into a war they believed could not be won.

But even at the lowest public-approval ratings of his career, Bush as commander in chief brings powerful assets to any conflict with Congress over the conduct of war. He can rally the public (as he hopes to do with Wednesday night's speech). He can order troop movements before Congress can thwart them. He can delay requests for supplemental war funding to blunt Congress's power of the purse.

Only in the last few days have Democratic leaders even entertained the idea of cutting off funding for the war. For Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, the lead advocate for using funding to force a change of course in this war, timing is crucial. His Defense Appropriations subcommittee is the gateway for every dime spent on the war. He says that he will use that power to bar a troop surge in Iraq if, for example, it undermines the military's domestic readiness.

"If we just pass resolutions, the president will veto them. If he vetoes an appropriations bill, he doesn't have any money. It's the only weapon we have," he says.

But to wield that power, he needs the president to submit a request for additional defense spending before a "surge" of new troops into Iraq. So far, all war funding has been handled that way - as supplemental requests to Congress outside the normal budget process.

In the next two months, his subcommittee will hold hearings to document the state of readiness of US forces and build support for writing benchmarks and conditions into the next defense spending bill.

On a faster track, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts proposed legislation this week that would require the president to come back to the Congress and get authority for deploying additional American troops to Iraq. "I am introducing legislation to reclaim the rightful role of Congress and the people's right to a full voice in the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq," he said in an address at the National Press Club on Tuesday.

"No one - no one - can seriously deny that this civil war is radically different from the mission Congress voted for in 2002," he added.

On the House side, Rep. Edward Markey (D) of Massachusetts is proposing a similar resolution to require Congress to expressly authorize any escalation of the war in Iraq. "After more than 3,000 American casualties, over $300 billion in expenditures, and almost four years of fighting, an increase in the number of members of the US Armed Forces deployed in Iraq above the current level of 132,000 is the wrong course of action," he says.

Representative Murtha worries that if Democrats settle for a quick, symbolic gesture, they could curb momentum for stronger action on the spending side. Should the president veto the Kennedy resolution, or another like it, it would require a two-thirds vote in both the House and Senate to override the veto. "It's not clear we have it," he says.

On Wednesday, Democrats discussed these options in their morning caucus meeting but did not settle on a strategy. "We're going to make a judgment on the best way to present our position on the escalation of the war in Iraq, which our own military does not support," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer, on Wednesday. After a meeting with his caucus on Tuesday, Senate majority leader Harry Reid says that Democrats are working toward "a bipartisan statement on the president's escalation." He expects at least nine Republicans to support it.

For most Democrats, cutting off funds in wartime is still a near taboo topic because it carries a high political risk of appearing to endanger troops in the field.

"I don't know why we have members of Congress out there who say there's nothing constitutional that Congress can do. Politically, they may feel like it's crazy to do anything restricting money supporting troops, but constitutionally they can do what they like and they've done it in the past," says Louis Fisher, an expert in separation of powers at the Library of Congress.

"Congress can attach any condition to any appropriation it pleases," says Winslow Wheeler, director of Straus Military Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information in Washington. "If they want to say none of the appropriations in the supplemental can be used to keep troops beyond their normal deployment period or to send additional troops, so be it. The president can disregard this at his own peril."

But it requires careful work to draft constraints into legislation without loopholes. President Nixon circumvented an amendment banning funding for combat troops in Laos by describing the forces as "military equipment delivery teams - end use supervisors."

"Congress can urge, propose, recommend, but it's very hard to legislate when it comes to troop deployments," says Charles Stevenson, author of the book "Warriors and Politicians." "They didn't try to [cut funds for aerial bombing] earlier in the Vietnam War, because they didn't think they had the two-thirds to override a veto."

Military experts say that Congress has other levers on the president, including new legislation on the use of reservists.

Democrats Oppose Bush's Plan To Add Troops In Iraq (MCT)

By Renee Schoof, Margaret Talev

McClatchy, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - If President Bush is determined to win over Congress to the idea of keeping more American troops in Iraq, his chances looked dim Wednesday night.

But even as the new Democratic majority and some of the president's fellow Republicans expressed doubts or rejected the notion outright, they had yet to coalesce behind binding legislation to stop him.

Instead, lawmakers will hold hearings Thursday and in ensuing weeks to analyze the plan, and Democrats are scheduling votes on nonbinding resolutions that would force members of both parties to go on record supporting or opposing Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq.

The Senate could begin debating resolutions as early as next week; House of Representatives leaders were more vague on the timing.

"We will give his proposal a fair hearing, and in our hearings, we will establish the ground truth of what is happening in Iraq, and then we will vote on the president's proposal," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who opposes Bush's buildup.

Early opposition from Democrats was sharp.

Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., the head of the Out-of-Iraq Caucus, said Bush's plan was futile and would only put more U.S. troops in harm's way. "We cannot undo the harm we have created" in Iraq, she said.

Republican leaders were generally supportive.

"It is our best shot at victory in Iraq, and I think that's what the American people want and expect," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., called the plan "courageous and correct." He also said Democrats should be prepared for "considerable debate" on any legislation that they tried to bring to the floor, suggesting that the minority may delay votes.

But the president now faces critics in his own party as well.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who was traveling in Iraq, said Wednesday, "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer. Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., delivered a speech on the Senate floor opposing a troop increase. "I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," he said.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said she could support more American troops in Anbar province, the hotbed of the Sunni Muslim insurgency, but not in Baghdad, where "it's clear the violence is entirely sectarian."

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he'd wait until Thursday to issue a detailed response. But he floated the idea of Republican critics rallying around a resolution endorsing the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group. That bipartisan panel backed a goal of bringing most U.S. troops home by early 2008.

Warner said that while he wanted to support President Bush and show him respect, ultimately "I support what's in the best interests of this country."

In the House, eight Republicans sent Bush a letter warning him that adding troops would make matters in Iraq worse. They said there was no evidence that more American forces could stop the sectarian violence, and that an increase would deepen

Iraqi dependence on the United States, reduce the number of American troops poised to respond to other crises around the world and give al-Qaida more recruiting power.

The eight were Reps. Walter B. Jones and Howard Coble of North Carolina, Ron Paul of Texas, Wayne Gilchrest and Roscoe Bartlett of Maryland, John Duncan of Tennessee, Phil English of Pennsylvania and Steven LaTourette of Ohio.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said that measuring the depth of opposition to Bush's plan had to be the first step, "and then after that we will decide what further actions to take."

All options will be considered, he said, including restrictions on funding.

Democrats have floated several ideas about how to block a troop increase.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., has called for a vote requiring the president to win congressional authorization for any more troops in Iraq. He said it wouldn't cut off money for troops who already were in Iraq or were on the way there. American troop levels might already be up in Iraq by the time his legislation passed, but "I can't do anything about that," he said.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., said an amendment to the supplemental budget for the Iraq war could be used to oppose an increase in troops but that it wasn't clear whether such a measure would get enough Republican support to meet the 60-vote threshold that's needed to end debate in the Senate, where Democrats have a 51-49 majority.

Reed also acknowledged that the deployment could be well under way before the Senate votes on the supplemental budget for the Iraq war in several months.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a top defense appropriator, has suggested that there are legislative means to curb the president without hurting the troops. But as of Wednesday night, Democratic leaders had yet to endorse any such plans.

"Prebutters" Ensure Debate Over "Way Forward" Is Backward (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's announcement last night of a "New Way Forward in Iraq" began with a step backward.

The White House called a noon briefing to preview Bush's 9 p.m. speech, and reporters entered the room to find a multimedia display, which featured a projection screen, large television and laptop showing a yellow map of Iraq and its neighbors in orange.

But moments before the briefing, four young aides scurried into the room, pulled a blue velvet curtain in front of the projection screen, unplugged the laptop and wheeled the television offstage through the curtains.

"It's curtains for Iraq," a reporter observed.

"What happened to the maps?" a correspondent asked White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, who had just entered the room.

"Maps?" she replied. "There were maps?"

Bush aides could be forgiven for this confusion. Usually, official Washington chews over a president's speech after he has delivered it. But yesterday, virtually everything in the speech was disclosed, disputed and defended -- hours before the lights went on in the White House library for Bush's address to the nation.

The culprit? The "prebuttal," the act of rebutting an opponent's speech before the speech is delivered, which has been around for years. The term, like the Internet, was apparently invented by Vice President Al Gore, who was quoted by The Washington Post's Dan Balz as using it during the 1996 presidential campaign. But now prebuttals have become so intense that they have forced the victim of the prebuttal to preempt his own speech -- giving the speech itself an anticlimactic feel.

Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) started the latest round of prebuttals Tuesday. "President Bush will address the nation tomorrow about his decision to send tens of thousands of additional American troops to the war in Iraq," he said at the National Press Club, announcing legislation to thwart Bush's still-unannounced plan.

At dawn yesterday, Bush counselor Dan Bartlett attempted to rebut Kennedy's prebuttal by giving a series of morning-show interviews on the White House lawn. "We don't view Ted Kennedy as a hostile enemy," Bartlett graciously told Fox News, then slyly added: "It's really important for the American people to understand that their leaders in Washington, regardless of all the politics, support our troops."

Kennedy, his support for the troops thus challenged, scheduled a news conference in the Senate press gallery to rebut Bartlett's rebuttal of Kennedy's prebuttal.

By then, however, the prebuttals were everywhere. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) alone issued three written prebuttals of the Bush speech and one orally in the White House driveway.

Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), giving a news conference at noon, paraphrased Bush's yet-to-be-delivered speech. "The president has basically said: 'First I need more troops and then I'll craft a strategy,' " Schumer deduced.

And Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) offered Bush rhetorical flourishes for the address. "I'm sure he will dress up his rhetoric in words like 'new approach' and 'new beginning,' 'a new way forward.' "

The White House, losing the battle to the "prebutters," scheduled a briefing to preempt the president's speech. Two Bush aides, who could be identified only as senior administration officials, gave out all the details: 21,000 to 22,000 more troops; $1 billion in development aid; no hard conditions or timelines for U.S. involvement. Bush "will talk about the hopes we had at the end of 2005," Senior Administration Official A announced. "He will say that that was dashed in 2006. And he will then conclude that the situation in Iraq is unacceptable."

The White House was evidently doing this on the fly. It delayed the noon briefing, first to 12:15, then to 12:25. "We have promised some documents to you; those are still in production," Senior Administration Official B announced on arrival. When the documents did arrive, they contradicted each other. The first stated that "the war on terror cannot be won if we fail in Iraq." The second document hedged: "Failing in Iraq would make succeeding in the war on terror vastly more difficult."

Official A attempted to answer the prebutters. "We hope that people will have time for debate to occur before taking preemptive action," he said.

No chance. By then, Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) had announced that he was issuing his prebuttal in the form of a "radio actuality and a direct-to-camera video interview." Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) also offered an "audio" option with her written prebuttal. Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) was busy prebutting Bush on MSNBC, while Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) released his prebuttal from Baghdad.

Usual Bush friends were silent; "RNC Announces Winter Meeting Schedule," declared the party's press release.

Only a few brave souls joined the White House in rebutting the prebutters. "I am disappointed that some declared the president's proposals unworkable even before they were announced," declared Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). On the other hand, Kyl was willing to declare the proposals workable even before they were announced: His "embargoed" prebuttal rebuttal came out three hours before the speech.

Bush Speech Prompts 2008 Contenders To Stake Ground (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's speech outlining his troop-increase plan in Iraq provoked several potential presidential candidates to stake out a position, including some Republicans who had avoided addressing a controversial proposal that is likely to be a touchstone issue in the 2008 campaign.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, ending weeks of dodging questions on the issue, announced Wednesday he would support a troop increase. But Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., announced he opposed it, a sign that Republicans may not be as reluctant to distance themselves from Bush as they once were.

Divisions also opened among Democrats, as two -- John Kerry, D-Mass., and former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C. -- announced their support for Congress to cut off funds needed for a troop increase. That step goes farther than many Democrats want because they fear it will be seen as undermining U.S. troops already in Iraq.

Presidential politics will likely cast a shadow over the opening debate on Bush's proposal Thursday when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice testifies before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Five members of the panel are thinking about running for president.

For months, the only likely presidential candidate to support a troop escalation was Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who made it a signature issue long before Bush threw his support behind the idea. Other Republican aspirants kept their distance from the proposal, which is supported by a mere 12 percent of the public, according to recent Gallup poll.

Romney previously had declined to comment before his term in the statehouse ended in early January, telling interviewers, "I'm still a governor," when asked about increasing troops.

Wednesday, Romney put himself in league with McCain, his leading rival for the GOP nomination, and Bush by issuing a statement calling for additional troops. He said he reached that conclusion through consultations with generals, military experts and ground troops.

McCain acknowledged the political perils of backing such an unpopular plan on CNN after the speech. "I'd much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who had been silent on the issue, also issued a statement backing Bush's troop increase. "Even more importantly," he said, "I support the change in strategy, the focus on security and the emphasis on a political and economic solution as being even more important than a military solution."

But Brownback, issuing a statement while on an official trip to Iraq that included a meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, concluded, "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer. Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Almost all Democrats considering a presidential bid opposed the Bush plan, although there were differences in their degree of opposition and their positions on what Congress should do to stop him.

Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, a longshot candidate, is the most militant opponent to the war and has proposed denying any new funding to continue the war and a quick withdrawal.

Presumed front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., had been more moderate about the war and cautious about commenting on the president's plan before the speech.

After the speech, she said, "I cannot support his proposed escalation of the war in Iraq." She reiterated her support for a "phased redeployment of U.S. troops," not a quick withdrawal.

Others were more assertive in advance of Bush's speech.

Kerry announced Wednesday he was backing a proposal by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., to prohibit paying for an increase in U.S. troops unless Congress voted to approve it. Edwards -- an outspoken critic of increasing troop levels who has said he made a mistake voting for the war in 2002 -- on Tuesday also called on Congress to block funding for an escalation.

Some Democratic candidates are not so keen on pulling the purse strings. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., has not ruled out such action, but has raised questions about the constitutionality and practicality of doing so.

He is calling instead for Congress to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop increase -- an approach that Senate Democratic leaders have embraced.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., opposed the Iraq war in 2002, although he was not in Congress to vote against it at the time, and has criticized the proposed troop increase. "We cannot impose a military solution on the problem, there has to be a political accommodation," he said on CNN, explaining that the president had offered no plan to reconcile warring Shiites and Sunnis. "I think we are making a very bad mistake."

Obama has not embraced the Kennedy fund cut-off bill. He said his staff is looking at options to place conditions on to Bush's actions without risking cuts that could hurt troops in Iraq already.

Meanwhile, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a potential Democratic contender, said, "The only surge we need in Iraq is a diplomatic one." He also called for U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq this year -- a more specific timetable than many Democrats have embraced.

A Cynical Opposition (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

You might have thought President Bush's announcement yesterday that he intends to deploy several thousand more combat soldiers to Iraq would have been sweet policy vindication for the Democrats. They're the ones who spent the better part of the past four years using Eric Shinseki -- the former Army Chief of Staff who, prior to the war, estimated it would take up to half a million troops to occupy the country -- as a cudgel with which to beat this President over the head.

Thus former House minority leader, now Speaker Nancy Pelosi, citing General Shinseki in May 2004, on "Meet the Press": "What I'm saying to you, [is] that we need more troops on the ground." Thus, too, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, just four weeks ago: "If it's for a surge -- that is, for two or three months -- and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it."

Lately the Democrats have been singing from a different hymnal. In a letter Mr. Reid and Ms. Pelosi sent the President last week, they write: "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed. . . . Adding more combat troops will endanger more Americans and stretch our military capability to the breaking point for no strategic gain."

As for Carl Levin, the new Senate Armed Forces Chairman was also one of those who used to call for more troops. But now he is threatening a legislative cap on the number of troops in Iraq if Mr. Bush doesn't start a significant drawdown of U.S. forces in Iraq later this year. We'll bet Mr. Levin never has the political nerve to follow through on anything but TV sound-bite criticism.

Ostensibly, the Democratic complaint is that the Administration has failed to come up with a new strategy for Iraq. In fact, Mr. Bush says he is offering a qualitative departure from what the U.S. has attempted before. (See "Mission Baghad"1.) The real question is whether the Democrats are prepared to act like a responsible opposition now that they control both houses of Congress, in contrast to the last four years of partisan minority sniping.

On the evidence of the past week, the answer is no. On Tuesday, the Democrats announced they would hold a symbolic, nonbinding vote on the troop increase, without so much as hearing what the President has to say. The vote, says Senator Joe Biden, is an effort to "demonstrate to the President he's on his own." So much for presenting a united American face to the jihadis and insurgents killing our troops in Iraq. And this from someone who fancies himself Presidential-timber.

Such a vote would be pure partisanship, and of an especially ugly sort. If Democrats seriously believe that a troop surge "will endanger more Americans," then there might be some moral justification in using Congress's power of the purse to cut off funds for the war. But as House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel candidly explained, "anytime, politically, you have to explain what you are saying, you have a problem. And so if I am there saying, 'Cut the funds for Iraq and the war in Iraq,' then someone is going to say, 'You are taking away rifles.'"

So the Democrats want the political mileage of opposing the troop increase rhetorically. What they don't want is to take responsibility for their own policy choice. Meanwhile, their rhetoric will only serve to reassure the jihadis that sooner or later Democrats will force a U.S. withdrawal. It's enough to give a half-cheer to genuine Democratic isolationists, who have proposed legislation that would require the President to seek approval to fund additional troop increases. At least they're willing to go on record.

Most reckless is the contention, also by Mr. Reid and Ms. Pelosi, that "it is time to bring the war to a close." No one serious -- not even the Iraq Study Group -- believes that the war will end if we leave. Instead, it will change into a civil war in Iraq, and perhaps a wider regional war, that is likely to draw our forces back in again somewhere in the Middle East. As the bipartisan ISG noted in its December report, "If we leave and Iraq descends into chaos, the long-range consequences could eventually require the United States to return."

If Congressional Democrats want to be constructive, they can insist that Mr. Bush and his generals truly implement the strategy he is now endorsing. The path Democrats have followed in the minority and are now continuing will only make U.S. success harder -- a truth the American people will come to understand, and resent.

Damaging National Security (WT)

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The Democrats had tried several pre-emptive strikes against President Bush's speech last night about how to win the war in Iraq. The president, in our view, is right to send additional troops to Baghdad and other violent areas of Iraq to stanch the blood-letting and enable the Iraqi government to impose its authority over the nation. But in addition to opposing measures to end the war, the House would now undermine national security.

Buried inside the legislation hurried through the House on Tuesday, as part of the Democrats' goal of implementing September 11 commission recommendations, is a provision that would damage a successful multilateral program to combat the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction: the Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI). The PSI was largely responsible for persuading Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi to terminate his search for atomic weapons and for unravelling the nuclear proliferation network run by the notorious A.Q. Khan of Pakistan. Unfortunately, this legislation has the potential to wreak damage by bringing the U.N. Security Council into the process.

The legislation, pushed by prominent members of the House Democratic leadership, including Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos and Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, urges "with a particular emphasis" that the president work with the Security Council (where Russia and China, serial proliferators of weapons of mass destruction, have a veto) to "authorize the PSI under international law." During Tuesday's debate, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican, offered an amendment to strike the provision, but it was defeated on a party-line 230-198 vote.

Given its extraordinary record of achievement, it is difficult to see how the initiative, largely the work of John Bolton as undersecretary of state in 2003, could be strengthened by the U.N. Security Council. The United States oversees the program, which sets out principles and steps for interdicting shipments of weapons of mass destruction. More than 70 nations have committed to PSI's antiproliferation principles. In October 2003, operating under the auspices of the initiative, U.S. warships seized uranium-enrichment gas centrifuge components bound for Libya's covert program aboard the BBC China, a German-owned vessel. Libya subsequently renounced nuclear weapons, and its revelations led to the unraveling of the Khan network -- which had played a key role in helping Iran develop the ability to use gas centrifuges to enrich uranium. If the Proliferation Security Initiative had been in place throughout the 1980s and 1990s, Iran might not be on the brink of developing nuclear weapons today.

Although the informal, voluntary structure of the initiative has been essential to its success, this would likely be jeopardized by the Democrats' insistence that the Security Council and the U.N. bureaucracy be brought into play. This would empower both China and Russia, which have helped along the Iranian and North Korean nuclear weapons programs, with increased ability to make mischief. If the Senate refuses to strip this irresponsible provision from the bill, Mr. Bush should consider doing it himself with a veto.

At Least Bush Wants To Win (LAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

Bush sticks to his goal of winning in Iraq. The Democrats are just stuck.

AMERICANS ARE torn between two irreconcilable positions on the Iraq war. Some want the war to be a success — variously defined — and some want the war to be over. Conservatives are basically, but not exclusively, in the "success" camp. Liberals (and those further to the left) are basically, but not exclusively, the "over" party. And many people are suffering profound cognitive dissonance by trying to believe these two positions can be held simultaneously. The motives driving these various positions range from the purely patriotic to the coldly realistic to the cravenly political or psychological perfervid. Parsing motives is exhausting and pointless, but one fact remains: "End it now" and "win it eventually" cannot be reconciled.

With last night's speech, President Bush made it clear that he will settle for nothing less than winning it. He may be deluding himself, and his plan may not work, but he at least has done the nation the courtesy of saying what his position is, despite an antagonistic political establishment and a hostile public. What is maddening is that the Democratic leadership cannot, or will not, clearly tell the American people whether they are the party of "end it" or "win it."

Give Sen. Ted Kennedy his due. He not only wants the thing over, consequences be damned, but he's got the courage to admit it, as he did on Tuesday at the National Press Club. But when House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid come to a fork in the road, they follow Yogi Berra's advice and take it. On the one hand, they tell the president that they want this war "brought to a close." On the other, they refuse to use their power of the purse to do exactly that, opting instead for a symbolic resolution. It may be the wisest political course for them, but it does a disservice to the nation by making the Iraq debate the equivalent of boxing with fog.

Here we have a president forthrightly trying to win a war, and the opposition — which not long ago was in favor of increasing troops, when Bush was against that — won't say what it wants. This is flatly immoral. If you believe the war can't be won and there's nothing to be gained by staying, then, to paraphrase Sen. John Kerry, you're asking more men to die for a mistake. You should demand withdrawal. But that might cost votes, so the Dems don't. And, of course, Kerry, Pelosi and other Democrats were in favor of more troops before they were against it.

Another Democratic dodge is the incessant demand for a "political solution" in Iraq. "What is absolutely clear to me is there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq, that only political solutions are going to bring about some semblance of peace," Sen. Barack Obama declared. This is either childishly naive or reprehensibly dishonest. No serious person thinks that peace can be secured without a political solution. The question is how to get one. And nobody — and I mean nobody — has made a credible case that the Iraqis can get from A to B without more bloodshed, with or without American support.

Saying we need a political solution is as helpful as saying "give peace a chance." Peace requires more than such pie-eyed verbiage. In the real world, peace has no chance until the people who want to give death squads another shot have been dispatched from the scene. It reminds me of the liberal obsession in the 1980s with getting inner-city gangs to settle their differences with break-dance competitions. If only Muqtada Sadr would moonwalk to peace!

Last night, Bush finally acknowledged what Americans already knew: The war has not gone well. But he also acknowledged what few Democrats are willing to admit: If we leave — i.e. lose — it will be a disaster, a geostrategic calamity for the United States and quite possibly a genocidal one for the Iraqis. It's long since forgotten, but perhaps the chief moral argument against the Iraq war in 2003 was that it would create an enormous humanitarian crisis in the form of refugees spilling over the borders, which in turn would destabilize the region. That didn't happen. But it would be the most likely result of a U.S. withdrawal now. Yet that's a risk the antiwar crowd is suddenly willing to take.

Bush declared last night that "victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved. There will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship…. A democratic Iraq will not be perfect." This sober, stubborn emphasis on victory puts Bush at odds with much of official Washington. He wisely refused to abdicate his war responsibilities to lead to the Iraq Study Group, and instead launched a broader effort to find a way to win in Iraq — a goal former Secretary of State James A. Baker III explicitly dismissed.

Bush came up with the "surge" plan. Will it work? Nobody knows. But the one thing the American people know about George W. Bush is that he wants to win the war. What the Democrats believe is anybody's guess.

Democrats Should Give Bush Final Chance To Win Iraq (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

Politically and militarily, this is President Bush's last chance to avoid catastrophe in Iraq and the Democratic Congress ought to let him play out his hand.

Hard as it might be, Democrats should resist extreme pressure from anti-war forces in their base to undermine what little is left of Bush's popular support and force a withdrawal from Iraq.

The reason is that if the United States loses the Iraq War, the consequences will be dire — and a Democratic president elected in 2008 may well have to deal with them.

That president could inherit an Iraq in all-out civil war, regional chaos pitting Sunnis against Shiites and — worst of all — the collapse of American influence and the triumph of radical Islamist forces, Iran in the lead.

Iraq will not be the last theater of combat between radicalism and moderation, but wherever the next confrontation is — in Lebanon, Egypt, Iran or Saudi Arabia — the United States will be at an automatic disadvantage if it loses in Iraq.

It will be all the worse if the U.S. loses because Osama bin Laden is proved right in saying that the United States lacks the tenacity for any long and difficult struggle.

So, if there is any chance that the Bush administration can succeed in bringing security to the blood-soaked neighborhoods of Baghdad and in suppressing the Sunni insurgency in Anbar province, it ought to be given a last try.

There is certainly no guarantee that Bush's new strategy will work, especially given past failures. In fact, it is easy to list the reasons why we might fail again.

At the top of the list is the inability or unwillingness — so far — of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government to stop Shiite death squads from torturing and killing Sunnis and to offer the political concessions necessary to dampen the non-al-Qaida Sunni insurgency.

Responsible Democrats — those who don't just want to abandon the Iraq enterprise regardless of the consequences — contend that the only way to force al-Maliki to act is to establish a withdrawal timetable.

Bush does not want to do that because it will give notice to America's enemies that they can just wait for U.S. forces to leave to resume a full-force insurgency.

But Bush needs to tell al-Maliki, if he doesn't understand it already, that time is running very short. Administration officials say they think they have until this fall — nine months or so — to show results.

This strikes me as optimistic. The bottom is dropping out of U.S. support for the war — fast. And the pressure is mounting on Democrats to pull the plug. The latest Gallup Poll showed that the public opposes Bush's troop increase by 61 percent to 37 percent. Eighty-five percent of Democrats oppose it.

Only 15 percent favored immediate withdrawal, but 39 percent more wanted U.S. troops out within a year, while only 31 percent supported their staying as long as needed and 12 percent favored adding more troops.

Administration officials say that al-Maliki is aware of what's expected of him — and by when — and that he is working on diminishing the influence of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, controlling his militias and compromising with Sunnis. Everything depends on his acting fast, however.

Another reason to be pessimistic is that, whenever Iraqi forces have been asked to "stand up" to the challenge of securing Baghdad, they've largely failed.

Bush told Members of Congress on Tuesday that he believed two previous Baghdad security operations failed, both because the U.S. had too few troops and because Iraqis could not hold neighborhoods that had been cleared of extremists.

Now, Bush is adding 15,000 U.S. troops to Baghdad and al-Maliki is supposedly supplying an equal number of his best forces, the first of which are to arrive by Feb. 1.

This is do or die. If the operation begins to show promise, it could turn around both Iraqi and U.S. public opinion. But if reports are that Americans are fighting and dying, but Iraqis aren't, demands for withdrawal will become irresistible.

It also remains to be seen whether even U.S. forces can perform this counter-insurgency mission successfully. The new U.S. commanding general in Iraq, David Petraeus, is an expert on such combat and has a record of success in previous Iraq tours.

The U.S. Army's new counter-insurgency manual, written under Petraeus' supervision, declares that "the military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war" and instead protect and win support from the local populace.

It remains a question whether U.S. units will be numerous enough — and well-trained enough — to perform the mission. It's appropriate for Congress to inquire about that — and make sure training is adequate for counter-insurgency operations in the future. There will be more.

Democrats have every right and responsibility to ask hard questions about Bush's strategy and to advocate alternatives — such as moving U.S. troops out of populated areas to guard Iraq's borders and oil wells, leaving urban combat to the Iraqis.

At the moment, that does not seem to be a viable strategy, given the deficiencies of Iraqi forces, but it could be a transition role when and if the Iraqis can take charge of the cities.

If they can't or won't — and if al-Maliki can't or won't reach accommodation with the Sunnis — the U.S. may have to consider yet another alternative: the "80 percent solution," in which we back the likely winners of a civil war in Iraq, the Shiites and Kurds.

This would not be a desirable conclusion — one advocate calls it "winning dirty" — but it may be the only alternative to losing Iraq, the region and U.S. influence in the world.

Now that they have taken over Congress, Democrats have a responsibility to do more than simply oppose Bush and his policies. If there is any possibility that the United States and its interests can still succeed in Iraq, they need to help it happen.

It's very possible that America will fail. If so, Democrats should give no one the opportunity to say that they precipitated it.

Take The Lead (WT)

By Terry Michael

It's hard to get out of a deal with the devil.

That's the congressional Democrats' dilemma, as they continue to treat the Iraq war as a speed bump on their pathway to the perks of restored power, rather than as a moral question to which voters loudly demanded a moral answer two months ago.

Take Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware. "There's not much I can do about it," responded the Democratic "leader" on foreign policy, when asked on one of the Sunday venues for pompous pontificators how he would respond to any attempt by President Bush to escalate the war in Iraq (or "surge," if you prefer it in Orwellian newspeak).

This is a man who sees a future president during his morning look in the mirror. Sadly, the glass reflects an empty suit who embodies the congressional Democrats' decision to reduce action on Iraq to a political calculus appropriate for the highway appropriations bill, rather than as a moral imperative to challenge a policy that has sent thousands of twenty-somethings to their deaths in the desert.

You certainly can do something about it, Senator. It's called leadership. You rise on the Senate floor. You say you were out of your mind to write a blank check for this hideous misprojection of American military power. And then you propose immediate withdrawal, just slow enough to maximize the safety of the 135,000 mostly young men and women you helped put in harm's way by your collusion with this elective war. You do what Republican Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon had the guts to do last month, stopping just short of accurately labeling this public policy obscenity a criminal enterprise.

I have lived in these 10 surreal square miles for over three decades, usually playing by the rules of decorum required by the political and media classes, first as a young congressional aide, later as a national party committee and presidential campaign operative, and now as an aging educator of journalism students who want to spend their careers interpreting politics.

But, like millions of other Americans, I can no longer contain the primal scream I want to direct at the members of my party who declined to engage a real debate in the run-up to this completely avoidable misjudgment of old men and women, willing to send boys and girls to die for their ideological hallucinations and political cowardice.

Non-existent, and certainly non-threatening WMDs. A secularist paper-tiger dictator, despised by the Islamist lunatics who actually had anything to do with September 11. A tribal, theocratic culture with zero indigenous movement for pluralistic democracy.

All of those things were knowable when congressional Democrats like Mr. Biden had an opportunity to stop this madness before it started. Some of them actually shared the neoconservative pretensions of a new American imperialism. But most just quaked in their permanent campaign boots, fearing being labeled Cold War-style liberal wimps. They averted their eyes and closed their mouths instead of acting like a responsible opposition party four years ago.

So, trying to finesse their way out of their Faustian bargain, Democrats now engage in a transparent antiwar vamp, with limp proposals to implement the September 11 commission report and half-measures opposing escalation. And they receive aid and comfort from misguided and timid editorial pages, like those of The Washington Post and The New York Times, which also colluded with power in the run-up to Iraq instead of challenging it, and which now circumscribe discourse with the narrow frame of how best to muddle on through rather than promote an honest debate about whether to stay or go.

Where are the Gordon Smith's in the Democratic Party? Where are the conviction politicians willing to spend political capital to lead a citizenry which has decided overwhelmingly that this war is crazy? Where are the institutions of media power with the courage to say the emperor has no cowboy boots, no jeans, no garments at all — just a hideous, stubborn smirk that is literally making this country ill and squandering our reputation around the globe?

I long for a principled politician like my ex-boss Paul Simon, who would have had the courage and the moral authority to take the Senate floor and demand an end to this madness. Instead, the only place I can find truth speaking to power is on a cable

TV comedy channel, not in the chambers of what used to be called the greatest deliberative body in the world. Is anybody out there willing to lead?

To Counter Iran's Role In Iraq, Bush Moves Beyond Diplomacy (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — In promising to stop Iran from meddling in Iraq, President Bush returned Wednesday night to a strategy of confrontation in dealing with Tehran, casting aside what had been a limited flirtation with a more diplomatic approach toward it.

Mr. Bush accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," he said in his speech. "We will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Mr. Bush said the United States would send another aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to the Persian Gulf. Administration officials said the battle group would be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran, a response to the growing concern that Iran is building up its own missile capacity and naval power, with the goal of military dominance in the gulf.

Mr. Bush also announced the deployment of Patriot missiles to protect America's gulf allies. A battery of such missiles is already in Qatar, having been moved there several months ago.

The more combative talk reflects increased frustration in the administration with Iran, which American officials blame for part of the rising death toll in Iraq.

Military officials in Baghdad say they have documented a gradual rise in the number of sophisticated roadside bombs using "shaped charges" — a type of weapon that commanders believe is imported from Iran. According to military statistics, 78 coalition troops were killed and 243 were wounded by these bombs between September and December of last year, compared with 53 killed by the bombs in the previous nine months.

American officials have provided members of Congress information to support the claim that Iran is helping to orchestrate attacks on Americans in Iraq, but the administration has not made that information public.

The American officials say that the Revolutionary Guard's Quds force trains inside Iran and then dispatches operatives into Iraq, using contacts with Iraqi Shiite militias to attack American troops.

"They're training to kill coalition forces," said one senior American counterterrorism official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Their comments about wanting to see a stable Iraq are belied by this type of activity."

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, told Congress late last year that while he was originally skeptical of reports of Iranian operations inside Iraq, he now had the "zeal of a convert" on the matter.

One American official who recently returned from a trip to Baghdad said American commanders in Iraq believed that Iran was using its vast political influence to press Shiite politicians not to forge any long-term agreements with Sunnis.

"We caught them with their finger in the cookie jar last month," a senior administration official said, referring to the arrest of five Iranians in Iraq whom the Americans accused of running guns and planning sectarian attacks. The Iranians were eventually released by Iraqi authorities.

American officials maintain that the latest moves should not be seen as preparations for a military strike against Iran. But they also said that Mr. Bush's top deputies, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, had decided that, barring some major conciliatory move from Tehran, American moves to engage Iran had run their course.

The United States has grown frustrated with what one administration official described as the "molasseslike" pace of diplomatic efforts at the United Nations to impose broad sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

The Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 with sanctions intended to curb Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European nations contend is for the purpose of creating nuclear arms. The measure bars the trade of goods or technology related to Iran's nuclear program.

But American officials acknowledge that the resolution is too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear program and are seeking to increase economic and psychological pressure on Iran. The United States is pressing governments and financial institutions in Europe, Japan and China to cut some of their financial ties with Iran.

For instance, during talks in Washington last week between Ms. Rice and visiting Vice Foreign Minister Yang Jiechi of China, American officials urged Beijing to abandon a proposal for a $16 billion natural gas deal for the China National Offshore Oil Corporation to develop Iran's North Pars gas field, American officials said. The Chinese assured the United States that a decision was not imminent, American officials said.

Mr. Bush is expected to seek to apply pressure to other countries to limit their dealings with Iran in the coming month. American officials are hoping that the economic pressure will also persuade Iran not to actively oppose the new Bush strategy in Iraq.

Iraq PM Cracks Down In Shiite Militiamen (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Qassim Abdul-Zahra

Iraq's prime minister has told Shiite militiamen to surrender their weapons or face an all-out assault, part of a commitment President Bush outlined on Wednesday to bring violence under control with a more aggressive Iraqi Army and 21,500 additional American troops.

Senior Iraqi officials said Wednesday that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, under pressure from the U.S., has agreed to crack down on the fighters even though they are loyal to his most powerful political ally, the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Previously, al-Maliki had resisted the move.

Bush laid out his new plan to quell violence in and around the Iraqi capital in a televised address to the nation Wednesday night. In earlier operations, the president said, "political and sectarian interference prevented Iraqi and American forces from going into neighborhoods that are home to those fueling the sectarian violence.

"This time, Iraqi and American forces will have a green light to enter those neighborhoods," Bush said. "Prime Minister Maliki has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated."

Before Bush spoke, a senior Shiite legislator and close al-Maliki adviser said the prime minister had warned that no militias would be spared in the crackdown.

"The government has told the Sadrists: 'If we want to build a state we have no other choice but to attack armed groups,'" said the legislator, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the prime minister.

Bush warned that the U.S. expected al-Maliki to keep those promises.

"America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

Al-Maliki on Saturday announced that his government would implement a new security plan for Baghdad, which consists of neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweeps by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops.

In the past, the Iraqi government has tried to prevent American military operations against the Mahdi Army, while giving U.S. forces a free hand against Sunni militants. The Bush administration has pushed al-Maliki, who took office in May, to curb his militia allies or allow U.S. troops to do the job.

Although al-Maliki withdrew political protection from the Mahdi Army, there was no guarantee the Shiite fighters would be easily routed from the large and growing area of Baghdad under their control.

The militia has more fighters, weapons and sophistication today than it did in 2004, when it battled U.S. forces to a standstill in two strongholds, the Shiite holy city of Najaf and Sadr City, Baghdad's sprawling Shiite slum.

Sunni militants, meanwhile, have put up fierce resistance in the five days since al-Maliki announced his new security initiative for Baghdad.

Iraqi and U.S. troops have battled Sunni insurgents along Haifa Street in central Baghdad in two major battles.

The neighborhood is only about 2 1/2 miles north of the Green Zone, site of the Iraqi government headquarters, the U.S. Embassy and base for thousands of American soldiers.

Eighty suspected insurgents were killed in the fighting — 50 of them on Tuesday alone, in an assault backed by U.S. troops, fighter jets and attack helicopters.

Bush said the U.S. will send 21,500 more troops — 17,500 of them to help pacify Baghdad,

The increase in troop levels was part of a larger military and economic effort intended to turn around a 3 1/2-year-old war that has cost the U.S. hundreds of billions of dollars and more than 3,000 lives.

In preparation for the new security plan, the Iraqi military will bring two brigades from northern Iraq, a region largely populated by Kurds, and one from the south.

Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died, many of them in the capital in the past year — after the war became a religious conflict between Sunnis and Shiites. Sectarian violence began after the February bombing of a major Shiite shrine by al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Maliki has not commented on the Bush administration's plans to create a set of benchmarks to measure the Iraqi government's progress on improving security.

Washington wants the prime minister to come up with a plan to equitably share the country's oil wealth, ease restrictions on former Baath Party members and hold provincial elections — steps regarded as critically important to drawing Sunnis into the political process.

An Iraqi general, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose details of the plan, said a mainly Kurdish force would be sent into the Sadr City slum in northeast Baghdad, which serves as headquarters of the Mahdi Army.

The general said Kurds, who are Sunni but not Arab, were being used against the Shiite militia because soldiers from other Iraqi units were likely to refuse to fight fellow Shiites. An estimated 80 percent of Iraq's army is Shiite.

Under the new security plan, the general said, U.S. and Iraqi troops will sweep Baghdad neighborhoods in an effort to dislodge the Mahdi Army, as well as Sunni extremists — including al-Qaida in Iraq and two of its allied groups, the Ansar al-Sunnah Army and the Omar Brigade.

Iraqi and U.S. officials said Iraqi commanders will be put in charge of each of nine city districts. Each commander will operate independently of Iraqi military headquarters.

Al-Maliki has named Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, an Iraqi general who was taken prisoner of war by U.S. forces during the 1991 Gulf war, as the overall commander.

Gambar, a Shiite, will have two assistants, one from the police and one from the army, Iraqi military officers said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information. Gambar will report directly to al-Maliki.

The Americans plan to put 400 to 600 U.S. soldiers in each district as a backup force, a senior Bush administration official said Wednesday. Others will be held in reserve throughout the capital to deploy quickly on the request of Iraqi commanders.

One senior U.S. official said al-Maliki agreed to stop protecting the Mahdi Army under pressure from both the U.S. and his fellow Iraqis. In a conference call with U.S. reporters, the official said the al-Maliki "plan will work" because it frees his military from political and sectarian influence.

The latest drive to pacify Baghdad is at least the fourth since the war began. All have had only limited success, with insurgents and militants swiftly returning to neighborhoods after U.S. and Iraqi military forces departed.

In the most recent of these operations, Iraq's army fielded fewer troops than promised. That made it impossible to maintain control of areas that U.S. forces had cleared of gunmen.

Police on Wednesday reported that at least 92 people had died violently or been found dead across the country.

In a single deadly attack, Sunni gunmen opened fire on a convoy of buses carrying Shiite Muslim pilgrims home from the hajj, the annual pilgrimage to Muslim holy places in Saudi Arabia, according to police and Akeel al-Khazaali, the governor of the southern province of Karbala.

At least 11 people were killed and 14 wounded. Al-Khazaali told Iraqi state television that some of the slain pilgrims had been severely burned in the ambush, which occurred about 75 miles west of the Shiite holy city of Karbala.

Police said 60 bodies, many of them victims of torture, were found in Baghdad Wednesday. Seven more were discovered in the northern city of Mosul. Shootings, mortar attacks and bombings at various places around Iraq claimed another 14 lives.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday that four more American soldiers died of combat wounds in Iraq. A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division died Tuesday from a gunshot wound sustained in the Diyala province northeast of Baghdad.

Two more soldiers died the same day in Iraq's western Anbar province. One was assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group, and one was assigned to 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division.

A 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) Soldier was killed by a roadside bomb outside of Fallujah.

New Baghdad Approach Features 'Gated Communities' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The military's new strategy for Iraq envisions creating so-called "gated communities" in Baghdad -- sealing off discrete areas and forcibly removing insurgents, then working to create jobs for residents and stationing American units in the neighborhood to keep the peace.

The United States previously has found it nearly impossible to secure the sprawling city. But by focusing an increased number of troops in selected neighborhoods, the military hopes it can create islands of security segregated from the chaos.

The gated-communities plan has been tried -- with mixed success -- in other wars. In Vietnam, they were called "strategic hamlets" and were a spectacular failure. But counterinsurgency experts say that such security zones can work if, once the barriers are established, the military follows up with neighborhood sweeps designed to flush out insurgents and militia fighters.

The strategy, described in broad terms by current and former defense officials, is an attempt to recreate the successes that military units have had in smaller Iraqi cities, most notably Tall Afar.

For the past two years, the U.S. military has been focused primarily on training Iraqi security forces. Under the new plan in Baghdad, the primary mission of U.S. combat forces will be to protect Iraqis living in the city.

"In counterinsurgency, by now we have all figured out, the population is the prize," one defense official said.

Critics of the troop increase have said that the sheer size of Baghdad, with its population of nearly 6 million people, makes it impossible to replicate the Tall Afar strategy. But counterinsurgency experts say the gated-communities concept is a way to concentrate troops on smaller sections of Baghdad.

"You do it neighborhood by neighborhood," the defense official said.

A neighborhood of Baghdad could be sealed off by using a highway or a river as a barrier, or creating roadblocks and checkpoints between neighborhoods, counterinsurgency experts said.

White House officials outlined a plan Wednesday to divide Baghdad into nine districts and to station U.S. battalions and Iraqi forces in each. Moving units out of the super bases that surround Baghdad and into urban neighborhoods is critical to making any gated-communities plan work, defense officials said.

Senior administration officials have said that the new plan would be led by Iraqis. But the intense violence gripping Baghdad will require that American units be used to quiet the fighting initially.

In Tall Afar, a town of 150,000 people, U.S. forces built a berm around the city to control access, then swept through to rout insurgents and al-Qaida members. The military followed up by establishing combat outposts throughout the city where small units of soldiers could have a round-the-clock neighborhood presence. The offensive was combined with a push by military leaders to reconcile Shiite and Sunni factions in the city.

Ideally, once a neighborhood is cleared and regular patrols begin, U.S. forces would have to fight less. Advocates of the approach say that gated communities will allow the U.S. and Iraqi militaries to ease Iraqis' fears of being victims of sectarian violence.

"You can create gated communities because the population wants them, because the population wants to feel secure," the defense official said. "Or you can create them to control the population and its movements, and make it more difficult for insurgents to operate. That is the theory behind it."

It is not clear which Baghdad neighborhoods will become gated communities, or how many such enclaves will be created. So far, the Iraqi government has largely restricted operations in Shiite neighborhoods. Defense officials say it is critical that the new plan allow U.S. forces to operate in both Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods.

The gated-communities model is an updated version of the strategic hamlets used in the Vietnam War. Under that strategy, people were moved to villages that the military believed it could defend.

"It didn't work," said Conrad Crane, one of the authors of the military's counterinsurgency manual. "They ended up locking up the insurgents with the population in these new hamlets .... It actually helped the Viet Cong with recruiting."

The strategy worked when the British used it in Malaya in the 1950s, successfully cutting off insurgents from the population and from supplies, Crane said. The technique was first developed by the French when fighting insurgents in Algiers, and it was successfully used in Northern Ireland cities, said Marine Lt. Col. Lance A. McDaniel, another author of the military counterinsurgency manual.

In Iraq, Crane said, the strategy could work because it would not involve moving people out of their neighborhoods.

"It would be done with much more cultural sensitivity," Crane said. "You are trying to identify who belongs and who doesn't."

Keeping U.S. forces inside the communities is vital to the success of such strategies, McDaniel said.

"You have a unit which has responsibility for an area and they are doing active patrolling day and night with the Iraqi security forces," he said. "People get to know you. It is a lot different than holing up in a base somewhere and going through a few times a day."

Counterinsurgency experts said that, once U.S. and Iraqi forces succeeded in holding an area, they could use reconstruction money to create jobs for citizens there. The hope is that, with improved stability and jobs programs, the zone of security could expand throughout Baghdad.

A Diplomat Who Loves The Really Tough Jobs (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

In Harm's Way Is Where Ryan Crocker Thrives

On April 18, 1983, Ryan Crocker was in his office at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, with its spectacular view overlooking the Mediterranean. His wife, Christine, was working next door. At 1:05 p.m. a dark delivery van made a sharp left onto the guarded cobblestone lane and rammed into the front wall, detonating an explosive that ripped apart the seven-story high-rise. A huge brown cloud of smoke could be seen for miles.

It was the first suicide bombing by Islamic extremists against a U.S. target.

Crocker -- the career diplomat the Bush administration has nominated to serve as U.S. ambassador in Baghdad -- was blown against the wall. Bloodied but not seriously injured, he and his wife fled the building. He then began to search through the twisted steel and concrete for colleagues.

New York Times correspondent Thomas Friedman lived nearby and raced to the site. "I came around the corner and there was the American Embassy cut in half like a doll's house, bodies hanging out of it, smoke belching, and the first person I saw staggering around in the ruins was Ryan, his sleeves rolled up, looking in the rubble," Friedman recalls.

The bomb, which killed 64 and wiped out the CIA station, marked the start of a trend that now defines U.S. foreign policy.

If there's an awful assignment in the Middle East or South Asia, Crocker, 57, has had it. He actually prefers the hot spots, colleagues say.

The toughest hardship assignment for Crocker -- and the only one he tries to avoid -- is Washington, says former ambassador Edward Abington. "He prefers the most difficult posts. There's a real sense of adventure in him," Abington says.

Seven months before the Beirut attack, I encountered Crocker after a right-wing Christian militia entered the Beirut slums of Sabra and Shatila and, in a 48-hour orgy of killing, murdered some 800 people, including many women, children and the elderly.

Journalists were among the first to go into the area after the militia left, but when many of us arrived, Crocker and his wife were already surveying the bloodshed and streets littered with bodies.

"With a hand-held transmitter, he was walking through the Shatila refugee camp and describing as he moved scenes of a massacre of shocking magnitude," wrote former secretary of state George Shultz in his autobiography, "Turmoil and Triumph."

The massacre followed the assassination of Lebanon's Christian President-elect Bashir Gemayel.

"I was on the phone with him for hours trying to confirm whether or not Gemayel was dead," recalls former U.S. assistant secretary of state Elizabeth Jones. "We had been burned with the [former Egyptian president Anwar] Sadat assassination, so we had to have someone see the body or say that he was still alive."

Crocker was dispatched. "He's extremely tough-minded about what needs to be done even in the worst tragedy," Jones says.

He now appears headed to Baghdad as part of a personnel sweep that is bringing a whole new set of faces to the top of diplomatic and military jobs as part of President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq.

For Crocker, an Air Force officer's son who attended schools in Morocco, Turkey and Canada, it's coming full circle.

He first went to Baghdad as a young economic officer, a year before Saddam Hussein seized power in 1979. Baghdad had broken off relations with Washington, so the United States had an interest section. U.S. diplomats were under 24-hour surveillance and banned from leaving Baghdad without government permission.

"It was very difficult to make contact with Iraqis, as it was so dangerous for them," says Jones, who was posted in Baghdad as political officer. "Saddam executed most of his first cabinet, so we already knew what a difficult person we were dealing with. . . . Ryan was the best at triangulating the situation and figuring out what was happening."

Iraq then invaded Iran in 1980, setting off the bloodiest and longest modern Middle East war. Crocker and Jones had to evacuate Americans, but stay themselves.

Crocker met and married his wife, Christine, a foreign service secretary, in Baghdad. The two have been inseparable ever since, colleagues say.

Almost a quarter-century later, Crocker was one of the most significant voices inside the administration about the dangers of invading Iraq.

In late 2002, as the Bush administration prepared for war, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell tasked Crocker and Assistant Secretary of State William Burns with exploring the risks of military intervention. The result was a six-page memo they entitled "The Perfect Storm," according to an account in Washington Post reporter Karen DeYoung's biography "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell."

The memo bluntly predicted that toppling Hussein could unleash long-repressed sectarian and ethnic tensions, that the Sunni minority would not easily relinquish power, and that powerful neighbors such as Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia would try to move in to influence events. It also cautioned that the United States would have to start from scratch building a political and economic system because Iraq's infrastructure was in tatters.

Crocker returned to Iraq after the 2003 U.S. invasion to help during the transition and the creation of the Coalition Provisional Authority. He left that July, a time when he and colleagues could still drive to farewell meetings in the capital in unarmored vans.

The night before he left, Jalal Talabani, the Kurdish leader who is now Iraq's president, threw a large and raucous party for Crocker, who told colleagues in frustration that he was returning to Washington to teach at National Defense University for a year and then retire.

"He has often been critical of policies he has been charged with implementing and had little success in persuading the political leadership to change," says a former colleague who requested anonymity in light of the new appointment.

Iraq will be his fifth embassy as ambassador -- sixth if you count reopening the embassy in Afghanistan after the United States ousted the Taliban in 2001. He also was the top U.S. envoy in Lebanon (again), Syria, Pakistan and Kuwait. Each has involved personal danger or crisis.

Christine on a line that connected directly to Washington from the residence and on a separate phone to Ryan, who had raced home to help his wife but was stuck outside. The place was so badly trashed that they had to move out.

Though President Bush gave him the State Department's most prestigious title of "career ambassador" in 2004, Crocker is little known outside diplomatic circles and intensely private -- a stark contrast to the flamboyant and media-ready current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. Crocker is also an unassuming diplomat in a profession known for its dapper suits and fancy dress.

He drove a pickup truck in Washington, and Crocker coined the term "no socks required" to describe attire at parties he and his wife host.

David Mack, a retired diplomat who served with Crocker in Iraq and Lebanon, still remembers dinners of "cold Spam and peas eaten with crackers" when he stayed at the Crockers' Beirut apartment.

A Red Sox fanatic, Crocker favors heavy metal and hard-rock jam groups, including Iron Maiden and Black Crowes, colleagues say.

Crocker gets through most of his tough assignments by running. The day before the embassy blew up in Beirut in 1983, he ran in the first -- and some say only -- marathon held in Lebanon. Mack, now vice president of the Middle East Institute, recalls how Crocker took him out running along Beirut's seafront Corniche, during the middle of the civil war.

Crocker has now run in marathons on four continents, including a 50-kilometer race in Jordan. He also ran a 10-kilometer uphill race to the top of Mount Hermon in the Golan Heights that was particularly painful, he told colleagues. As a young foreign service officer learning Arabic, he had to take a field trip to use the language, and he chose to live with a Bedouin tribe of sheepherders in Jordan. He made that choice so he could run, according to Frederic C. Hof, who still remembers Crocker's field report.

In his current post in Pakistan, Crocker still regularly runs, often exhorting members of the embassy staff to join him. "His idea of unwinding is running 10 miles with security guys behind him in a four-wheel drive trying to keep up," says retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, who has known Crocker for years and recently visited him in Pakistan. Crocker's favorite run is from outside Islamabad to the border of the Northwest Frontier Province.

During the few times he lived in Washington, Crocker ran most days from Alexandria to the State Department, his clothes in a backpack.

Friends say they can always tell when he's worried about something because he runs longer and harder, getting rail thin in the process.

Crocker is the first career foreign service officer and Arabist to take the Baghdad job, which may put him at a disadvantage in persuading the administration on policy. The three previous U.S. envoys -- Khalilzad, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer -- had all been political appointees who had a direct line into the White House.

"It's going to be a terrible job," says former ambassador to Lebanon Robert Dillon, who was also in the embassy when it blew up. "As a career guy, he's going to be under a lot of pressure and I'm not sure how much support he'll get in Washington."

But diplomats and military officers who have served with him say Crocker, who knows Iraq's tribes as well as its Arabic dialect, was the only realistic choice to deal with the country's labyrinthine politics.

Says Abington, "To the extent anyone can make a difference there, Ryan will."

New US Team In Iraq: Seasoned, But How Tough? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

Bush's military and diplomatic picks have less ideological bent.

As a US diplomat in Lebanon in 1983, Ryan Crocker survived an embassy bombing that revealed America's exposure to a festering civil war - and portended the deepening Middle East divides to come.

DOJ_NMG_0115221

Now Mr. Crocker, the US ambassador to Pakistan, has been tapped by President Bush to join a reshuffled diplomatic and military "Team Iraq." It's an assignment for which a deep knowledge of the political and cultural complexities at play, both in Iraq and regionally, will be a huge plus.

Crocker - who is part of the crucial policymaker portion of the new Iraq strategy that Mr. Bush is scheduled to announce Wednesday night - would become the top US diplomat in Iraq as ambassador in Baghdad. As such, he would join a new team whose goal will be to stave off full-blown civil war in Iraq, as well as the disastrous regional and security consequences that would be very likely to accompany it.

The team that Bush has freshly assembled, spanning the State Department and the Pentagon, has nothing of the sharp ideological bent that both got the Bush administration's Iraq policy in trouble in the first place and kept it from seeing the policy mistakes that were made, experts say.

But some look beyond the steely professionalism and impressive records of the team members and wonder who among them will play the "bad cop" with the Iraqis - in other words, who will require the political decisions that these experts say will determine whether Iraq can be salvaged or not.

"This is a team of people in their careers 20 to 30 years. They aren't driven by ideology, and they know their stuff," says Edward Walker, a former assistant secretary of State for Near Eastern affairs. "But somebody is going to have to be the tough guy and tell the Iraqis there is no more free ride."

Comparing the place the United States is in now with the war and ethnic cleansing it faced in Bosnia in the 1990s, Ambassador Walker says, "In that mix, you had Richard Holbrooke [former US ambassador to the United Nations], a tough guy who knocked heads together and got the Dayton peace accords. I don't see that player on this team."

Other key shifts in Bush's Iraq team include:

• Returning John Negroponte, who has been director of national intelligence, to the State Department to shoulder the Iraq effort as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. This would free her up to dedicate more time to the broader Middle East.

• Putting Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, a counterinsurgency expert and advocate of deploying more troops in Iraq for a broader security role, in charge of coalition forces in Iraq.

• Nominating Mike McConnell, a retired vice admiral with 25 years of intelligence experience, as director of national intelligence to replace Mr. Negroponte.

• Choosing Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador to Iraq, to replace John Bolton as US ambassador to the UN. Shift began with Rumsfeld's exit

The shifting of policymakers actually started last November with the replacement of Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense by former CIA Director Robert Gates. Mr. Rumsfeld's views, which held that a light US footprint would be enough to husband the transition to a stable and democratic Iraq, did not fit with Bush's conclusion that more troops would be needed to secure Baghdad and give the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki a chance to succeed.

In a sense, the departure of Rumsfeld was like the changing of the guard at the White House information and influence gate: Advocates of what was to become the president's "way forward" suddenly had better access to Bush.

"The centerpiece [of our military strategy in Iraq] has always been 'develop the Iraqi Security Forces' - not 'defeat the insurgency,' " says retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, an advocate of a large and sustained troop increase.

Now a consultant who has prepared annual assessments of Iraq security for the Pentagon, General Keane met with Bush in mid-December to discuss a revised strategy. His visit exemplified how the White House became more accessible to war-escalation advocates after Rumsfeld's departure.

Key to the policy shift was the naming of General Petraeus as senior US commander in Iraq. The guiding force behind the military's new counterinsurgency manual, Petraeus has long differed with the emphasis on training Iraqi forces over providing civilian security.

He is "the most qualified general officer we have to undertake this change in Iraq strategy," says Keane.

In Iraq during the invasion as leader of the 101st Airborne Division, Petraeus made known his concerns about the rioting and lawlessness that was allowed to boil over in Baghdad after the ouster of Saddam Hussein. He later voiced worry about the security impact of disbanding the Iraqi Army.

Those concerns dovetailed with the thinking of Crocker, who was in charge of governance issues in Baghdad for several months after the invasion. Bush's new approach to Joint Chiefs

Until recently, Bush had been deferential to the positions of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, practically making a mantra of saying he adhered to the judgments of his top generals in making military decisions. But the Iraq team reshuffle is evidence that the president is no longer wedded to that approach if it means sticking with policies that clash with his vision.

"The president has retaken control of Iraq strategy," says Frederick Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington and prominent advocate of a large troop increase. "The administration has made itself more independent of the generals."

Independent of the generals, maybe, but still largely dependent on what the Iraqi leadership does. And that means influencing the Iraqi government will be one of the new Iraq team's biggest tests, experts say.

Negroponte and Crocker are "two consummate diplomats," says Mr. Walker, who is an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington, "but maybe too consummate. Neither one is confrontational."

Crocker will be taking the reins of US diplomacy in Baghdad after more than two years in Islamabad - another key US partner in the battle with Islamic extremism.

But the American relationship with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf mirrors the prevailing approach to Mr. Maliki, analysts say, in that the US has not been ready to force either to take the hard steps it would like to see - that is, Mr. Musharraf confronting the Islamist extremists active on the border with Afghanistan, or Maliki disbanding Iraq's militias and pushing through key political decisions like constitutional reforms and oil-revenue legislation.

Crocker, who prefers foreign assignments and has studiously avoided any major policymaking stints in Washington, will be following orders from Washington. Many eyes will be watching for whether the order to "get tough" comes down.

"The administration hasn't been ready to abandon [Musharraf] in that he is the only thing standing between us and an explosive situation in Pakistan that would hurt us," says Walker. "The situation with Maliki is analogous, but I'm not sure this Iraq team is any more prepared to say, 'We're not going over the cliff with you.' "

Violence Claims 99 Iraqis, 3 U.S. Troops (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

BAGHDAD — Suicide bombers, roadside explosions and mortar rounds killed at least 99 Iraqis and wounded 26 across the country Wednesday. The U.S. military said three American troops had been killed in Al Anbar province Tuesday.

In downtown Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi troops continued to search for suspected guerrillas in the largely Sunni Arab Haifa Street neighborhood, making 15 arrests in the second day of an offensive, Iraqi officials said. The assault was launched Monday on fighters who had taken control of the three-mile stretch near the heavily fortified Green Zone, home to the Iraqi government complex and the U.S. Embassy.

A Ministry of Defense official said raids and searches had concluded Wednesday afternoon. Iraqi troops found four bodies in rubble, apparent casualties of Tuesday's fighting in which at least 51 suspected militants were reported killed.

Despite the central Baghdad crackdown, 50 bodies were found in a neighborhood near Haifa Street. Ten more 10 corpses were discovered across the Tigris River in the Rusafa neighborhood. All appeared to have been shot execution-style, Iraqi officials said.

Elsewhere in the downtown area, a bomb blast injured two people. A second bomb damaged water pipes near the Sadr City neighborhood, cutting off supplies to parts of the mostly Shiite Muslim district. Three people were injured by a third blast. The night before, a family of four was killed by a mortar round in Sadr City.

Four mortar rounds struck a house in east Baghdad on Wednesday, killing two people and injuring two.

In Mahmoudiya, south of the capital, two car bombs destroyed a gas station, killing one person and injuring three, not far from where the city council was meeting, Iraqi officials said.

Gunmen attacked a caravan of Shiite pilgrims heading toward the southern city of Karbala, killing 11 and injuring four.

DOJ_NMG_0115223

In the north, a suicide car bomber detonated his explosives close to a convoy carrying the mayor of Tall Afar, killing one person and injuring three police officers, Iraqi officials said. The mayor survived.

In downtown Tall Afar, a suicide bomber wearing a vest packed with explosives killed four people and injured a dozen. In Mosul, police recovered three bodies from various neighborhoods.

In Babil, south of Baghdad, authorities recovered five bodies.

Near the Syrian border in Al Anbar province, four bodies were found. All bore signs of torture.

In Diyala province, where 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have engaged in a weeklong offensive, forces recovered caches containing 1,172 Katyusha rockets, 1,039 rocket-propelled grenades and 171 missiles, among other weapons. U.S. commanders said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through more than 124 square miles of farmland and palm groves, zeroing in on tunnels and canals that were the scene of fierce fighting in November.

12 Die In Attack On Shiite Pilgrims In West (WP)

By Joshua Partlow, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

More Than 70 People Slain or Found Dead in Baghdad; Two Added to U.S. Toll

BAGHDAD, Jan. 10 -- Two busloads of Shiite Muslims returning from their holy pilgrimage to Mecca were gunned down Wednesday while passing through a predominantly Sunni Muslim swath of western Iraq, news services reported.

The attack on the convoy of pilgrims, who were returning to their homes in southern Iraq from the hajj in Saudi Arabia, killed 12 people and wounded 18, Iraqi state television said. Insurgents have frequently targeted travelers on the highways through the barren desert of western Iraq.

In Iraq's capital, 11 people were killed by bombings in the areas of Palestine Street, Waziriya and New Baghdad, among others, and police patrols found 60 bodies west of the Tigris River, according to Brig. Sadoun Abdul Karim of the Interior Ministry.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two U.S. servicemen -- a soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group and a soldier with the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division -- who were involved in operations in Anbar province on Tuesday.

Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, traveled Wednesday to the holy city of Najaf in southern Iraq to meet with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the revered Shiite cleric who wields considerable influence in Iraqi politics. Rubaie told reporters that he briefed Sistani on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new security plan for the capital, and he suggested that Sistani was receptive to his remarks. But when asked directly whether Sistani gave his explicit approval for the security crackdown, Rubaie demurred.

Sistani "isn't really interfering in the details of the plan. He only emphasized the limiting of weapons to the hands of the state and that the law should be imposed on all Iraqis without any exceptions," Rubaie said.

In northern Iraq, a suicide bomber detonated explosives Wednesday morning at a gathering near a police station in Tall Afar, west of Mosul, killing four people and injuring 10 others, all civilians, said Brig. Gen. Wathiq al-Hamdani, the Nineveh province police chief. A second suicide bomber attacked in Tall Afar near a location where cooking gas is sold, injuring a policeman.

Some parts of Baghdad appeared calmer Wednesday, following a day-long battle involving more than 1,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood along Haifa Street. Iraqi soldiers were in charge of the area, and no U.S. soldiers were present, said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman. "It was quiet there today," he said.

U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Hit 3,017 (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

As of Wednesday, Jan. 10, 2007, at least 3,017 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,423 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0115224

The AP count is nine higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Wednesday at 10 a.m. EST.

The British military has reported 128 deaths; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; Denmark, six; El Salvador, five; Slovakia, four; Latvia, three; Estonia, Netherlands, Thailand, two each; and Australia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Romania, one death each.

The count includes two deaths listed by the Department of Defense that could not be verified as Iraq-related casualties by the AP.

In Baghdad Slum, Sectarian Strife Is Also Child's Play (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin, Jafar Juhi

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

War Games Are Part of Life For Little Hassoni Hussein, A Shiite in Sadr City, Now 5

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A year ago, a young gunman walked into Ali Hussein's living room and drew a weapon. The intruder's head was wrapped in a scarf, leaving a narrow slit for his eyes. His clothes were all black, the favorite attire of a powerful Shiite Muslim militia. He introduced himself as a commander, shouted the incantation "God is greater" and warned Sunni Muslims not to fight back. With that, he raised his plastic pistol.

The gunman's name is Hassoni, and he was only 4 years old at the time. The scene unfolded in his father's house in Baghdad's Sadr City slum, a sprawling Shiite Muslim district stretching toward the eastern edge of the Iraqi capital. "I was happy to see him this way because it means he has courage," Mr. Hussein, 26, said of his son. Since then, Hassoni's favorite game has grown more elaborate, migrating from the living room onto the neighboring streets, drawing in other children and increasingly emulating the violent world of the adults.

As Iraq careers toward full-scale civil war between its Shiite majority and Sunni minority, the culture of celebrating sectarian strife has taken root even among the very young in Sadr City. Home to more than two million people, the Baghdad district is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia blamed for abducting and killing Sunnis. But to Sadr City residents, the Mahdi Army is a revered self-defense force, the only group they see as capable of preventing wholesale slaughter of Shiites at the hands of Sunni extremists. Shiite politicians blame atrocities against Sunnis on rogue forces that falsely claim to represent the real Mahdi Army.

The celebration of sectarian violence is widespread here. Some militia leaders have acquired almost mythical status, including Abu Dera, an elusive gangster alleged to be behind some of the worst sectarian killings of Sunnis. In the lore of the streets, Abu Dera and other fighters are Zorro-like figures who strike into the heart of Sunni neighborhoods, dispense swift revenge and return home unharmed.

Hassoni, who is now 5, spends hours listening to such tales in his family's grocery store, where customers routinely trade stories -- real and imagined -- of Shiite militias fighting Sunni insurgents. Abu Dera became his hero, and his father has helped encourage the adulation by playing songs on his stereo extolling the valor of Shiite gunmen. "Abu Dera is trying to kill the bad guys," said Mr. Hussein, who works as a security guard at the Ministry of Education and sometimes helps patrol his neighborhood.

A friendly boy with striking brown eyes and neatly combed hair falling over his forehead, Hassoni says he wants to grow up to be powerful enough to have a big car and armed guards surrounding him.

When he plays with friends, the boys divide themselves into two groups -- one Shiite and the other Sunni -- and shoot at each other with pellet guns, lurking behind cars and in roadside ditches. "Kids always refuse to be Sunnis, but because they need to play, some of them have to pretend to be Sunnis," said Mr. Hussein, who often watches his son's hours-long battles. Using trash, the children erect their own barricades. Hassoni likes to pretend to be Abu Dera and calls himself the leader of the gang. Other members include a boy nicknamed Bush Senior for his foreign-looking red hair. Hassoni often returns home with torn clothes and pellet bruises.

A few blocks away, Qassim Abdul-Ridha, a father of four, said his 6-year-old son, Karar, and his gang fight street battles against other children, often sending a girl to scout out the rivals' hiding places. Chanting "Muqtada" in homage to Muqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite cleric who leads the Mahdi Army, the boys try to capture their opponents' toy guns as trophies.

The real Mahdi Army is always nearby to provide inspiration. Sometimes, Hassoni hangs around grown-up gunmen manning the real roadblocks and runs errands for them, such as bringing them food and drink. He also gathers war stories and then breathlessly relays them to his parents. The latest tale Hassoni heard on the street involved a group of Shiite gunmen who mounted a rescue mission of Shiite hostages held by Sunni extremists. The gunmen ended up kidnapping the kidnappers and brought them to Sadr City. "He's very excited, always smiling, when he tells us these stories," his father said.

One day, Hassoni brought home a steel pipe he found in a garbage dump and declared it to be a rocket launcher, which he was going to use to fire mortars at Sunni neighborhoods, much as real militiamen do. Asked recently what he thinks of Sunnis, he answered with one word: "terrorists." Together with other children, Hassoni fills empty bottles with sand, and sticks a twig in them to resemble a fuse. The bottles serve as make-believe bombs for use against imaginary Sunnis or American patrols.

Hassoni's arsenal of toy guns has grown from one plastic pistol to include two AK-47 models and a sniper rifle with a scope, now his favorite weapon. Mr. Hussein gave him the rifle as a gift at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan when Iraqi families exchange presents. Hassoni was so excited, his father says, that he paid no attention to a toy train and a toy piano given to him by his mother and aunt. The black life-size rifle looks completely real.

The line between the game and real life has grown increasingly blurry. In late November, suspected Sunni insurgents detonated five car bombs inside Sadr City, killing 240 Shiite civilians, the bloodiest attack since the U.S. invasion in 2003. The blasts occurred just over a mile from Mr. Hussein's house, and Hassoni saw the black plumes of smoke. Later that evening, Hassoni and other children patrolled their street looking for strangers. Hassoni started saying things like, "Sunnis hate us and don't want us to be anywhere near them," his father said.

A few days later, Hassoni and his gang spotted a boy they didn't know. They stopped him and demanded to know what he was doing on their street. "I heard the Mahdi Army saying that if you see strangers, ask them where they come from and what they are doing here," he said. "And that kid was not from our area." When the boy tried to run away, Hassoni and his friends caught him and beat him up.

Later, it turned out that the boy and his parents, all Shiites, were visiting relatives on Hassoni's street. "We had a lot of problems with our neighbors because of this fight," Mr. Hussein recalled. He said he sat his son down for a talk, telling him it is wrong to attack other boys. Hassoni promised to behave but said he will continue looking for strangers on his street.

National Guard Presses Pentagon For Reforms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

DOJ_NMG_0115226

The White House's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq is prompting National Guard officials to step up pressure for changes to mobilization, training and equipment that would have long-term implications for retention and efficiency.

Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard, told The Hill that his troops would be ready to serve — and, in many cases, serve again — in Iraq as part of President Bush's new strategy.

"There is no question in my mind that if the nation needs us, we will do it," he said after an Association of the United States Army breakfast. "It would be a huge mistake to not send the National Guard to shoulder some of that burden."

Nevertheless, he said, "now is the time" to implement changes. "If we do not do that, we risk the ability to sustain an all-volunteer force, in my judgment," Blum warned.

Pentagon policy limits Guard and Reserve units to 24 months of mobilization, or active duty. The Pentagon has interpreted that policy as 24 cumulative rather than consecutive months.

Because the war in Iraq has lasted for almost four years, longer than anticipated, National Guard officials complain that citizen soldiers have been used inefficiently.

Before they deploy overseas, they spend months at mobilization stations to train, which means their first deployments last up to 18 months.

Many Guard members have been deployed overseas as individuals and not as part of their full units, compounding the problem by harming unit cohesion. Many guardsmen have come close to serving 24 months. While the Guard's goal has been to send troops overseas every six years, many have been deployed every three to four years. About 206,000 National Guard soldiers have been deployed to Afghanistan and Iraq.

National Guard officials, who want to see soldiers deploy for only 12 months at a time, would like to maintain a five-year force-generation cycle in which soldiers train for four years to be ready for deployment in the fifth.

According to a Pentagon source, the Army has agreed to reform the mobilization process, but it is unclear whether the Guard would be able to keep the desired force-generation cycle. The Guard would be able to provide troops for 12 straight months and a better schedule would turn out a more dependable force without the need for months of training before deployment.

A new mobilization policy would give the soldiers, their families and their employers more predictability, Blum said. Much of the training could be carried out at their home bases, he added.

"If we had good predictability in a normal National Guard time we would equip and train those people to reduce the time" after they are called on active duty, Blum said.

A change in mobilization and training cannot occur without the proper equipment, he said. Traditionally, the Army shortchanged Guard and Reserve forces on their equipment — the Guard has a $29 billion shortfall in equipment — but the realities of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars are slowly forcing changes.

"If you do not have the equipment, you can't train on it, and that means when you call the unit out it takes extended time to issue the equipment and train on the equipment, learn how to operate it," Blum said. "That is time wasted. The equipment has to be in the soldiers' hands to provide strategic depth to our reserve forces […] and to shorten the time it takes to get units ready to go overseas."

A senior Army budget official said the National Guard now enjoys a "very healthy slice of the procurement dollars."

"There are a lot of resources dedicated to improving that equipment," said Lt. Gen. David Melcher, the Army's budget chief.

Blum expressed optimism that the Pentagon will be open to change.

"I think we are very close to having what I think will be a solution set to that," Blum said. "I think the Army has come to recognize that this is the long war and we have to adopt a strategy for the citizen soldier."

Congressman Under Investigation Steps Aside From Justice Department Budget Work (AP)

AP, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - Rep. Alan Mollohan, under Justice Department investigation about whether he has benefited from directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he helped start, stepped aside Wednesday from working on key elements of the department's budget.

The move came on the day Mollohan, D-W.Va., was named chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee responsible for the department's budget.

Mollohan will not have anything to do with setting the budgets for the attorney general's office, the FBI or the Justice Department's criminal division and prosecuting attorneys, he said in a letter to Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. That way, he can't be accused of using his power as payback for the ongoing investigation or to influence it.

However, Mollohan will still have a big say in other elements of the agency's budget, including allocation of lawmakers' pet projects such as grants to state and local law enforcement agencies.

At issue is at least $202 million of federal funding that Mollohan has steered to five nonprofit groups in his district - with much of the money going to organizations run by people who contribute to the lawmaker's campaigns.

Last year, Mollohan stepped down from the House ethics committee after media reports into his activities, and the FBI soon launched an investigation. A conservative group, the National Legal and Policy Center, has alleged that the 12-term congressman has undervalued his assets in annual financial disclosure reports.

Mollohan and a political action committee he controls have received more than $146,000 in the past 10 years from donors affiliated with these nonprofits.

Earlier this year, the FBI subpoenaed financial records from the nonprofits, though no charges have been filed.

Mollohan has denied any wrongdoing and made the decision to step aside from the Justice Department budget on his own, said his spokesman, Gerry Griffith.

"These charges are rubbish, and whatever financial success my wife and I have had is a result of my wife's expertise and her years of experience in real estate," Mollohan told his Democratic colleagues at a private meeting.

Mollohan nonetheless opted to take himself out of position to consider "any related Justice Department accounts."

"I have never received word from the Justice Department about the scope, nature or state of these inquiries," he said.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, praised Mollohan and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., "for recognizing that recusal is the appropriate course of action."

Sloan criticized Republicans for not requiring Appropriations Committee members Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., and John Doolittle, R-Calif., also under Justice Department scrutiny, for not making similar moves.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lawyer To Pay $3.1M Over Comverse Stock Options (USAT)

By Edward Iwata, Usa Today

William Sorin, former general counsel at Comverse Technology (CMVT), will pay $3.1 million to settle charges that he conspired with the company's former CEO and chief financial officer to improperly backdate stock options, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Wednesday.

Without admitting or denying the charges, Sorin agreed to disgorge $1.7 million and pay $818,000 in interest and a $600,000 civil penalty, according to the SEC. About $1 million of the disgorgement will come from backdated options he exercised.

Sorin is the first corporate counsel fined by the SEC in the federal crackdown on the backdating of stock options by 200 companies.

Haywood Gilliam, a partner at Bingham McCutchen and former Justice Department securities fraud chief in San Francisco, says regulators are "focusing more on gatekeeper defendants such as attorneys, and I would not be surprised to see more of it."

Sorin's attorney, James Brochin, declined to comment.

Last year, the SEC and Justice Department charged Sorin, former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander and former chief financial officer David Kreinberg with a stock-manipulation scheme that allegedly reaped them $8 million.

According to court filings, Alexander and Kreinberg manufactured evidence to defend the options grants and deceived Comverse directors and auditors. Prosecutors alleged that Comverse set up a roster of phony grant recipients labeled "I.M. Fanton" after a secretary saw The Phantom of the Opera.

The SEC alleged that the men backdated option grants to coincide with low closing prices of Comverse stock, making the options more valuable than if they had matched Comverse's higher share price on the original grant dates.

In his criminal case, Sorin in November pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities, mail and wire fraud. He faces a maximum of five years in prison at his sentencing in February, prosecutor Ilene Jaroslaw says.

Alexander fled to Namibia and was arrested there in September. He faces an extradition hearing in April.

Kreinberg, in his criminal case, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in October in New York. He faces a maximum prison sentence of 15 years at his sentencing next month.

Ex-Counsel At Comverse Settles Lawsuit (WSJ)

By Judith Burns

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Former Comverse Technology Inc. General Counsel William Sorin will pay $3 million to settle a Securities and Exchange Commission civil lawsuit alleging he took part in a long-running effort to manipulate executive stock-option grants.

Mr. Sorin also will be permanently barred from serving as a corporate lawyer, officer or director of a publicly traded company, the SEC said.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

The Harvard Law School graduate settled without admitting or denying the SEC's allegations about his role in backdating stock-option grants. Mr. Sorin, former Comverse Technology Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg and fugitive former Chief Executive Jacob "Kobi" Alexander were named in the SEC's civil suit in August and were criminally charged as well. Mr. Alexander fled to the African nation of Namibia, where he is awaiting a hearing on extradition to the U.S.

Stock options give holders the right to buy shares at a future date at a price set on the grant date. Backdating occurs when those awarding options change the actual grant date to another one when the stock price was lower, potentially increasing the value of the option grants.

Prosecutors charged the option-manipulation effort produced substantial personal profits for the executives while costing shareholders.

Mr. Sorin pleaded guilty in November to a single criminal charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. Mr. Kreinberg pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and securities fraud and resolved the SEC charges by agreeing to pay nearly $2.4 million. The SEC said its investigation is continuing.

Federal regulators claimed Mr. Sorin falsified company records to show that directors on the firm's compensation committee approved grants of stock options when they hadn't. The SEC said Mr. Sorin assisted a similar effort by falsifying company records at Ulticom Inc., a majority-owned subsidiary of Comverse, a Woodbury, N.Y., software company. Messrs. Sorin, Kreinberg and Alexander resigned in May amid an investigation by a special committee of the company's board of directors.

Mr. Sorin's attorney, James Brochin, declined to comment.

Under the settlement, Mr. Sorin will pay a $600,000 fine and return $1.6 million, including $1 million he garnered by exercising backdated stock-option grants, plus more than $800,000 of interest. The SEC said the settlement is subject to approval by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Apple Chief Benefited From Options Dating, Records Indicate (WP)

By Alan Sipress

DOJ_NMG_0115229

Apple Inc. chief executive Steve Jobs confirmed his place this week as the premier impresario of the Internet age, taking the stage in San Francisco to unveil a smart phone that won a raucous endorsement from thousands of fans in the audience and sent Apple stock rocketing to a record high.

But his signature performance at the annual Macworld Conference and Expo did not dispel the scandal swirling around Apple over its backdating of stock options. Despite the company's defense that Jobs never personally benefited from a pair of stock option grants he received -- he gave them up in 2003, long before allegations of wrongdoing surfaced -- filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show that his options were exchanged for 5 million shares of restricted Apple stock.

That stock was worth $75 million at the time, nearly the same as the value of the options he relinquished, using a technique for calculating the value of investments popular with financial analysts and used by Apple.

Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, said the 2003 transaction did not directly benefit Jobs because he could not sell the restricted shares until he had remained at Apple for another three years.

Some investor advocates call that explanation disingenuous. "You are torturing the English language to say he did not benefit from the options," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services. "He certainly benefited from the grant because the grant was converted on a value-to-value basis."

McGurn and other analysts also said the amount of stock Jobs received appeared to be inflated because the value of his options was exaggerated, at least in the case of one grant, by the improper backdating.

The 5 million shares, which doubled in number when the stock split, continued to increase in value until last March, when Jobs was eligible to sell the shares. At that point, they were worth nearly $650 million. Jobs sold nearly half of them as soon as he could, in March, for $295.7 million.

Jobs is a unique figure in the technology industry. He is a rock star in the realm of geeks, the visionary behind such totems of the computer age as the Mac and the iPod and an evangelist of such charisma that his followers attribute to him the ability to make them rethink reality. His achievements have earned him a fortune estimated recently at $4.9 billion. After co-founding Apple, Jobs left the company after a power struggle, only to return in 1996 and revive its flagging fortunes. He was also chief executive of Pixar Animation Studios and, after it was bought by Walt Disney Corp., became Disney's largest shareholder.

While senior executives at other companies have recently been forced from their posts over allegations that they were involved in improper booking of stock options, Wall Street analysts have said Apple would be reluctant to oust Jobs even if he were clearly implicated in similar practices. His leadership is synonymous with the company's success.

Nearly 200 companies have acknowledged or are under investigation for the backdating of stock options, a practice that involves picking an effective date for an option when the stock price was low so that the recipient can make more money when he sells it. None of those companies is as prominent as Apple, and Apple has confirmed that federal authorities are looking into its practices.

Apple disclosed to the Securities and Exchange Commission late last month that it had falsified the approval of 7.5 million stock options given to Jobs in 2001 by recording a fictitious October meeting to ratify the options. The company acknowledged that the options were actually finalized on Dec. 18, 2001. That date's stock price, which Apple now concedes should have been the basis for the option price, was 15 percent higher than it was on the date of Jobs's grant.

The company told the SEC that it would take a $20 million charge to account for the improper pricing of the grant. The company said an internal investigation had discovered that 6,428 option grants to executives and other employees made on 42 occasions were improperly dated and agreed to take an $84 million after-tax expense as part of restating its finances.

Though Apple said Jobs may have recommended the selection of some favorable dates for options, it said he did not appreciate the accounting significance of choosing false dates. The company said its internal review found no misconduct by current members of Apple management.

Though the 2001 award to Jobs has gained the most attention, an earlier, more generous grant in 2000 is also at issue. The Apple board finalized an award of 10 million stock options to Jobs on Jan. 12, 2000, and said in its filings last month that it was correct in using Jan. 12 as the date for the options' price.

Apple stock on that date happened to be at its lowest level for a six-month period, including about 10 weeks prior, making the stock options especially lucrative. By Jan. 18, when Apple said the board transmitted its unanimous written consent to the grant, the stock price had increased nearly 20 percent.

Lucian Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program in corporate governance, said Jobs falls into a category of chief executives that Bebchuk has labeled "super-lucky." These are the people who have received stock options on dates representing the lowest price of the financial quarter.

"He has some company. He is not the only one to be as fortunate," Bebchuk said. He and his fellow researchers found in a study released two months ago that about 1,000 CEO grants from 1996 to 2005 fell into this category. For most of these options, he said, the dates were more likely to have been the result of "manipulation" rather than good fortune.

Backdating stock options is not illegal. But not disclosing the practice to investors or falsifying documents to cover it up may be.

In lawsuit filed last month in federal court in Northern California, Apple shareholders alleged that company officers and directors had manipulated the price of stock options for Jobs and other executives by repeatedly selecting dates with favorable stock prices. The plaintiffs allege that by doing so, Apple officers and directors unlawfully enriched Jobs and his fellow executives and concealed the practice.

Dowling, the Apple spokesman, declined to comment on the lawsuit. Nor would he comment on how Apple selected the dates for the sets of options awarded to Jobs, saying any available details were contained in SEC filings.

Apple reported in its filings that Jobs voluntarily gave up his stock options in March 2003 and "in exchange for his cancelled options" received the 5 million shares of restricted stock. The filing said Jobs relinquished the options partly because he was concerned that the number of unexercised options at the company had grown too large for its financial health. Apple's stock price had declined sharply in previous years, making many of those with options reluctant to use them. With the exercise price higher than the market price at the time, the options were said to be "underwater," meaning that anyone who exercised such an option immediately would lose money.

But while it would be unwise to exercise options under those circumstances, the options were far from worthless. They were good for up to 10 years after they were issued, allowing time for Apple stock to rebound, as it subsequently did.

The value of stock options on a specific date can be estimated with the Black-Scholes model, a widely used technique that factors in variables such as exercise and market prices, interest rates, dividends, expiration date, and stock volatility. Based on Apple's figures, disclosed in SEC filings, the combined value of Jobs's two stock option grants when he relinquished them in March 2003 was $81.3 million.

Graef Crystal, a retired consultant who is widely recognized as an expert on executive compensation, recently conducted a separate calculation using the same approach. But instead of using Apple's estimate of the stock's expected volatility, a crucial variable, he measured its actual volatility in the market. He also used his estimate of how long executives hold options before using them, based on experience instead of Apple's projection. Crystal calculated that Jobs's options were worth $76.6 million when he gave them up.

Financial analysts said that both estimates show that the options were of generally the same value as the stock Jobs received. Crystal said this showed that the exchange of options for stock was based on "some kind of parity."

Crystal and other financial experts said Jobs appeared not only to benefit from his options in general but specifically from the favorable dates when they were issued because lower prices for the options could ultimately translate into more shares of stock when he made the exchange.

In the case of the 2001 grant, for instance, the difference between the false October date and the December date, which Apple now says was the proper one, was worth about $5 million to Jobs when he traded the options in. Had the lower value been used in calculating the amount of stock he would get in return, he would have received 630,000 fewer shares. By the time he could sell them three years later, these shares would have been worth more than $40 million because of the soaring price of Apple stock.

Grasso Wants Trial By Jury (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Dick Grasso, the former chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, asked a state appeals court to throw out a lower court's ruling that he must return a portion of his $187.5 million compensation package.

At a hearing before the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court, Gerson Zweifach, Mr. Grasso's lawyer, said New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos erred in October when he granted a summary judgment request by the state attorney general's office.

Mr. Zweifach said there are too many issues that remain in dispute about whether Mr. Grasso fulfilled his fiduciary duties to the Big Board and what the NYSE's directors knew about his compensation package for the case to be decided without a trial. He said the case should be decided by a jury.

"It was error for the trial court to even attempt on summary judgment to decide what people knew and what Mr. Grasso should have known," he said.

The attorney general's office, which sued Mr. Grasso in 2004 alleging his pay was excessive for a not-for-profit corporation, has said Mr. Grasso should be forced to return more than $112 million.

In November, the appeals court stayed all proceedings until it could consider a number of issues raised by Mr. Grasso, including whether to reassign the case to a different judge.

Mr. Grasso, who left the NYSE in 2003 amid turmoil over his pay, has denied wrongdoing. The Big Board has since become a publicly traded for-profit company -- NYSE Group Inc.

Mr. Zweifach said Mr. Grasso's compensation was spelled out in his employment contract, particularly the formula used to determine payments owed to him under the exchange's Supplemental Executive Retirement Plan, or SERP.

He also argued that the NYSE's board was made up of corporate executives who wouldn't have stood by silently if they felt Mr. Grasso wasn't giving them the full story on his compensation.

Special Deputy Attorney General Avi Schick argued Mr. Grasso had an "affirmative" obligation as chairman of a nonprofit corporation to make sure exchange directors were fully aware of his compensation.

Mr. Schick said minutes from meetings of the board's compensation committee don't reflect discussions of how Mr. Grasso's annual compensation affected his accrual under SERP.

Mr. Grasso, who attended the hearing, declined to comment afterward.

U.S. Attorney Charges H-P Investigator With Identity Theft (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- In another criminal charge stemming from last fall's Hewlett-Packard Co. spying affair, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan charged independent investigator Bryan Wagner with felony identity theft and conspiracy.

Mr. Ryan's spokesman, Luke Macaulay, said no other federal charges were filed in the H-P matter Wednesday, but that the Justice Department is still investigating the case.

Mr. Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., was one of five people charged with several felony counts last fall by the California attorney general's office in connection to the H-P scandal. Those charged by California include H-P's former nonexecutive chairman, Patricia Dunn, and its former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker. All five have pleaded not guilty to the California charges, including Mr. Wagner, who state and federal prosecutors allege used false identities to obtain the private phone records of numerous H-P directors, employees and journalists.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fumo Told He's Target Of Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mario F. Cattabiani And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 11, 2007

Federal prosecutors last year sent a formal warning to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo that he may be indicted, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

The issuance of a so-called target letter from prosecutors to Fumo, one of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians, is a significant milestone in the four-year investigation, which appears to be in its final stages.

The target letter was sent to Fumo last summer, around the time two of his computer aides were charged with destroying evidence to thwart the investigation, sources said. The Inquirer learned of the letter this month. A lawyer for Fumo yesterday declined to comment.

Typically, prosecutors send target letters to people who are likely to be charged, as a warning and as an invitation to testify before the grand jury. It's an offer that the targets usually refuse.

"It is the rare case, in my experience, that you can talk a prosecutor out of charges once a target letter is issued," said Lawrence S. Lustberg, a Newark lawyer who defended one of the Commerce Bank executives convicted in the 2005 City Hall corruption trial.

However, the delivery of a target letter, part of a secret grand jury process, is no guarantee that charges will be filed.

Before prosecutors present a potential indictment in such a high-profile case, they often consult with senior Justice Department officials in Washington. Also in such cases, defense attorneys are likely to be afforded the opportunity to meet with top officials, including U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan.

The Fumo investigation is focused on whether Fumo used funds from a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity for personal or political benefit - and whether Fumo and staffers destroyed evidence to try to thwart the FBI.

With the grand jury's term due to expire next month, prosecutors have subpoenaed witnesses to appear in the coming weeks, sources said.

Fumo is represented by the prominent Philadelphia firm of Sprague & Sprague. Mark Sheppard, a firm lawyer, would not discuss whether Fumo received a target letter.

"On behalf of the senator, we're not going to engage in any discussion involving the ongoing investigation," Sheppard said. "The process needs to run its course."

Fumo's spokesman, Gary Tuma, declined to comment. On several occasions last year, Fumo, a Philadelphia Democrat, denied any wrongdoing and has called the investigation politically inspired by the Bush administration.

Robert Zauzmer, a prosecutor in the case, declined to comment yesterday.

Fumo has been arrested twice before - and been exonerated each time.

In 1973, city prosecutors charged him with voter fraud, saying he interfered with poll watchers in order to give an advantage to a Democratic state senator.

When Republican District Attorney Arlen Specter stepped down, his successor, a Democrat, dropped the charges, saying the case was weak.

In 1979, a jury convicted Fumo in federal court of placing "ghost" employees on the state legislative payroll, but the trial judge later tossed out the conviction. He said the jury's verdict wasn't justified by the evidence.

The current investigation is focused on the finances of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a South Philadelphia charity that prosecutors have described in a court filing as "nominally independent but which the senator in fact controls."

Boosted by huge contributions obtained by Fumo from Peco and the Delaware River Port Authority, the charity reported almost $25 million in assets in 2002, the last time it filed a public disclosure.

Since the investigation began in 2003, authorities have reviewed Fumo's personal and financial records and Citizens' Alliance records, generating "thousands of pages of grand jury transcripts, and hundreds of pages of agent interview reports," according to a government filing.

In particular, authorities have scrutinized payments of more than $200,000 in 2002 and 2003 by Citizens' Alliance for polling. Public records show that a Fumo political committee ultimately repaid the money.

Agents have also reviewed myriad smaller Citizens' Alliance purchases to determine whether Fumo got any personal benefit from the charity's spending, sources said.

In addition, authorities are conducting a related obstruction-of-justice investigation. The two former Fumo aides indicted in June with trying to scuttle the FBI probe, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, have declined to cooperate with authorities and are scheduled for trial in May.

According to a government filing, another Fumo computer technician, Donald Wilson, was granted immunity and told the grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting" e-mail to prevent the FBI from seizing it.

The Inquirer reported a year ago that longtime Fumo aide Ruth Arnao also received a target letter. Arnao, who once worked in his legislative office and later ran Citizens' Alliance, has not been charged with any crime. Her lawyers have said she has done nothing wrong.

Defense lawyers who have followed the case closely described the target letter to Fumo as a sign that prosecutors believe they have amassed enough evidence to charge the senator with a crime.

According to the official guidelines manual issued to federal prosecutors, "a 'target' is a person as to whom the prosecutor or the grand jury has substantial evidence linking him or her to the commission of a crime and who, in the judgment of the prosecutor, is a putative defendant."

To send a target letter, prosecutors must "believe in good faith that they have credible evidence to warrant an indictment," said Nicholas C. Harbist, a former federal prosecutor in Philadelphia who is now a defense lawyer in Cherry Hill.

Lustberg said that prosecutors generally issue target letters for one of two practical reasons - as "a sincere notice to a potential defendant that he is in trouble" or "to shake the trees and see what comes of it."

In this case, the grand jury term was set to expire in September but was extended to February.

Several former prosecutors said that the extension doesn't necessarily mean that prosecutors have had second thoughts about charging Fumo.

"I would read the situation this way: The government believed that it had sufficient credible evidence of a crime, but decided to delay issuing its indictment to continue its investigation," Harbist said. "It could be simply that the government wants to investigate any defenses, to close any loopholes."

Prison For Guards Over Sex With Inmates (AP)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (AP) - Two guards received one-year prison sentences Wednesday for their roles in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a fatal shootout at a federal prison for women.

Gregory Dixon, who admitted having sex with inmates but denied giving them anything for it, has taken responsibility for his actions and was sorry, his lawyer said.

The other guard, Alan Moore, told U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle he was wrongly convicted.

``I did not do the things I was accused of,'' Moore said.

A jury convicted both in November of conspiring to accept illegal gratuities and other crimes.

Dixon and Moore were among six guards who had been charged with being part of a conspiracy to trade cigars, cigarettes, chewing gum, jewelry and cosmetics to inmates for sex and money at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution.

``They took an honorable position and public trust and used it for self-gratification,'' Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls told the judge. ``Their conduct was a complete abandonment of what they knew was right.''

One guard, Ralph Hill, pulled a gun and began firing at federal agents who had gone to the prison to arrest the suspects June 21. Hill and Justice Department Special Agent William ``Buddy'' Sentner were killed, and a prison officer aiding in the arrests was wounded.

Three other guards pleaded guilty.

Hinkle said he considered the sex the most serious aspect of the crimes because it involved mistreatment of inmates.

Dixon admitted having sex with inmates and giving them gum and cigars but insisted there was no quid pro quo, defense lawyer Thomas Findley said.

Defense lawyers said neither man had decided whether to appeal.

Former Swift Employees Charged With Identity Theft (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Alan Bjerga

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- A federal grand jury charged 53 former employees of Swift & Co.'s meat processing plant in Cactus, Texas, with felony identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's office in Dallas said.

Those charged were among 295 at the Cactus plant arrested in mid-December during nationwide raids targeting illegal immigrants at six Swift facilities. About 1,300 Swift employees, or 9 percent of its workforce, were arrested by federal agents. So far, 246 of those arrested nationwide are facing criminal charges, most for identity theft, according to Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd in Washington.

``It is a serious crime to hijack and steal a citizen's good name and credit to illegally stay in the United States," U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper said in a statement. He said most of those charged had used stolen or forged documents to find employment.

Each of the 53 former Swift workers charged today is facing one count of false representation of a Social Security number. The felony carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Most face additional charges as well, according to the statement.

Swift spokesman Sean McHugh said the Greeley, Colorado- based company had no comment on the charges. Closely held Swift, accounts for about 11 percent of U.S. cattle slaughter and is the third-biggest U.S. beef and pork producer. The company resumed normal operations shortly after the December raids.

Judge Tosses Out Testimony In Case Of Bodies Found In Reservoir (FINDLAW/AP)

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A federal judge ordered jurors in the case of a man charged with masterminding a kidnapping-for-ransom plot that ended with five bodies tossed into a California reservoir to disregard the defendant's testimony after he refused to answer questions under cross-examination.

Iouri Mikhel, 42, testified last week that he helped lure some of the victims to meetings but never killed them. He also acknowledged being a "professional criminal" who laundered money and was a black market trader in his native Russia.

When Mikhel declined Tuesday to answer questions from prosecutors and an attorney representing a co-defendant, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian ordered the testimony removed from the court record.

Closing arguments were scheduled to begin Wednesday.

Mikhel, 42, has pleaded not guilty to charges that include conspiracy and hostage-taking resulting in death. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

Prosecutors allege Mikhel and several accomplices abducted Los Angeles-area businesspeople over a four-month period in 2001 and 2002 and collected $1.2 million (â,¬920,000) in ransoms before killing them.

Bodies of the five people kidnapped were later found in the New Melones Reservoir near Yosemite National Park.

One of the accomplices, Ainar Altmanis, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit hostage-taking and three counts of hostage-taking resulting in death. He cooperated with prosecutors, who agreed to seek no more than a 20-year sentence, and testified against Mikhel.

Two other defendants pleaded guilty to charges in the case, while two more have pleaded not guilty.

Lawyer Gave Information To Kerkorian (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger And Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 10 — When Kirk Kerkorian's longtime lawyer was indicted on wiretapping and conspiracy charges last February in the federal investigation of the Hollywood private detective Anthony Pellicano, the billionaire investor was mentioned almost as an afterthought.

There were no accusations that Mr. Kerkorian knew or approved of any wiretapping, and no indications that he had even been interviewed by the F.B.I. about Mr. Pellicano's work on his behalf.

But in recordings that Mr. Pellicano secretly made of his own telephone conversations, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, Terry N. Christensen, repeatedly said he told the billionaire — then 84, and locked in a legal dispute with his ex-wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian — what the private detective was learning from what prosecutors say were his wiretaps.

Mr. Christensen stops short of saying he has told Mr. Kerkorian that Mr. Pellicano was using wiretaps, but says he is providing Mr. Kerkorian with details of Ms. Kerkorian's private conversations.

Mr. Kerkorian has not been accused of any wrongdoing, and it is unlikely that someone could be held criminally liable for the actions of an investigator hired by his lawyer without showing that the client knew of the investigator's illegal acts.

Yet the recordings show how Mr. Pellicano's information could affect a high-stakes lawsuit, and make clear that Mr. Kerkorian, according to Mr. Christensen's assurances, was grateful for intimate information that helped his case.

"Tell me that the old man has a smile on his face," Mr. Pellicano said on May 14, 2002.

"He does, O.K.? He's happy," Mr. Christensen said. "Our jaw is still hanging down."

Mr. Kerkorian was then embroiled with his ex-wife in a nasty child-support and paternity battle. Mr. Pellicano heard Ms. Kerkorian talking to her lawyers, relatives and friends even as she and Mr. Kerkorian were wrangling over her demand for a $270,000 increase in monthly child-support payments. Ms. Kerkorian's effort ultimately failed; a judge increased the payments by just $316.

The secret recordings also show how Mr. Kerkorian and his lawyer pushed the private detective to investigate another multimillionaire, the movie producer Stephen L. Bing, whom Mr. Kerkorian suspected of being the biological father of his ex-wife's daughter.

A spokesman for Mr. Kerkorian, Dick Sobelle, declined to answer questions for this article. "We're not at liberty to comment on any of this," he said. Federal prosecutors declined to comment, as did Mr. Pellicano, who is in jail awaiting trial.

Mr. Christensen's lawyer, Terree A. Bowers, declined to answer questions, but when told the thrust of this article, called it "irresponsible, unwarranted and a pack of lies." He added: "In fact, there are absolutely no tapes or reliable evidence of any wiretaps involving the Kerkorian-Bonder litigation. The charges are and remain totally unfounded."

The recordings are among hundreds that prosecutors have turned over to defense lawyers, along with tens of thousands of documents. That evidence was subject to a court protective order, and prosecutors are investigating The New York Times's access to some of it.

Mr. Christensen and Mr. Pellicano, both of whom have pleaded not guilty to felony wiretapping and conspiracy charges, were among seven people indicted last February as part of an F.B.I. inquiry. Two have pleaded guilty, and the trial of the other five, after several delays, is set for August.

Mr. Kerkorian, through his holding company, the Tracinda Corporation, controls MGM Mirage, with its extensive hotel and casino properties. He bought and sold the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie studio three times from 1969 to 2004. Last year, he bought 9.9 percent of General Motors, trying to pressure it into a deal with Nissan and Renault, then retreated, selling his shares for a profit of $100 million. Forbes put his net worth at $8.7 billion last year.

Mr. Kerkorian will turn 90 in June. The recordings in which he is discussed by his lawyer and the private detective suggest he could be called to testify at their trial about what he knew and when.

The wiretapping on Mr. Kerkorian's behalf began after his ex-wife sued to increase his child-support payments from $50,000 to $320,000 a month. Mr. Kerkorian had learned much earlier that her daughter, who was born before he married Ms. Kerkorian, was not his biological child. But now Mr. Kerkorian pressed his lawyer to find out who the father was.

On March 18, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano that "proof of exactly how she got pregnant" would be worth $100,000 to Mr. Kerkorian.

Over the next two months, Mr. Pellicano recorded at least 33 more conversations with Mr. Christensen. While they did not use the word "wiretap," they freely talked about what Mr. Pellicano heard while monitoring Ms. Kerkorian's phones.

On April 27, 2002, Mr. Pellicano reported hearing her discuss trying to leverage Mr. Kerkorian's desire to spend time with her daughter into a bigger settlement. "This is her exact words, by the way," he said. " 'How much money is he willing to pay me to get that?' That's her exact words."

He also said Ms. Kerkorian had confided in her father about her case. "There's no way except with my unique techniques that you would know this," he said.

A few excerpts show the kinds of information Mr. Kerkorian's side gained from learning of Ms. Kerkorian's telephone conversations:

¶On April 22, 2002, Mr. Pellicano reported to Mr. Christensen that Ms. Kerkorian was furious at her lawyers and ready to fire one of them, Stephen Kolodny, but Mr. Kolodny talked her out of it. "I'll tell you something, if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we'll really kill 'em," he said.

Mr. Kolodny said he had no recollection of Ms. Kerkorian threatening to fire him in this time period.

¶On Saturday, April 27, two days before a settlement conference, Mr. Pellicano told Mr. Christensen he had picked up "massive detail" about Ms. Kerkorian's settlement demands.

"She wants all her legal fees paid. You understand?" Mr. Pellicano said. "She wants retroactive support back to August of last year. She wants $125,000 a month. She wants a joint press statement saying that neither one of them was at fault, and they just both made mistakes."

Repeatedly, Mr. Christensen said he intended to, or already had, told Mr. Kerkorian what Mr. Pellicano had learned from Ms. Kerkorian's phone calls:

¶On April 27, Mr. Pellicano said Mr. Christensen might want to warn Mr. Kerkorian about something.

"She talks about killing him," Mr. Pellicano said. "She says, 'You know, I gotta kill him.' She says those things. Now, whether she really means it or not, probably not. But does she say it? Absolutely."

Two days later, Mr. Christensen returned to the subject. "Those comments and that discussion was pretty disgusting, and I'm thinking that I should probably, you know, give Kirk a heads-up," he said.

Mr. Christensen's lawyers later claimed that Mr. Pellicano's information about such statements by Ms. Kerkorian was what led Mr. Christensen to become involved with the private detective in the first place.

Steve Sitkoff, a lawyer for Ms. Kerkorian, scoffed at the notion that she was ever a threat to anyone. "It's ludicrous to think that she would ever mean any harm to Kirk or anyone else," he said.

¶On May 10, Mr. Pellicano argued for telling Mr. Kerkorian not to trust the mediator in the case, Deborah Simon. After Mr. Kerkorian had left Ms. Simon a lengthy message, Ms. Simon told Ms. Kerkorian all about it, Mr. Pellicano said, and Ms. Kerkorian was thrilled.

"The elation was overwhelming," Mr. Pellicano said.

"Well, I will let Kirk know the emotional high that Lisa got out of Deborah's call," Mr. Christensen said. Ms. Simon did not respond to messages at her home and office.

¶On May 14, Mr. Pellicano asked if Mr. Kerkorian had been briefed about another exchange he had overheard. "Did you tell him about that?" he said.

"Yeah, oh sure," Mr. Christensen said. "He just couldn't believe it."

Ms. Kerkorian, who had a long relationship with the billionaire, married and quickly divorced him when her baby was a year old, and the two agreed at the time that the child was his.

By the time Mr. Pellicano was hired, the investor already had been told by his ex-wife's friends that she had had an affair with Mr. Bing, the film producer, around the time when her daughter was conceived. So, after Mr. Pellicano tried to but could not confirm that Ms. Kerkorian had been artificially inseminated, Mr. Christensen pressed him to focus on Mr. Bing — who was already embroiled in a contentious and public paternity fight with the actress Elizabeth Hurley.

At one point, on April 28, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano that he took no pleasure in pursuing Mr. Bing. "But Kirk is going through this, and he's been [expletive] defrauded, O.K.? And I am not resting until this is put to bed, and it's not going to be put to bed until we find out who the father is."

Ultimately, Mr. Bing, who declined to comment, was identified as the father of Ms. Kerkorian's child, with the help of a DNA sample lifted from his trash.

As word broke of that finding, on May 15, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano to shut down the wiretap of Ms. Kerkorian after one final night of listening. The private eye said he hoped to work for Mr. Kerkorian again.

“Maybe the old man will give me something in the future,” he said.

“Well, that you can count on,” Mr. Christensen said.

Land In Bribery Case Isn't In Chicago Alderman's Ward (CHIT/AP)

Associated Press

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

CHICAGO -- When FBI officials arrested Alderman Arenda Troutman this week, they alleged that she took $5,000 from a fictitious developer in exchange for helping him move forward on a project in her South Side ward.

Or, rather, what they assumed was her ward.

A closer look has revealed that the parcel in question isn't in Troutman's 20th Ward, after all, but in the 16th.

While Troutman's lawyer is crying foul, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the mix-up is a non-issue.

"From a legal standpoint, it doesn't matter," he said. "It's not an element of the crime."

But defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said his client knows the boundaries of her ward and that the location revelation "should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on."

"The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese," Adam said. "It is stinking to high heaven."

Troutman was arrested at her home early Monday by federal agents who said they had to break a window to get in.

Prosecutors allege that in return for the $5,000 and the promise of more, Troutman agreed to back the bogus developer in getting zoning changes and alley access for a proposed development.

Federal Magistrate Michael T. Mason set a $10,000 unsecured bond for Troutman, releasing her on her own recognizance.

Adam said he will argue that the development was phony and that Troutman didn't do anything to help it.

FBI officials also allege that Troutman told an informant to have the developer make out a $15,000 check to the 20th Ward Women's Auxiliary. State records show the organization is run by her mother and sisters.

Details Don't Get In Way Of FBI Sting (CHIT)

Video: Real estate not in Troutman's ward

If the federal sting that snagged Ald. Arenda Troutman were a Hollywood movie, Chicagoans in the know might be complaining about a flawed plot.

Troutman, who represents the South Side's 20th Ward, was arrested for allegedly taking money to grease the way for a real estate development at 5730 S. Halsted St.

But the site in question, as it turns out, isn't even in Troutman's ward.

If the 5730 property "was on the other side of the street, it would have been in the 20th," said Thomas Leach, a spokesman for the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners who double-checked the city ward map at the Tribune's request. But the site is actually in the adjacent 16th Ward, he said.

Under longstanding practice and tradition, Chicago aldermen have great power over governmental approvals that can clear the way for a real estate development or kill it. But those familiar with the way Chicago works also know that the alderman of one ward typically has no say over what happens in the ward of a colleague.

"We assumed that she knew her ward, and that [the property] was in her ward," said Ross Rice, a spokesman for the FBI.

Rice said investigators did not double check, and from the FBI's perspective, it's a moot point.

Either Troutman herself believed the parcel was in her ward and she could influence the process, or she knew the parcel wasn't in her ward and thought she could take money anyway, he said.

"From our perspective and from a legal perspective it doesn't matter," he said.

Troutman, who has been in the City Council for 16 years, has demonstrated that she knows council tradition.

Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said the revelation about the location of the parcel used in the sting casts the case further into doubt. He said Troutman knows the exact boundaries of the area.

"And that should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on," he said, because Troutman wouldn't do anything fraudulent and draw attention to a development that she knew wasn't in her ward.

Attempts to reach Ald. Shirley Coleman (16th) were unsuccessful. But a Coleman aide, reached by phone, knew immediately that 5730 S. Halsted was in her boss' territory.

The ward boundary isn't the only odd twist in the plot line.

When Troutman took the first step in an alleged attempt to get a zoning change to make the project possible, she was told by the city's zoning administrator that the parcel could accommodate the development just the way it was--raising the question of whether investigators checked the zoning status before deciding on using the property in the sting.

Then, trying to do what she could, Troutman allegedly made a call to the city's Planning Department to say she would be writing a letter in support of the project. She allegedly was stymied again, informed by a department employee that the correspondence would not be necessary because the land was not owned by the city.

Details of the sting are outlined in a criminal complaint, filed Monday by an FBI agent assigned to the case.

The complaint charges that Troutman continued to try to find a way to earn bribe money, finally using her clout to allow the developer to use a public alley for access to his project's parking lot.

But the plot evades the issue of whether a real Chicago developer would pay the exorbitant tab for such a relatively small favor--and why Troutman thought she could score as much as the government contends she sought.

According to the complaint, she got $5,000, the promise of another $10,000 and had discussed being given a residence and commercial space in the project.

Alley-access ordinances are routine, said Ald. Thomas Allen (38th), chairman of the council's Transportation Committee, which processes hundreds of such proposals every year. It would be "ridiculous" to pay a bribe to get one through the City Council, he said.

Troutman submitted the ordinance for the Halsted Street property on Dec. 13, records show. It won preliminary approval from Allen's committee on Jan. 3. But, given the federal allegations, the alderman said he will not present it to the full council for approval until city lawyers and federal prosecutors advise him on what to do.

Adam said he will argue the development was fake and Troutman did nothing to help it. Any money she took from the cooperating witness in the case cannot be called a bribe, he said.

"The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese," he said. "It is stinking to high heaven."

Defendant May Take Stand Today In Bribery Trial (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 11, 2007

Federal prosecutors rested their bribery case Wednesday against the Shelby County Commission's former top administrative aide, Calvin Williams, who may take the stand today in his own defense.

Williams is accused of taking a $1,500 bribe in 2003 from friend-turned-informant Tim Willis for helping get an urban development grant approved by the commission.

Willis secretly recorded the payoff on audio and video provided by the FBI, which was conducting a widespread public corruption investigation known as Tennessee Waltz.

Through his public defenders, Williams has contended the payment was a legitimate fee as part of a business arrangement he had with Willis.

In secretly made recordings, however, jurors have heard Williams say he is "not a part of Strategic Solutions," a political consulting concern run by Willis.

Among the six witnesses called by Williams on Wednesday was attorney Buck Wellford, a county commissioner from 1994 to 2002 who said on cross-examination by prosecutor Lorraine Craig that he thought Williams should have focused more on his administrative duties with the commission and less on the commissioners' political issues.

Wellford said Williams appeared to have "a special relationship" with Commissioner Cleo Kirk, who sponsored the urban development grant of $100,000 for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc.

"He (Williams) was at his beck and call 24 hours a day," said Wellford. "Commissioner Kirk made more demands on his time than any other commissioner, as Calvin Williams put it to me."

Williams said on the tapes shown to jurors that half of the $1,500 payment from Willis was to go to Kirk, an allegation the former commissioner has denied.

Kirk has been subpoenaed to testify, but has not been called by either side.

Other defense witnesses included former county mayor Jim Rout and former commissioner Julian Bolton, whose brief testimony dealt mostly with procedural aspects of funding and resolutions.

Bolton said there was strong support on the commission for funding the Glenview project, which was approved in September 2002.

The trial is being held before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel H. Mays Jr.

Storm Left New Orleans Ripe For Violence (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 10 — The storm of violence that has burst over this city since the New Year's Day can be traced in part to dysfunctional law-enforcement institutions, aggravated by a natural disaster that turned the physical and social landscape of New Orleans into an ideal terrain for criminals.

Eight killings have occurred in 10 days. New Orleans, the United States' murder capital by many measures in 2006, is well on its way to keeping that distinction in 2007. Since July 2006, there have been at least 95 murders per 100,000 residents, and possibly a higher ratio depending on how the city's depleted population is counted, said Peter Scharf, a criminologist at the University of New Orleans.

Frightened citizens now see their city as a stalking ground, roamed with impunity by teenagers with handguns — an image that may not be far off the mark, experts here say.

There are a variety of reasons for the descent toward chaos. An automobile-bound police department is reluctant to walk the streets and interact with the city's residents. It is at war with the district attorney's office, which is prosecuting seven officers for a deadly shooting soon after Hurricane Katrina struck in 2005. Judges in the city's courts regularly rule in favor of criminals.

Completing the grim picture is an already fragile social structure in the city's poorest wards that has been all but destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Moving back to town, in many cases, are "kids with guns, and without parents," said Mr. Scharf, who predicted a year ago that the city was in for a tidal wave of violence.

The police, feared and hated by the city's poor, get no cooperation from them in solving crimes. "Stop that snitchin!" is the inscription on the T-shirt of a man waiting for a bus on Canal Street. In killing after killing, police officials have begged for witnesses to step up, to no avail.

The result is an unwitting carrying out of the classic Maoist strategy of guerilla insurgency: criminals swim like fish in the surrounding sea, protected by a population that finds no reason to give them up, and is often afraid to.

Frustrated, police officers have been known to lash out at residents. Disturbing police brutality cases — officers beating up, or even shooting, random African-American men — are now competing for headlines with the latest killings.

Infuriating the police agency he must work with, Eddie Jordan, the district attorney, referred to the police as "rabid dogs" after he indicted seven of them last month in the shooting death of two men after Hurricane Katrina.

In this violent city, the Police Department's arrests are usually not for crimes of violence at all, but for drugs. Such arrests constitute 65 percent of the city's total, twice the national average, according to a study by the city's independent Metropolitan Crime Commission. And the problems only continue once an arrest is made. In 2003-4, only 7 percent of those arrested were sentenced to prison, only 5 percent of all convictions were for violent offenses, and only 12 percent of homicide arrests resulted in jail, the study found.

In addition, New Orleans judges go light on sentencing, the study found: they give felons jail time far less often than do judges in other states' courts.

The last time there was a murder conviction in New Orleans was in August — and in that case the judge later reduced the offense to manslaughter, according to the district attorney's office. The judge, Charles Elloie, who publicly expressed sympathy for criminal defendants, has since been suspended for returning suspects to the streets with little or no bond.

"There's a lot of factors converging here," said James Bernazzani, the Federal Bureau of Investigation's special agent in charge in New Orleans, "based on local institutional dysfunction, a population that wasn't educated, and a state judicial system that doesn't mete out consequence for criminal activity. And you've got a citizenry that doesn't cooperate."

The way out of this conundrum is not easily seen by experts or by citizens weary of pledges by local officials — there was another one Tuesday —to make things right. Checkpoints, sheriff's deputies, clergy intervention: all were earnestly promised, under the glare of television lights, in an open-air setting in the heart of the New Orleans killing grounds, the Central City neighborhood.

"It's like Casablanca, round up the usual ideas," said Mr. Scharf, the criminologist.

The surge in killings is a threat to the city's faltering repopulation campaign.

"People I've never heard talk like this, die-hard New Orleanians, are weeping, talking about leaving," said Mary Howell, a civil rights lawyer here. "It's palpable."

Many people are looking to the federal government for help, and are hoping the United States attorney, Jim Letten, might prosecute a few of the murder cases normally handled by the district attorney's office. Mr. Bernazzani said Wednesday that "where we can find the federal hook, Jim Letten has agreed to take the case," adding that additional federal agents were being recruited for New Orleans.

Meanwhile, citizen advocacy, the catalyst for most post-hurricane reform here, will make itself felt again Thursday with a march on City Hall intended to highlight the killings.

Tim Seeman, who runs the kitchen at Parasol's, a restaurant that recently was held up, sees some hope in this awakening.

"This is nothing new. This has been brewing for years and years. But finally people are admitting it," Mr. Seeman said.

Home In The Ruins (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

New Orleans

As its problems mount, the Big Easy is becoming increasingly unnerved.

Local officials, who will never be mistaken for the brightest lights in the firmament, have been unable to stem a hideous wave of murders. On Tuesday Mayor C. Ray Nagin said, "Enough is enough," then added, "But we've said that before."

The public school system, one of the worst in the nation, is trying to sell off some of its buildings to help with a desperate cash crunch.

Most depressing, more than 17 months after the horror of Hurricane Katrina, mile after mile after mile of the city that loved to present itself as the epicenter of laughter and good times still lies in ruin.

New Orleans is a place that could use a hopeful sign of any kind, some positive development to signal that perhaps better times are coming.

Enter Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab. Most people call him Gabe, and so will I for the rest of this column. Gabe is a middle-aged bundle of energy who heads the NHP Foundation, a national nonprofit organization that has taken on the difficult mission of providing quality housing at rents that poor and middle-class families can afford. There is no more imperative need in New Orleans than affordable housing.

On Garden Oaks Drive in the Algiers neighborhood Gabe showed me a remarkable sight — a sparkling two-story apartment complex, neatly landscaped, that was owned by NHPF, was badly damaged by the hurricane, and is now being completely renovated at a cost of $20 million.

Nearby are buildings that look like the hurricane hit them yesterday. The NHPF complex, known as Forest Park, will have 284 solid, attractive, energy-efficient units completed this year, with tenants beginning to move in as early as May. The rents will range from $194 to $673 a month.

In New Orleans East, which had been completely submerged in the flood, I stood with Gabe and an architect at what was once the site of a housing complex known as Walnut Square. "New Orleans East was under water for eight days," said Gabe. "We had to raze it. It's demolished."

A quiet wind was blowing across the vast empty space where 18 residential buildings used to be.

The effort to rebuild Walnut Square, at a cost of $37 million, is already under way. There will be 209 apartments, with rents ranging from $130 to $820 a month. There will also be a commercial strip, a community center and day care facilities. (The apartments will be built on raised foundations to guard against future catastrophic floods.)

Eventually Gabe hopes to build 3,000 affordable rental apartments in and around New Orleans at a total cost of $300 million.

How does he do it, when others find the task so daunting?

The key, he said, is to combine the expertise of a successful real estate operation with the talent and vision of an experienced foundation committed to what is essentially a charitable mission. NHPF, which has its Louisiana office in Baton Rouge, gets the funds to build from government grants, tax credits and low-interest loans, as well as conventional financing.

As Gabe dryly noted, "There is not much profit in developing low- income housing."

No successful rebirth of New Orleans is possible without substantial amounts of new and rebuilt housing — housing that the city's very large percentage of low-income residents can afford. Most of the people homing in on development opportunities here have either no interest or no expertise in building such housing.

"There are essentially two kinds of organizations here," said Gabe. "You have out-of-town real estate developers who look at this as a tremendous opportunity and their main concern, quite naturally, has been how much money they can make. On the other hand, you have well-meaning nonprofit entities that unfortunately, in most cases, do not have the capacity to develop on a significant scale."

Compounding the problem has been the lack of housing expertise in New Orleans. Much of the city's housing stock pre-Katrina was so poor as to be illegal in most major American cities. The Housing Authority of New Orleans, which administered public housing, was in such bad shape its operations had to be taken over by the federal government.

Half the population of New Orleans has been dispersed across the United States. Many of those still in the city are living in trailers or are doubled up with relatives and friends. There is no way to overstate the desperate need for housing.

Gabe and the NHP Foundation have provided at least one model that works.

Death Rate Higher For Ex-Prisoners Than Current Inmates (WSJ)

By Keith J. Winstein

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

In what may be the first large-scale study of mortality among released prison inmates in the U.S., researchers found that getting out of jail can be hazardous to your health.

The death rate for ex-prisoners was four times that of current inmates, and more than triple the rate for the general population, even after the effects of age, sex and race were factored out. More than 30% of the excess deaths were due to drug overdoses.

Within the first two weeks after a prisoner is released, the figures were worse: former inmates were 13 times as likely to die as the population at large - and almost 80% of those extra deaths were from drug overdose.

After drug overdoses, the leading causes of the higher death rate were murders, heart disease and suicides.

The doctor who led the study, Ingrid A. Binswanger of the University of Colorado, said she was surprised that the difference in death rates was so large. The findings could indicate a substantial public health problem, since about 700,000 people are released from prison in the U.S. each year, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

"These are preventable deaths, particularly the overdose deaths," said Martin Y. Iguchi, a UCLA public health professor who was not involved with the study. "We need to pay much more attention to inmates as they re-enter society."

The study, to be published in the New England Journal of Medicine Thursday, tracked 30,237 inmates released from the Washington state prison system between 1999 and 2003. Researchers cautioned that the figures, which are broadly consistent with previous studies in Finland and Australia, do not necessarily apply to the rest of the U.S.

Joan Petersilia, a University of California criminologist who wrote the book, "When Prisoners Come Home," said the study would underscore efforts to change what happens "at the moment of prison release."

For example, some states, including California, confiscate psychiatric medications upon release, requiring ex-prisoners to search by themselves for a psychiatrist to continue their prescriptions. "Often this doesn't happen, as you can imagine," she said -- leading to relapses and suicides.

Too Casual To Sit On Press Row? (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

When the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice opens next week, scores of journalists are expected to throng the federal courtroom in Washington, far too many for the 100 seats set aside for the media.

But for the first time in a federal court, two of these seats will be reserved for bloggers. After two years of negotiations with judicial officials across the country, the Media Bloggers Association, a nonpartisan group with about 1,000 members working to extend the powers of the press to bloggers, has won credentials to rotate among his members. The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the highest-ranking Bush administration official to face criminal charges, could "catalyze" the association's efforts to win respect and access for bloggers in federal and state courthouses, said Robert Cox, the association's president.

The new validation doesn't necessarily clarify the blurry line between bloggers and traditional journalists at a time when millions of people are discovering that they can project their opinions and expertise around the world with just a few keystrokes. The debates over the traditional checks-and-balances process that journalists follow are continuing, and some bloggers are resisting efforts to be put under the umbrella of the traditional news media.

"The Internet today is like the American West in the 1880s. It's wild, it's crazy and everybody's got a gun," said Thomas Kunkel, dean of the University of Maryland's journalism school. "There are no rules yet."

The common journalistic practices of verifying facts, seeking both sides of a story and subjecting an article to editing are honored mostly in the breach. Innuendo and rumor ricochet around the Internet as blogs link from one to another, at times making defamatory voices indistinguishable from the many others involved in this experiment of free expression.

Yet, after detailed talks with Cox, officials at the U.S. District Court decided that public awareness of court proceedings could be enhanced by his group's members, among them documentary filmmaker and journalist Rory O'Connor (http://www.roryoconnor.org/blog) and freelance writer James Joyner (http://www.outsidethebeltway.com).

"Bloggers can bring a depth of reporting that some traditional media organizations aren't able to achieve because of space and time limitations," said Sheldon Snook, administrative assistant to Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan. Snook added that some bloggers also bring expertise that is welcome in court.

Several media experts have been predicting a greater presence of bloggers in court -- as defendants. For instance, Kunkel, who is also president of the American Journalism Review, said courts might soon draw the limits of what is acceptable by imposing hefty libel and defamation judgments on bloggers, many of whom do not realize their writings can have expensive legal consequences.

According to the Media Law Resource Center, 69 lawsuits have been brought against bloggers nationwide, including a $1 million suit filed last year against Maine blogger Lance Dutson, who accused his state's tourism department of wasting taxpayer money in a promotional campaign. The advertising agency that developed it sued for libel, defamation and copyright infringement but ended up dropping the suit after advocates rallied to Dutson's defense.

Most cases against bloggers have not made it to trial. Cox, in an effort to head off suits, recently launched an initiative to raise the standards of his members through online education, holding out the prospect that they could then qualify for blogging liability insurance offered through the association.

Cox also envisions fostering an elite tier of bloggers and has been in talks with Harvard Law School about online courses associated with its Berkman Center for Internet & Society, which already offers several courses on the Web about various facets of law. By accepting the association's ethical standards and adopting an official policy for making corrections, members of this group would be credentialed by the association, which in turn would win them access to news and sporting events, advance copies of new books for review and entrance to advance screening of movies.

He had been focused in particular on working with the federal court in Washington to gain credentials for high-profile cases, starting with Libby's trial on charges that he lied to government agents and a grand jury investigating the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Cox, who writes a blog called WordsInEdgewise, said he would assemble a diverse group of bloggers -- with various political outlooks from different parts of the country and readerships large and small -- to rotate throughout the Libby trial, including himself, O'Connor, Joyner and Dutson.

"The history of where blogging is going to go is not defined. It could go in a very positive direction or it could go in a very negative direction," Cox said. "We have to do more than just sit on our hands and see what happens."

The American Society of Newspaper Editors, which has endorsed a proposed federal shield law that would keep journalists from being forced to disclose confidential information in legal proceedings, has said that the shield should cover anyone involved in news-gathering activities, including bloggers.

Under Cox's plan, an online course focusing on the basics of media law would be offered in part by the Poynter Institute for Media Studies, a prominent journalism training organization in Florida that is interested in the issues of blogging. The organization became intimately aware this year of the pitfalls of blogging through a miscue of its own that has become a case study in the challenges that blogs face.

Poynter got sucked into the controversy following the July death of an Indianapolis Star photographer who had developed breathing troubles and collapsed in the newsroom. A Star retiree posted on her blog that management had contributed to the photographer's death because phones in the newsroom could not dial 911, something that she'd heard from staffers in the newsroom but that ultimately proved to be false.

"I was hot under the collar," the blogger, Ruth Holladay, said. "I went with what I wanted to say . . . I went with my gut."

Her entry caught the attention of Jim Romenesko, who posted a link on his widely read blog for the Poynter Institute but did not verify the story or contact the Star's management for comment. Nor was the entry viewed by an editor before it was published.

Dennis Ryerson, the Star's executive editor, said that no one blogged about Indiana's Occupational Safety and Health Administration clearing the newspaper of any wrongdoing in connection with the photographer's death. "Yet the postings that made those allegations are still available for anyone to read," he added.

The incident has prompted Poynter to revise its blogging guidelines.

Still, some of the Internet's most prominent bloggers have balked at the idea of journalistic codes of conduct, citing a 2006 study by the Pew Internet and American Life Project that found that only one-third of bloggers consider their writing to be a form of journalism.

"Blogs are first and foremost a conversation, people talking," said Jeff Jarvis, a journalist-turned-blogger who created a forum called BuzzMachine.

Blogs, he said, have a "different biorhythm" where postings that are initially inaccurate or unfair are corrected online through readers comments and updated blog entries. "This is a world," he said, "where you publish first and edit later."

Lawyers For Delphi Corp. To Ask Judge To Approve $3.4B Investment Plan Despite Objections (FINDLAW/AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Board members of Delphi Corp. decided on Wednesday to move forward in seeking the approval of a federal bankruptcy judge to allow five private equity and institutional investors to buy shares worth as much as $3.4 billion (â,¬2.6 billion) in the company upon its reorganization.

Directors of the Troy, Michigan-based auto parts maker essentially rejected an unsolicited $4.7 billion (â,¬3.6 billion) bid made by a rival investor. Judge Robert Drain was scheduled to consider the plan and objections in a Thursday hearing.

The plan is a crucial part of an overall transformation sought by the company, as it attempts to exit bankruptcy in the first half of this year. Objectors say it transfers a disproportionate amount of the company's value to the investors at the expense of other stakeholders in the case.

The plan allows affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, to buy shares in a restructured Delphi for $1.4 billion (â,¬1.08 billion) to $3.4 billion (â,¬2.62 billion). It would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company but also depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31.

Highland Capital Management LP made a competing proposal Dec. 21, three days after the original bid, to buy shares at a cost of $4.7 billion (â,¬3.62 billion). Highland has joined the acting U.S. Trustee, the official committee of equity security holders, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America and two other unions in objecting to the Appaloosa-Cerberus plan.

The U.S. Trustee and the IUE-CWA, which represents the second-largest group of Delphi employees, objected in part based on their belief that the investment plan takes the place of the usual process of creating a bankruptcy reorganization plan since it outlines how some creditors would be paid.

The equity committee objected to fees and expenses Delphi would pay to Appaloosa and its partners once the judge approved the plan.

Delphi lawyers rebutted some of the objections Wednesday and also made certain changes to address concerns raised by the equity committee for how the investors would be reimbursed if the plan fails to be executed.

The Appaloosa-Cerberus investor group can terminate the agreement if the court has not approved it by Jan. 22.

Lawyers for General Motors Corp. supported the Delphi plan in a separate filing on Wednesday.

Delphi was part of GM until 1999 when it was spun off as a stand-alone company. GM remains its biggest customer and has participated in negotiations to resolve outstanding issues over its supply contracts and legacy labor obligations.

FBI Weighing A Civil Rights Probe In Death (HC)

By Armando Villafranca And Brian Rogers, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 11, 2007

It may monitor internal inquiries into fatal shooting by HPD officer during traffic stop

The FBI said Wednesday that it likely will open a civil rights investigation to monitor ongoing inquiries into the shooting death of Robert McIntosh by a Houston police officer.

The move only will monitor investigations by local authorities and is not a formal investigation to determine whether McIntosh's civil rights were violated, said Shauna Dunlap, a spokeswoman for the FBI.

"Agents have been looking into the matter, and it looks likely that we will open a civil rights investigation to monitor the progress of the district attorney's investigation and the Houston Police Department internal affairs investigation," Dunlap said.

The decision came on a day punctuated with community activists' calls for a federal investigation of Houston police after two men were shot and killed in separate incidents this week. City and police officials said they would fully investigate McIntosh's death and that of Omar Esparza. Esparza, 21, described as mentally challenged and mentally ill, was shot to death Sunday at his East End home. Officers said he lunged at them with a hammer above his head.

McIntosh, 23, was shot to death Monday after a traffic stop in the Sunnyside area, prompting an outcry from community leaders when witnesses alleged the man was handcuffed before the shooting. He was unarmed.

One witness' accountOne witness, Yolanda Perry, who said she saw a Houston police officer fatally shoot McIntosh after handcuffing him, appeared Wednesday before a grand jury for more than hour but declined to comment about her testimony.

Perry, the wife of the Rev. George Perry, was subpoenaed after she declined to give a statement to authorities investigating the shooting.

She has said she was standing outside their church when she saw McIntosh being chased on Knoxville by Houston police officer Leonard Smith.

Smith had stopped a car in which McIntosh was a passenger about 1 p.m. Monday for a defective taillight. The driver, identified by police as McIntosh's girlfriend, was taken into custody in the 8700 block of Cullen on an arrest warrant from Bexar County.

Perry said McIntosh fought with Smith, then broke free and ran down Knoxville. Smith, whose thumb was broken in the scuffle, then fired his Taser, striking McIntosh in the back.

Perry has said the officer then handcuffed him and shot him three times.

The department's sideHPD officials have denied Perry's version of what happened, saying McIntosh was handcuffed after he was shot, a standard procedure to protect the officer.

Prosecutor Edward Porter declined to talk about what Perry told grand jurors because grand jury proceedings are secret.

The district attorney's office investigates all shootings involving officers in Harris County, Porter said. He said it wasn't unusual that Perry was subpoenaed to explain her version of the events.

Porter said the investigation will continue and invited witnesses to the shooting to come forward.

Activist Quanell X, who accompanied Perry to her grand jury appearance, said Harris County officials were "disrespectful" and indifferent to Perry, as she waited eight to nine hours to give a statement Tuesday.

"It was not necessary to make her appear," Quanell X said. "I think they were upset and agitated that they couldn't get a statement from her at (her) church."

After Perry testified Wednesday, Quanell X renewed calls for an outside agency to investigate the shooting.

Dunlap said the FBI decided to wait until it reviews the case and meets with other agencies involved in the investigation before deciding to launch a probe. If the FBI opens an investigation, she said, it may come in the next few days.

"We have to gather the facts and take a look at what's out there," she said.

How a formal probe worksThe FBI usually does not open a formal investigation until after an internal investigation is complete. If any evidence of wrongdoing is found, she said, the FBI then can open a formal investigation.

Councilman Jarvis Johnson, who represents District B in northeast Houston, called for a town meeting to discuss the deaths.

He said residents feel deceived by and afraid of police, because police accounts do not match those of witnesses.

"It really puts us in a precarious situation as to how do we tell our citizens that our police force is forthright," he said during a City Council meeting Wednesday. "You're pitting community against police force."

Mayor Bill White said he would support a community meeting. He avoided commenting on on the specific cases but said residents should think twice before threatening police.

"Officers need to be able to protect themselves," he said.

White also expressed support for Police Chief Harold Hurtt, who said both cases would be investigated and corrective action taken if necessary.

"I think people see that we have a professional, productive police force," White said.

Community reaches outOn Wednesday night, dozens gathered for a candlelight vigil where McIntosh was shot.

DOJ_NMG_0115246

His mother, Doretta, placed a candle near a cross while attendees sang We Shall Overcome.

Minister Robert Muhammad, of the Nation of Islam Mosque No. 45, said a prayer for McIntosh's family and the Sunnyside community. "Let Brother Robert's death not be in vain," Muhammad said. "And God bless us to return to our homes safely and come out of our homes safely and be with us on Dr. (Martin Luther) King's birthday, so that we may stand up for justice, so that our babies are not taken from us."

FBI May Investigate Police Shooting Of Handcuffed Black Man (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A woman who claims she saw a Houston police officer shoot and kill a handcuffed black man testified before a grand jury Wednesday, and federal investigators said they likely will launch a civil rights investigation.

Houston police Officer Leonard D. Smith shot and killed Robert B. McIntosh of Houston during a traffic stop. Police say McIntosh, who was a passenger in the car and fled the scene, was shot after fighting with Smith and shooting him with his police Taser, which uses jolts of electricity to subdue people.

McIntosh's shooting prompted Quanell X, a local activist and frequent critic of the Houston Police Department, to demand a federal investigation, saying McIntosh was the victim of "a cold-blooded murder."

FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap said Wednesday such an investigation likely will be announced soon.

"There is a strong possibility that in the next couple of days, we will open a civil rights investigation," Dunlap told The Associated Press.

In the past, federal authorities in Houston have prosecuted Houston police for civil rights violations when a local grand jury declined to indict them in shootings of civilians.

Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal said a grand jury heard testimony Wednesday from Yolanda Perry, who said she saw the officer shoot McIntosh after he was already in handcuffs.

"We went to the grand jury on that today because we had an eyewitness who said she saw something completely different than what everybody else saw," Rosenthal said.

Rosenthal said investigators also have statements from other witnesses who back the police officer, saying they heard the shots and then saw Smith handcuffing McIntosh.

Perry has not returned telephone calls from The AP.

Jury Takes Break In Texas Smuggling Case (HC/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 11, 2007

HOUSTON — A truck driver facing a possible death sentence for a smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died locked in his sweltering tractor-trailer will have to wait until at least next week to learn his fate.

The jury deliberating whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death for what became the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt is taking a five-day break, U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal told attorneys Wednesday.

Jurors decided to wait until Tuesday to resume their deliberations because the judge was scheduled to be out of town Thursday and Friday and the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday is Monday.

Jurors deliberated for about eight hours Wednesday without reaching a verdict. They have deliberated a total of about 14 hours since Tuesday.

The jury is deciding whether to sentence Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let Rosenthal issue a sentence that could range from no incarceration to life in prison without parole.

Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible.

During the 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' airtight trailer. After the immigrants succumbed to the deadly heat, Williams abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston. Nineteen died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die and questioned why his client is the only defendant in the case facing the death penalty.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams deserves to die because he knew the immigrants were dying and did nothing to help them.

During the retrial's punishment phase, Williams' relatives told jurors he was a kind person and asked them to spare his life. Relatives of the 19 victims asked for justice but didn't specify whether that meant a death sentence.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is one of 14 people charged in the case.

In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Judge Says Arizona Can't Seize Western Union Money Transfers (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

The state of Arizona has no authority to seize thousands of Western Union Co. money transfers to Mexico that originated outside of Arizona, a state court has ruled.

The finding, which was filed Tuesday, is a victory for Western Union, Englewood, Colo., which relies on electronic money transfers to Mexico as a mainstay of its business. Such transfers make up about 10% of its money transfers.

The company, which had said the seizures were scaring away Latino customers, expressed relief at the decision. "Western Union is a trusted friend of the Latino community, and we're very pleased with today's ruling," said Christina Gold, the company's chief executive, in a statement. She said the company would continue to cooperate with the state of Arizona "in meeting its legitimate law enforcement needs."

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said he will contest the Superior Court's order halting the state's seizure warrant in the Arizona Court of Appeals. He said he is confident his office can provide evidence that the money transfers, while occurring outside of Arizona, are linked to Arizona crimes, and that Arizona authorities should be allowed to intercept them as part of its battle against illegal human trafficking.

"We believe this is incorrect on the law," he said, adding that nevertheless, seizures will remain halted until the matter is finally resolved. He described the court order as a "roadblock" in "what has been a very effective way of disrupting the coyote smuggling activities," using a common term for the traffickers.

Mr. Goddard, as part of a crackdown on payments to traffickers of illegal immigrants, moved on Sept. 21 to block all Western Union money transfers of at least $500 going to the Mexican state of Sonora, and originating in 29 U.S. states. The states included California, New York, Florida, Illinois and Georgia.

Senders of the funds were given no notice of the seizures, and were required to contact the state to prove the funds were legally obtained before they would be returned.

Western Union quickly filed a motion to challenge the seizures, which were halted pending the outcome of a court ruling. In Tuesday's ruling, a judge in the state Superior Court in Maricopa County found in favor of the company, saying the state's seizure warrant is "invalid" and "unconstitutional" because the state lacks jurisdiction outside of its borders.

Western Union, a force in global money transfers, operates through a network of about 285,000 agent locations in 200 countries.

Arizona Judge Strikes Down Effort To Seize Immigrant Smuggling Money (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jacques Billeaud, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - PHOENIX-A judge struck down the first effort by prosecutors to seize suspected immigrant smuggling money flowing from other U.S. states into Mexico.

The ruling released Wednesday found the effort by the Arizona Attorney General's office was unconstitutional and barred prosecutors from seizing money that was not sent to or received in the state. Arizona is the United States' busiest illegal entry point.

For more than four years, prosecutors had used special court orders that allowed them to seize $17 million (â,¬13 million) in wire transfers flowing to Arizona that authorities said were payments to smugglers.

Mexico depends heavily on money wired from Mexicans who are working in the United States. Some lawmakers in Mexico denounced the seizure effort.

The efforts were so successful that smugglers began to route their payments from other American states to Mexico, even as traffickers continued to sneak people in through Arizona, prosecutors said. Authorities responded by trying to seize money transfers going into the northern Mexican state of Sonora.

Western Union, the biggest wire transfer company operating in Arizona with more than 1,700 sites, challenged the move and persuaded a judge in September to temporarily put the broader approach on hold. The company argued state prosecutors had no power to interfere with transfers into another country. Prosecutors said the new approach was necessary because smugglers are still using Arizona as their illegal crossing point.

The new ruling concluded prosecutors had not shown they have jurisdiction for the broader approach and had not demonstrated that the Western Union customers in question were involved in crimes. It said the approach violated protections for interstate and international commerce under the U.S. Constitution.

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard, who planned to appeal the decision, said in a statement that the special court orders were responsible for deterring many illicit money transfers and led to the arrests of more than 100 immigrant smugglers, also known as "coyotes."

"It will not deter our efforts to use all legal means to apprehend 'coyotes' and fight human smuggling in Arizona," said Goddard, whose office has said immigrant smuggling in the state is a $1.7 billion (â,¬1.3 billion) a year business.

Before a judge put the practice on hold in September, prosecutors were allowed to seize suspected smuggling transfers of $500 (â,¬385) or more from 28 other American states to 26 locations in Sonora.

Arrests Of World Trade Organization Protesters In 1999 At Issue In Seattle Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gene Johnson, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - SEATTLE-A lawyer for as many as 200 people arrested in an emergency "no protest zone" established during the 1999 World Trade Organization demonstrations asked a federal jury to hold the city accountable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights.

U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman has already ruled that police made the arrests without probable cause. The protesters are hoping to prove the police had a policy of targeting protesters for their anti-WTO opinions, or at least that the actions of officers were approved by higher-ups; if so, the city could face millions of dollars in damages in a subsequent liability phase of the trial.

"My clients were not throwing bricks. They were not interfering with police," attorney Mike Withey said in his opening statement Tuesday. "The policy was to arrest people based on their viewpoint."

City attorney Ted Buck said the overwhelmed officers didn't care what opinions the protesters held; they simply wanted to keep the downtown core clear so that police, emergency workers, WTO delegates and others would be able to do their jobs.

The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters had swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the WTO meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers.

The area became known as the "no-protest zone," even though shoppers, residents and others allowed in the zone were not exempted from protesting.

The group of demonstrators were arrested when they marched within the zone, where they sat down, chanted and sang.

In pretrial motions, the judge found that police made no effort to determine whether the protesters were residents of the area, shoppers, delegates or had other reasons to be in the zone.

Republicans Seek To Keep Border Agents Out Of Jail (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Republican House members yesterday asked President Bush to keep two U.S. Border Patrol agents out of prison pending their appeal of convictions for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled into Mexico.

"Several discrepancies in the government's case strongly question whether justice has been served, and permitting these men to be incarcerated in the interim puts their lives at risk," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California said at a Capitol Hill press conference.

"We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies," Mr. Rohrabacher said in a reference to Mr. Bush. "If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies."

He was joined by Reps. Duncan Hunter of California, Ted Poe of Texas, Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Joe Wilson of South Carolina and Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

In lieu of a pardon, a letter petitioning Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was presented during the press conference asking the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors not to oppose a motion filed in a Texas court to keep the agents free on bond during the appeals process.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A jury convicted the two agents in March after a two-week trial. They are scheduled to report to prison Wednesday. Compean and his wife, Patty, attended yesterday's press conference.

"I urge Attorney General Gonzales to allow these men to go free on bail while the appeals process is under way," Mr. Wilson said. "We must stand with our nation's heroes -- not the criminals who disregard our laws.

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences for the two agents. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said yesterday the petition effort has garnered 220,000 signatures so far and will be presented to the president shortly.

Mr. Rohrabacher has called on Mr. Bush to "do the right thing and not allow the lives and families of these fine men to be destroyed."

Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said it would be "inappropriate" to comment on any potential pardons. He directed inquiries to federal prosecutors.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a possible drug case. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned near Fabens, Texas, near the U.S.-Mexico border.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande. Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Officer's Exoneration In Teen's Death Stirs Calls For Civilian Oversight (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Steve Hymon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

LAPD panel's secret decision to exonerate the officer who shot Devin Brown brings calls for public access to disciplinary hearings.

Angered by an administrative panel's secret decision not to punish the Los Angeles Police Department officer who fatally shot a 13-year-old boy, City Council members and community leaders called Wednesday for increasing civilian oversight of misconduct cases and reopening them to public scrutiny.

"People are always going to have different views on how cops should be punished for shootings, but all the facts should be out in the open and there ought to be accountability for the ultimate decision-makers," said Councilman Jack Weiss, head of the city's Public Safety Committee.

Weiss said he would hold a joint hearing with the Police Commission in upcoming weeks to discuss ways to make LAPD discipline "more transparent."

Other city officials, including Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, also said they were disappointed to learn that an internal LAPD disciplinary panel meeting held behind closed doors this week rejected the civilian Police Commission's findings that Officer Steven Garcia should be punished for the Feb. 6, 2005, shooting of Devin Brown.

"I supported the Police Commission decision in this matter," Villaraigosa said. "That should tell you my feelings about this."

Some city leaders were even more outraged that the decision was shrouded in secrecy.

"This lack of public disclosure deepens suspicion in the African American community that the LAPD is more interested in protecting officers than in curbing police abuse," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, president of the Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable.

Councilman Bernard C. Parks, who led the LAPD from 1997 to 2002, said holding disciplinary hearings in private undermines confidence in the Police Department.

"After 30 years of progressive efforts to make the public aware, we've had a complete reversal," Parks said. "This is unraveling decades of hard-fought battles."

Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open to the public, police officials changed department policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case.

Parks said the LAPD is going beyond what the court decided in that case — Copley vs. Superior Court — noting that the ruling "specifically says it does not address meetings."

Police Chief William J. Bratton and Police Commission President John Mack said they support greater public openness, but were compelled to close hearings because of legal advice from City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo, who has interpreted the court's ruling as giving officers broad privacy protections. A spokesman for Delgadillo's office declined to discuss the advice, saying such matters were confidential.

Even though Bratton and commission officials touted their desire to provide greater public access, in many ways they have been more secretive about police conduct than past LAPD leaders.

Last year, for example, the Police Commission changed a decades-old policy and began issuing public reports without the names of officers involved in shootings. At that time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) offered to sponsor legislation to ensure that names would not be struck from public police records if commission members had concerns about potential court restrictions.

On Wednesday, Romero said she had not heard from commission officials since the court decision.

"My offer still stands," Romero said. "If the city of Los Angeles, from the mayor to the City Council to the commission, want help, I can carry the legislation…. It's a sad day for those of us who believe that policing should be done in the public."

Romero said the developments in the Brown case also show that the commission needs greater power over officer discipline. Under the City Charter, the commission has the authority to set broad policy, but cannot independently impose discipline.

"On paper, there is civilian oversight, but this illustrates that the commission has no teeth. Its teeth got kicked out inside a closet."

Several council members said they would support any legislative remedy to reopen boards to the public, whether by state legislative action or a change in the City Charter.

"Boards," Parks said, "should always be open."

Councilman Greig Smith, a reserve LAPD officer, was one elected official who believed that the disciplinary panel was right to exonerate Garcia.

"The Police Commission is the one that erred," Smith said.

Smith also supported closed discipline hearings, saying it protects the rights of the innocent.

"I understand their concerns," Smith said after hearing Hutchinson's comments. "But these are the same people who have been criticizing the Police Department for as long as I can remember, and no matter what we do they will not be satisfied."

Two years ago, when the Brown shooting occurred, community activists accused Garcia of using excessive force.

The officer mortally wounded Brown near 83rd Street and Western Avenue in South Los Angeles as the boy backed a stolen Toyota Camry toward a police car after a brief car chase. Police said Brown was driving erratically and that they suspected him of drunk driving.

Garcia, who was unaware at the time that the vehicle was stolen, fired 10 shots, hitting the youth seven times. The Police Commission, in a 4-1 vote, determined that the shooting violated department rules, saying that evidence showed Garcia was outside the path of the vehicle and in no danger at the time he opened fire. Commissioners said they expected Garcia to be punished. The city also agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a wrongful-death lawsuit brought by Brown's family.

Although police sources confirmed to The Times that the LAPD administrative panel found that Garcia's actions were justified, the rationale for the decision remains secret.

On Wednesday, as elected officials voiced concern over the panel's vindication of Garcia, residents in South Los Angeles expressed disappointment but were less surprised.

"This is so unfair," said Mollie Bell, a local activist. "In this profession, they never mess up. They never make a mistake. Every day you hear about lawyers or politicians. They make mistakes on the job. They screw up. Doctors get fired for malpractice. Everybody gets punished except the police. They always come out on top."

Ed Brimmer, a 69-year-old retired LAPD detective who was awarded the department's Medal of Valor in 1971, saw the incident through the eyes of a veteran police officer.

"It's sad, it's very tragic," said Brimmer of the shooting. "But I don't think the officer got up that day and said, 'I'm going to go kill a black child.' Police officers are afraid too. They have to protect themselves too."

Rod Wright, a former assemblyman, said he's seen cases like this before.

"In this case everybody loses," he said. "The Police Commission said the shooting was out of policy, the council approved a settlement, the police chief said it was justified and now there's no punishment. Who's in charge?"

University Of Michigan Drops Affirmative Action For Now (WP/AP)

By David N. Goodman, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

School Will Continue Its Legal Fight Against a Ban on the Practice, However

DOJ_NMG_0115252

The University of Michigan announced Wednesday that it will comply with a new voter-approved ban on affirmative action and immediately stop considering race and gender in admissions.

The move came in the middle of the admissions process for next fall's freshman class. The university has already begun sending out acceptance and rejection letters.

The state constitutional amendment approved by the voters in November banned the use of race and gender preferences in public university admissions and government hiring and contracting.

After it passed, the university put its admission process on hold and asked the courts that it be given until summer to comply with the ban, saying it would be too disruptive to change its policies now. But a federal appeals court said no.

"We cannot sustain any further delay in our admissions process without harming our ability to enroll a class of students for the 2007-08 academic year," said Teresa A. Sullivan, executive vice president of academic affairs.

The university will continue its legal challenge of the measure in the meantime, Sullivan said.

"This is a big step forward, there's no doubt about it. It's good news," said Terence Pell, president of the Center for Individual Rights, a group that sued to force immediate compliance with the ban. "It's a watershed moment."

The university said that it would use other criteria that are not explicitly race- or gender-based to achieve diversity. Those include geographic diversity, the level of education completed by students' parents, and whether students attended a disadvantaged school.

Michigan: University To Comply With Ruling (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

The University of Michigan acceded to a federal appeals court decision and said it would immediately comply with the state's new ban on affirmative action in public education, employment or contracting. The Michigan ballot initiative banning preferences based on race or gender passed overwhelmingly in November and was to go into effect on Dec. 23. But the University of Michigan, together with Michigan State University and Wayne State University, went to court seeking a six-month delay, on the ground that they were midway through an admissions cycle. A federal district judge granted the delay on Dec. 19, but on Dec. 29, a federal appeals court ordered immediate compliance.

Florida Adopts Plan For Mentally Ill Inmates (NYT)

By Christine Jordan Sexton

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., Jan. 10 — About 300 mentally ill inmates in county jails throughout Florida will eventually be moved to psychiatric hospitals and residential centers for treatment after state lawmakers agreed on Wednesday to an emergency spending measure.

The Legislative Budget Commission, a panel of the Florida Legislature meeting in an emergency session, voted unanimously to spend nearly $19 million before July 1 to provide 373 more psychiatric beds for mentally ill inmates and more community services for mentally ill people at risk of being jailed.

The decision comes after a state circuit judge charged Lucy Hadi, the former secretary of the Department of Children and Families, with indirect criminal contempt for keeping mentally ill inmates in jail longer than state law allows. Ms. Hadi, who resigned last month, was fined $80,000.

State law requires the department to move inmates found incompetent to stand trial from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of receiving a commitment order. The number of inmates found incompetent has increased by 16 percent over the last two fiscal years. As of Tuesday, nearly 250 mentally ill inmates had waited more than 15 days for treatment. In all, nearly 300 inmates are waiting for treatment.

"The state has not sat idly by," said Bob Butterworth, the new secretary of the Department of Children and Families, a Democrat chosen by Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican, to head the beleaguered agency. "We've taken action. That's all we can do."

The extra beds will cost $16.6 million and be scattered across the state at private centers and state-run hospitals. One hundred secure beds, where patients are constantly supervised, will be available in South Florida by May, said Don Winstead, deputy secretary of the Department of Children and Families. The state plans to have a total of 1,822 secure and residential beds by June.

Lawmakers also approved spending $3.1 million more to provide other services for the mentally ill, like housing, medication stipends and outpatient mental health services.

To continue to provide the additional beds and support services beyond June, however, the Legislature will need to appropriate an additional $54.5 million, state budget analysts say. Mr. Crist said the Legislature had a duty to provide the additional money.

State Senator Stephen R. Wise, Republican of Jacksonville, said the state should try to save money by providing more residential treatment beds, which are less expensive than the secure beds.

"I don't want to be able to buy a Ferrari," Mr. Wise said, "but I want to have the option of being able to buy a Prius or a Buick or something less expensive than a Ferrari."

The Michael Nifong Scandal (WSJ)

By Dorothy Rabinowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

No one could have imagined, when the story began last March, how soon and completely that bit of shorthand -- "the Duke University scandal" -- would be transformed.

Scarcely 10 months after, the term is now almost universally understood as a reference to the operations of Michael Nifong, the Durham County district attorney (pictured nearby), whose abandonment of all semblance of concern about the merits of the rape and assault accusations against three Duke University students was obvious from the first. So was his abundant confidence while broadcasting comments on the guilt of the accused. He seemed a man immune to concerns for appearances as he raced about expounding on the case against the accused lacrosse players and calling them hooligans. He would hear nothing by way of concern from Duke administrators (seven months into this affair, the university president did find an opportunity to mention the accused students' right to a presumption of innocence) -- and certainly none from the politically progressive quarters of the Duke faculty who lent their names to an impassioned ad thanking everyone who had come out to march in protest against the rape and assault of the exotic dancer; 88 faculty members signed it, among them such Duke luminaries as Alice Kaplan, author and student of fascism, and Frank Lentricchia, literary critic.

Unable to take part in the ad signing, Duke's administrators nonetheless found ways to identify with its spirit. Soon after news broke of the Duke athletes' alleged brutish sex crimes against a black woman, the administration undertook a well-publicized campaign targeting the entire lacrosse team for offensive behavior. President Richard Brodhead was, it seems, barely able to recover from the shock of his discovery that a party thrown by male jocks could occasion heavy drinking. And related loutish behavior. Not to mention a stripper. Lacrosse was suspended for the season, and the team coach, Mike Pressler, was shortly after forced to resign. Mr. Brodhead in due course reinstated the team, but on probation, and with conditions, i.e., no underage drinking and disorderly conduct, and no harassment. The members of other Duke organizations, sports teams included, which had sponsored parties where alcohol flowed freely and which had featured strippers -- an informal count reveals at least 20 known to have done so -- no doubt understood that they faced no similar disciplinary action. The reason for the moral-cleansing program devised for the lacrosse team could scarcely have been missed.

Mr. Nifong's confidence that he had nothing to fear from establishment opinion or from the leaders of the great university as he bounded about making hash of the rules of justice -- prime among them the accused's right to a presumption of innocence -- proved justified. And might have remained so longer but for the catastrophic effects of the accuser's unraveling stories.

Mr. Nifong is no anomaly -- merely a product of the political times, a prosecutor who has absorbed all the clues about the sanctified status now accorded charges involving rape, child sex-abuse and accusations of racism. Which has in turn ensured their transformation into weapons of unequalled power. Like others before him, the DA quickly grasped the career possibilities open to him with such a case and proceeded accordingly -- denouncing racism, and the rape and assault of a helpless black woman, and the Duke athletes guilty of these crimes in every media interview available to him (and they were many). * * *

For all the public shock and fury over his behavior, there is little that is new or strange about Mr. Nifong. We have seen the likes of this district attorney, uninterested in proofs of innocence, willing to suppress any he found, many times in the busy army of prosecutors claiming to have found evidence of rampant child abuse in nursery schools and other child-care centers around the country in the 1980s and throughout most of the '90s. They built case after headline-making case charging the mass molestation of small children, and managed to convict scores of innocent Americans on the basis of testimony no rational mind could credit. Law officers who regularly violated requirements of due process in their effort to obtain a conviction, they grasped the special advantage that was theirs: That for a prosecutor dealing with molestation, and wearing the mantle of avenger, there was no such thing as excess, no limits to what could be said of the accused. In court, rules could be bent, any charges presented, and nonexistent medical evidence proclaimed as proof positive of the accusation.

In his role of avenger of a young black woman alleged to have been brutalized by white males, Mr. Nifong proceeded with similar assurance. His was a crusade. Who but enemies of the good would object? Confronted with hard questions about his evidence, whether from the defense or the press, Mr. Nifong answered that these challenges were all designed to intimidate the rape victim. More than once the DA suggested, as criticisms of his case multiplied, that he was himself a victim of the press. He could have had little complaint, last summer, about the New York Times, which provided its own reports on the Duke story. It maintained that that the DA's case had been distorted by the defense and that there was, in fact, a body of evidence that supported the decision to take the case to a jury. A close study of this work's wondrous logic, and of its body of evidence, should provide rich material for students of the press for years to come.

The jury to which Mr. Nifong played -- the black population of Durham -- duly helped re-elect him. This could not prevent his case of rape and abuse against the three Duke students from coming undone, thanks in part to his own heedless behavior but mainly to the accusing dancer herself, whose shifting stories and checkered past could not be hidden.

Mr. Nifong had, of course, nothing like the advantages of nursery school prosecutors: endearing 4- and 5-year-old witnesses clutching teddy bears, who came to court to recite lies they had been cajoled into inventing, about how the accused had raped and stabbed them, cut off the legs of animals -- the kinds of charges mounted, against elderly Violet Amirault of Massachusetts and her adult children Cheryl and Gerald, proprietors of the respected Fells Acres Day School. Many like them were caught up in the era's whirlwind of accusation and sensational trials invariably leading to conviction, on which ambitious prosecutors built careers. Almost all those cases would ultimately be thrown out by appeals courts, most of the time not before those convicted had served long years and paid with the ruin of their lives.

Mr. Nifong's case has come undone long before any trial, fortunately for the three Duke students charged. They have had, nevertheless, a powerful taste of what it means to have been named and despised as perpetrators of abhorrent sexual crimes. I could go to prison for 30 years, Reade Seligmann, one of the accused, told the late Ed Bradley during a "60 Minutes" interview last October -- and "for something that never happened"

Neither Mr. Seligmann nor the other accused Duke students will ever have to contend with a punishment like the one meted out to Gerald Amirault, who was sentenced to a 30- to 40-year term for something that never happened -- atrocious sex crimes that never took place, of which there was no physical evidence, or anything resembling a credible allegation. What did it matter that the child's testimony that resulted in Gerald's conviction had claimed rape with a large butcher's knife -- one that had magically left not the slightest injury? The jury's most important duty was, the prosecutors informed them, to believe the children and show that they honored their testimony. The same young witness also testified that Gerald was accompanied by a green, silver and yellow robot, R2-D2, from "Star Wars."

What did it matter, either, that special judicial hearings about the Amiraults' prosecution had concluded that it was a travesty, that a tough panel of former prosecutors, the Governor's Board of Pardons, had virtually declared Gerald Amirault innocent and voted for commutation of his sentence -- or that he was finally granted parole nearly three years ago, after nearly 18 years' imprisonment? He was almost immediately classified by Massachusetts's Sex Offenders Registry Board as a Level 3 offender. The kind, that is, deemed the most dangerous and most likely to re-offend. This bizarre classification, the board made clear, had to do with the number of counts of sex abuse charged to him -- and the fact, too, that he continued to deny guilt. He now has to wear a large tracking device around his ankle, and obey a curfew confining him to the house from 11:30 p.m. to 6 a.m. every day. He has, not surprisingly, been unable to find a job. He is sustained, as ever, by the unstinting devotion of his family, and he grieves now mainly for the loss of the chance he had dreamed of in prison -- of earning a salary and finally lightening the burden his wife had carried, uncomplaining and alone, during his years in prison. (He has recently been advised of pending legislation that will require him to pay $10 a day for the global positioning tag on his leg, that tracks him.)

The accused Duke students can be grateful that the case against them has collapsed, and that Mr. Nifong now confronts a serious ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. They will never have to face anything like the malignant force which descended on the happy and ambitious Amiraults in 1984, and turned their lives to dust. But Reade Seligmann, David Evans and Collin Finnerty have this year had a look into an abyss that has claimed many others, and that is never less than terrorizing. It is a piece of their Duke education they are unlikely to forget.

ANTITRUST:

US Airways Raises Bid For Delta To $10.2 Billion (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

US Airways turned up the pressure yesterday in its hostile takeover bid for bankrupt Delta Air Lines by boosting its offer, setting a February deadline for action and sending its top executive to Capitol Hill to reassure legislators that a merger would not harm consumers.

The push comes as US Airways appeared to have lost some momentum in its effort to entice Delta's creditors to accept its bid. Yesterday, it increased its original offer, about $8.6 billion, to $10.2 billion, including $5 billion in cash and nearly 90 million shares of US Airways stock.

Attorneys representing Delta's creditors committee did not return phone messages or e-mails seeking comment. US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker said in an interview that his company increased its bid because he "wanted to remove any doubt as to which proposal offered more money to the creditors."

With creditors considering "the risk of our plan against the risk of a stand-alone plan," US Airways wanted to "make that choice that much easier for them," Parker said.

Analysts yesterday said US Airways' latest offer would probably be taken seriously by Delta's creditors. "While it is likely that a US Airways-Delta merger could take longer to close than Delta emerging from bankruptcy, one cannot ignore the magnitude of the cash component" of the offer, Merrill Lynch analyst Michael Linenberg wrote in a research note.

Parker set a Feb. 1 deadline for creditors to respond to the offer by meeting conditions that would include Delta opening its financial books for review. US Airways is running against a deadline to reap the benefits of combining the carriers while Delta is still under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

With Delta in bankruptcy protection, US Airways could more easily rework contracts and leases for planes and other high-cost items.

Last month, Delta submitted a reorganization plan to the U.S. Bankruptcy Court that valued the company at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Its chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in an interview last month that he wanted Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a stand-alone carrier. He shrugged off suggestions that he would seek partners.

But reports on the Wall Street Journal's Web site yesterday indicated that executives at Delta and another carrier in bankruptcy protection, Northwest Airlines, have been discussing a merger. Representatives of both airlines declined to comment on the reports.

US Airways' original bid for Delta in November sparked speculation in the industry about potential mergers. Continental and United airlines have been talking, according to sources with knowledge of the conversations. And Northwest has asked a bankruptcy judge for permission to hire financial consultants to help it plan for the possibility of a merger.

The merger talk led the Senate Commerce Committee to announce that it would hold a hearing on the issue Jan. 24. Committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) did not respond to requests for comment.

Delta is based in Atlanta, and Georgia's senators have been critical of the proposed US Airways-Delta merger and sent a letter to the Commerce Committee requesting the hearing.

Calling US Airways a "bottom fisher" for targeting Delta as it attempts to emerge from bankruptcy protection, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) said in an interview that a merger would hurt consumers because a combined airline would cut flights to small and mid-size markets now served by both carriers.

When US Airways announced its offer, Isakson said he called U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to urge his department to "purse every competitive issue they need to pursue." The Justice Department would analyze a potential merger between the airlines for antitrust violations.

Congressional concerns about a merger prompted Parker to visit a dozen legislators on Capitol Hill this week. He declined to identify the lawmakers but said he looked forward to the possibility of testifying before the Commerce Committee.

"It will give us the opportunity to explain . . . that this is good for consumers and good for our industry," he said.

Some analysts said that a deal would face serious obstacles and that creditors may not be swayed just by the extra cash. The creditors could decide that the money would not make up for the headaches of a potentially grueling regulatory approval process at the Justice Department. Also, executives would have to combine two very different workforces -- one of which is fiercely fighting a merger, the analysts said.

"The creditors are sitting there going, 'It's more money, but will it get done?' " said Helane Becker, an analyst with the Benchmark Co. Delta coming out of bankruptcy protection "is the safer offer because it is the one that gets done sooner rather than later."

US Airways Pumps Up Hostile Bid For Delta (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 11, 2007

The merger plot just thickened at Delta Air Lines.

US Airways bumped up its takeover bid for the Atlanta-based airline by 20 percent Wednesday, to $10.3 billion, adding a Feb. 1 deadline in a move to pressure Delta's bankruptcy court creditors — who have a big say in whether the deal goes through.

Industry analysts said that should give Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways a better shot at persuading the creditors to choose its hostile takeover bid over Delta management's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent carrier.

But a report also surfaced that Delta and Northwest Airlines, also in Chapter 11 proceedings, have had talks about a possible merger after they both exit bankruptcy.

Citing unidentified sources, the Wall Street Journal reported that the two airlines were talking at various levels of management.

It said Delta and its creditors may see a post-bankruptcy link-up with Northwest as a better alternative to the US Airways bid. The Journal also said Delta and United Airlines have had contacts.

A merger involving Delta and any of those possible partners would create the world's biggest airline. It would require approval of the U.S. Justice Department, which historically has taken a dim view of such large-scale deals.

Delta declined to comment on the report. It could be holding limited talks with other carriers as part of its obligation to creditors. Under bankruptcy law, Delta's management has an obligation to creditors, the ultimate owners of the reorganizing company, to seriously examine options.

Delta executives have rebuffed the US Airways bid — first launched in November — and insist they want to bring the airline out of Chapter 11 on its own. But they have not ruled out later deals. Indeed, CEO Gerald Grinstein has long predicted an eventual industry consolidation.

Delta said in a statement that its board will review the revised US Airways offer. But it added: "On its face, the revised proposal does not address significant concerns that have been raised about the initial US Airways proposal and, in fact, would increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion."

Still, the sweetened US Airways offer and the reported talks with Northwest propelled speculation that Delta will ultimately find itself in a deal.

"Delta was in play before," Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York, said in an e-mail. "Now it's really up for grabs." Sabino predicted US Airways may raise its bid again, perhaps to $11 billion.

"Jerry Grinstein is not getting much sleep these days. He's thinking 'Doug Parker (US Airways CEO) is after me. Who else is going to call?' " said Sabino.

US Airways' fattened offer includes $5 billion in cash to creditors and 89.5 million shares in the merged airline, up from $4 billion cash and 78.5 million shares initially. That boosted the offer's market value to $10.3 billion, from $8.5 billion.

Delta's stand-alone reorganization plan, filed last month, calls for creditors to get stock in the reorganized company, which it says would be worth up to $12 billion. Some analysts have predicted Delta will have to add a cash payment to its plan.

Calyon Securities analyst Ray Neidl said US Airways boosted its odds that it will succeed from 40 percent to 50 percent, saying the new bid will be "very attractive" to creditors.

But creditors still have to worry that the Justice Department may block the merger, he noted. That would not only kill the deal but also could delay Delta's Chapter 11 exit.

The idea of a post-bankruptcy merger of Delta and Northwest "sounds credible," said Neidl. He said it would probably result in Delta's management remaining in charge.

That would negate at least some of the opposition among Delta workers to a US Airways deal, in which the Arizona carrier would be expected to run the new airline and call the shots on the headquarters location.

Neidl also said he thinks a Delta-Northwest deal would pass Justice scrutiny more easily because the two carriers have less route overlap.

But Parker made it clear US Airways isn't giving up.

"Simply stated, it is time for the process to move forward," Parker said in a conference call Wednesday.

He said he expects Delta creditors will agree to support the initial steps of a merger, such as beginning so-called "due diligence" of the proposed combination and asking federal regulators to begin an antitrust review, by the Feb. 1 deadline.

Parker, in an interview with The Atlanta Journal Constitution nine days ago, said, "We don't feel any need to amend the [initial] offer."

He said Wednesday that his airline decided to raise the offer after "more conversations with creditors," including a meeting Monday with retired Continental Airlines CEO Gordon Bethune, recently hired by Delta's unsecured creditors committee to help it evaluate the US Airways bid vs. Delta's stand-alone plan.

Bethune presented his report to the committee Wednesday.

"It was quite clear as we had more conversations that they ... didn't see as clearly as we did that our proposal had so much more value that it justified the risk of going forward with us," Parker said. "We came to the conclusion that we should make the decision much, much easier for them."

Delta's unsecured creditors committee — which includes big suppliers, banks and the carrier's pilots' union — is a key player in determining the outcome of the takeover bid and is quietly evaluating both Delta's stand-alone plan and the US Airways offer.

The committee hasn't given a public reaction to the merger offer so far. Leaders of Delta's pilots' union oppose it.

"We're 100 percent focused on killing this US Airways hostile merger," union chief Lee Moak said Wednesday. He declined to even address the reported talks with Northwest. "Our goal is to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone carrier. We're not even considering anything else."

US Airways Increases Bid For Delta (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

ATLANTA -- US Airways increased the pressure on Delta Air Lines' unsecured creditors to take its buyout offer by raising the bid Wednesday nearly 20 percent to $10.3 billion. Whether the deal would survive regulatory scrutiny may be the deciding factor.

The Tempe, Ariz.-based company also set a Feb. 1 deadline for certain conditions to be met or its entire bid would be revoked.

The ball is now in the creditors' court.

The question is whether they want to take the money US Airways is offering and run the risk of a long regulatory fight, or stick with Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a standalone company worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion.

Daniel Golden, a lawyer for Delta's official unsecured creditors committee, did not return several phone calls Wednesday seeking comment. Most of the large creditors on the committee have refused to discuss their position publicly, except Delta's pilots union, which opposes the merger.

An unofficial group of unsecured creditors issued a statement calling on Delta "to provide thoughtful and unbiased consideration" to the enhanced offer. It urged the airline's management to cooperate fully with US Airways' efforts to get information and not to deter alternatives from other companies that could provide stakeholders greater recoveries than under a standalone reorganization. The group represents creditors holding about $2.3 billion in claims against Delta.

Delta management has argued that the combination of US Airways and Delta would not receive regulatory approval because of the overlap of the two carriers' routes. US Airways says there wouldn't be any regulatory holdup.

A Jan. 24 hearing has been scheduled by the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation on the state of the airline industry and the potential impact of airline mergers.

Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities in New York, said the increased offer will be more attractive to Delta's creditors, but the great unknown is whether regulators would approve the deal.

"In my opinion, that's going to be the main thing," Neidl said, adding that he gives the US Airways bid a 50-50 chance of being successful.

US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker told analysts Wednesday there's an easy way to know who is right on the regulatory issues.

"Let's just go ask them and find out," Parker said of regulators. Parker was in Washington on Wednesday to talk to lawmakers.

Delta Air Lines Inc. said in a statement Wednesday that its board will do its duty to review the revised offer by US Airways. But, the Atlanta-based airline added, "On its face, the revised proposal does not address significant concerns that have been raised about the initial US Airways proposal and, in fact, would increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion."

Added Kelly Collins, a spokeswoman for Delta's pilots union, "We remain entirely committed to defending our airline from this hostile merger attempt."

US Airways said it would raise its offer by $1.7 billion from its Nov. 15 bid that was currently valued at $8.6 billion.

The decision to increase the offer was reached over the weekend after US Airways officials met to discuss it. On Monday, the carrier's executives met with Gordon Bethune, the former Continental Airlines chief who is working as a consultant to Delta's creditors committee. Bethune urged US Airways to put its best offer forward, according to an official with knowledge of the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

US Airways shares rose $1.03, or 1.8 percent, to close at $58.93 in trading Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange, boosting the value of the revised offer.

The increased offer comes just two weeks after Parker told The Associated Press that his company had no intention at the time to increase its bid.

Even so, Parker did not exactly rule out at the time the possibility of changing his mind about the price.

DOJ_NMG_0115259

Parker said Wednesday that US Airways was raising its offer to remove any doubt that its bid was worth more than Delta's plan to remain a standalone carrier.

"Right now, we feel very good about our chances of getting this done" despite Delta management's position, Parker said in a conference call with analysts.

Parker said in an interview Wednesday that Delta's official creditors committee did not ask US Airways to raise its offer, but it indicated it was having a hard time reaching a decision.

"We just wanted to make it a much, much easier analysis for them, and today we've done that," Parker said.

US Airways said the increased offer is set to expire on Feb. 1 unless creditors indicate support for the start of the due diligence process, which would open up Delta's books to US Airways. US Airways also wants support by the creditors for postponing a Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing involving Delta's reorganization plan, and it wants the creditors committee to support both companies filing paperwork with the Justice Department that would start the regulatory process.

Parker said "the offer would go away in its entirety" if those conditions were not met.

Parker also suggested US Airways isn't too worried about Delta management's position.

"We would very much like to see Delta management begin to work with us and support this transaction, but that's not what this proposal is about," Parker said.

The increased bid includes 89.5 million shares of US Airways stock and $5 billion in cash. The original offer included 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock and $4 billion in cash.

Based on the Delta's valuation method, US Airways estimated that its increased bid could actually be worth $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion. Those valuation methods were not disclosed.

Delta's official unsecured creditors committee, which will play a key role in deciding the airline's future course, had said prior to Wednesday that it was reviewing both Delta's standalone plan and US Airways' buyout offer.

The committee also has said it would review any offers that came in from other airlines. But as recently as last month, Delta's chief financial officer, Ed Bastian, said there hadn't been any other offers. The Wall Street Journal, citing anonymous sources, reported Wednesday that Delta has been talking with Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. about a possible combination. Spokespeople for Delta and Northwest declined to comment.

The Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing would be to consider approval of Delta's disclosure statement relating to the carrier's standalone reorganization plan.

The disclosure statement includes details on Delta's operations. If the statement is approved, that means Delta can begin soliciting votes on its reorganization plan, which typically takes four to eight weeks.

Parker has said previously that if that hearing were to go forward it could increase the urgency of US Airways' bid because US Airways hopes to consummate its deal to buy Delta before Delta emerges from Chapter 11.

Can Delta Win Battle To Keep Flying Solo? (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

In the two months since US Airways Group Inc. announced its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the embattled carrier has mounted a high-octane campaign of grass-roots organizing and fierce political lobbying to try to stay independent -- but all that has succeeded in doing is attracting a higher offer and a potential new suitor.

Yesterday, US Airways increased its bid to $10.3 billion, up 20% from its original proposal, while people familiar with the situation said there have been recurring talks between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. about the two combining when each emerges from bankruptcy later this year. While Delta maintains its insistence that its future is brightest as a stand-alone carrier, the talks with Northwest suggest that Delta executives are grappling privately with how much more the airline can afford to pay to creditors to remain independent. Northwest has emerged as a "promising third option," according to one person familiar with the matter.

Northwest is expected to file its preliminary plan of reorganization in the next few days, and has been out raising equity capital to help fund the company once it leaves Chapter 11 in the second quarter. Northwest last month hired investment banking and restructuring advisers Evercore Partners Inc. to help it evaluate and possibly implement a merger, acquisition or other business combination.

Delta has also run the numbers on a potential merger with Northwest and continues to update the calculations as the two companies' reorganizations progress, according to a person with knowledge of the matter. Delta's creditors committee has directed its advisers to do the same and will meet with the airline in the coming days, another person said.

An important question for Delta's creditors: Does it make sense to pursue a merger in bankruptcy, which could extend Delta's stay in court protection and hamper business, or would the airline be better off weighing a combination once it emerges in April?

After waiting weeks to mount a counterattack against the original offer, Delta has become relentless in trying to defeat US Airways, using tactics ranging from 40 million e-mails to frequent fliers to "Keep Delta My Delta" buttons worn by airline employees.

US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said the efforts to fan opposition to the takeover haven't tilted the odds against his airline. "I don't believe that's the case at all," he said. Still, Mr. Parker said last week that he wasn't considering increasing the Tempe, Ariz., airline's initial offer because it was obviously superior to a restructuring plan proposed by Delta last month. But it became clearer since that creditors were "wrestling" with the two offers, he said yesterday.

J.P. Morgan analyst Jamie Baker wrote in a research note last month that Delta's "hard sell" has slightly improved its chances of remaining independent, though he expects the company will eventually succumb to US Airways or another merger partner.

The sweetened offer will test fragile allegiances Delta has been forging with pilots, other employees, customers and political leaders who were squeezed for concessions by Delta as it tumbled into bankruptcy in 2005. If it decides to increase its go-it-alone bid to creditors, Delta might be forced to shrink the amount of equity and profit-sharing that employees stand to get under the airline's current turnaround plan.

US Airways set a Feb. 1 deadline for its latest offer, comprised of $5 billion in cash plus 89.5 million shares of US Airways common stock. That likely will force creditors to start making up their minds sooner than the Feb. 7 bankruptcy-court hearing where Delta had hoped for approval to start asking creditors to vote on its plan. Yesterday, US Airways shares rose $1.03, or 1.8%, to $58.93 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 4 p.m., putting the value of the US Airways bid at $10.27 billion.

In a memo to employees, Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said the enhanced offer fails to "address serious concerns," including Delta's claim that the merger would cost thousands of workers their jobs and can't clear antitrust hurdles. The deal also would "increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion," he added.

To regain momentum for independence, Delta must now ratchet up its lobbying and organizing efforts while simultaneously giving creditors what they want most of all: more money. Delta is considering inviting a private-equity firm to invest in the airline, finding deeper cuts as part of its stand-alone restructuring plan or merging with someone other than US Airways, according to people familiar with the situation.

Delta's recent campaign is a sharp contrast with its flat-footed response to the original bid two months ago when Mr. Grinstein heard about it on the radio as he dressed for work. Mr. Grinstein's communications director had recently resigned, leaving behind a thin staff. And while US Airways approached Delta twice before going public with its hostile bid, Delta said little about the surprise offer for several days. Instead, executives kept their daily schedules.

Behind the scenes, Jim Whitehurst, Delta's operating chief, pressed Delta officials to fight toe-to-toe with Mr. Parker, arguing that Delta would win if it engaged creditors and other groups aggressively. Delta soon installed outside media consultant Cynthia Hudson, who helped during bitter pilot-contract negotiations, as temporary head of corporate communications, and turned to crisis-communications firm Kekst & Co. The New York company, which has worked with Delta for several years, helped Walt Disney Co. resist a takeover by Comcast Corp. in 2004.

Since then, Delta executives and lobbyists have been making the rounds on Capitol Hill, with their efforts gaining enough traction to force a Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation hearing Jan. 24 on the merger's potential impact on competition and customers. Mr. Grinstein, who has visited lawmakers personally, is expected to testify.

Meanwhile, a Delta employee group has been using part of its annual funding from the company to finance its "Keep Delta My Delta" campaign, which began the day after the bid.

The group has distributed buttons to 45,000 flight attendants, ticket agents and other Delta employees throughout the world, and the airline waived rules so workers can wear the buttons on their uniforms. The new keepdeltamydelta.org5 Web site solicits signatures for a petition that will be sent to the Justice Department, and Delta supplied an interactive map showing the negative effects it contends would result from a takeover.

The Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta pilots and holds one of the largest bankruptcy claims, has held demonstrations in a dozen cities, including a rally in Delta's home city of Atlanta last month that drew more than 3,000 current and retired employees, members of Georgia's congressional delegation and a day's worth of media coverage.

Delta has even started new service to Charlotte, N.C., and Pittsburgh, two US Airways hubs, as part of a push to project Delta as a vigorous, quickly recovering carrier.

Yesterday, US Airways launched its own takeover Web site called buildingabetterairline.com. In a letter to US Airways employees, Mr. Parker reiterated his pledge that no "frontline" workers will be laid off if the hostile takeover succeeds. Northwest declined to comment on its talks with Delta.

A New Focus On Delta Air As Deal Bait (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

Delta Air Lines, in such dire straits a year ago that its chief financial officer called it “a company I’m not sure we could have given away,” is suddenly in great demand.

US Airways increased its unsolicited bid for Delta by more than 20 percent early yesterday, to about $10.3 billion. Hours later, Northwest Airlines emerged as a potential suitor.

Delta, according to people involved in the talks, is hoping to fend off US Airways, and has been in talks with Northwest for weeks. Both carriers are operating in bankruptcy, with plans to emerge later this year.

A Northwest bid would probably be preferable to Delta managers because the two airlines’ route networks overlap less than with Delta and US Airways. A combination with Northwest is therefore likely to lead to fewer grounded planes, if any.

Delta would not comment on the Northwest talks, a spokeswoman, Betsy Talton, said. Roman Blahoski, a Northwest spokesman, also declined to comment.

The growing interest in Delta reflects the improving fortunes of the airline industry, which is starting to post rare profits, and also perhaps the start of a new wave of consolidation.

While the progress of any particular deal is a matter of conjecture, yesterday’s events suggested that one or more airline mergers had become likelier than even a week ago.

Airlines, recovering from half a decade of huge losses, remain highly vulnerable to the next economic downturn, and many people see consolidation as a way to reduce costs and strengthen the industry’s financial condition. United Airlines and Continental have been engaged in preliminary merger talks. And many analysts expect that a big merger could force one or two more.

US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., first offered $8 billion to buy Delta, of Atlanta, in mid-November. But the effort failed to gain backing from Delta creditors, who will control the carrier after bankruptcy.

Delta management has issued a stand-alone plan it said was superior to the offer from US Airways. A slow-moving series of meetings followed between creditors and representatives of Delta and US Airways, which served to pick apart competing proposals. And it appeared that the proposed big merger might dissolve.

That changed on Monday morning, when the Delta creditors' new consultant, Gordon M. Bethune, the 65-year-old former chief executive who turned around Continental Airlines, met with US Airways' chief, W. Douglas Parker, 45.

They met at the Midtown Manhattan offices of Citigroup, which is advising US Airways, Mr. Parker said. And, through a series of tough questions about the merger proposal, Mr. Bethune made clear that Mr. Parker should increase his bid to overcome creditors' doubts about the risks of the deal, according to Mr. Parker.

"He uses a lot of profanity; he asked a lot of questions," Mr. Parker said of Mr. Bethune in an interview. "It was clear they were still wrestling with our proposal. Was there enough reward to warrant the risk? He was very direct."

Mr. Bethune did not return calls seeking comment. Daniel H. Golden, a lawyer for the creditors' committee, declined to comment.

In the meantime, Delta management has been pursuing its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline and preparing for a Feb. 7 hearing on the plan. And it announced last week that it had agreed to buy 30 new regional jets, a move that flies in the face of Mr. Parker's plan to cut back the combined carriers under the Delta name.

"Those airplanes aren't consistent with our plan," Mr. Parker said.

So, seeing Delta potentially slipping away, he raised his bid, adding $1 billion in cash, for a total of $5 billion, and 11 million US Airways shares, for a total of 89.5 million, valued around $5.3 billion at yesterday's closing price of $58.93 a share. Delta creditors would receive 49 percent of the stock in the combined company.

The bid will expire Feb. 1 unless creditors come out in support of allowing US Airways to conduct due diligence on Delta, support a filing with antitrust regulators to begin a review of the proposed deal, and call for postponement of the Feb. 7 hearing on Delta's stand-alone plan.

Delta management valued the stand-alone plan at $9.4 billion to $12 billion, a range US Airways and some analysts said was based on overly optimistic estimates. Using Delta's valuation method, US Airways said its latest offer would be worth $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion. "The revised offer eliminates any conceivable doubt," Mr. Parker said.

Roger King, an analyst at CreditSights, agreed, saying the Delta management plan was almost certainly dead on arrival. "The entrance of Gordon Bethune is a major positive for" US Airways, Mr. King said.

Delta has said that US Airways' initial bid would not pass antitrust scrutiny because it added too much debt to the companies, and that it would further strain relations with workers. Delta said that it would review the new offer but argued that it raised the same questions.

The union representing Delta pilots said it was opposed to the US Airways proposal. And some union officials representing other US Air workers have expressed reservations about the combination because they had yet to enter into new labor contracts reflecting a merger in 2005 with America West.

Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta chapter of the Air Line Pilots Association, said the group voted yesterday to commit $15 million more to defeat the US Airways bid. "We will do everything we can to kill this merger," Mr. Moak said.

Delta And Northwest Merger Idea Has Its Advantages (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, January 11, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS - No one knows if Northwest and Delta airlines will end up together, but the idea strikes some observers as sensible.

Recurring talks between the two carriers have taken place, the Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday, citing anonymous sources. Both airlines declined to comment. Even if managers at the two bankrupt airlines make a deal, creditors would have to approve, too.

But observers pointed out that Delta Air Lines Inc.'s routes have less overlap with Northwest than with US Airways, which has proposed buying Delta. Northwest's domestic routes are concentrated in the Midwest and Asia, while Delta is strong in the South and East and over the Atlantic.

Less overlap could mean less resistance from antitrust regulators, said former Northwest board member and Northwest Capt. Mike Ristow.

"In terms of a global network, they come up with something more attractive" than a Delta-US Airways merger would, said Daniel Kasper, managing director of aviation consulting firm LECG in Cambridge, Mass. LECG has done bankruptcy work for both Delta and Northwest.

The idea of one bankrupt carrier merging with another might seem far-fetched. But bankruptcy allows airlines to slash expenses for things like aircraft leases, debt, and workers. Among the older carriers that were around before deregulation, Delta and Northwest could end up as two of the healthier ones.

That means investors might be willing to put in new money, Kasper said.

It wouldn't be unreasonable for investors "to expect that the deal might be priced in a way that there would be some interesting upside potential coming out of it," he said. "I wouldn't have any trouble at all imagining money going into a deal like that."

Delta had rejected an offer from US Airways Group Inc., but US Airways raised its bid to $10.3 billion on Wednesday. Delta managers have said they want it to emerge as a standalone carrier.

Last month, Northwest disclosed that it had hired Evercore Partners to advise it on merger possibilities. At the time, Northwest Chief Executive Doug Steenland said it was hiring Evercore in case a merger proposal came along for Northwest.

"It remains our intention, and let me emphasize this, our intention to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of calendar year 2007 on a standalone, independent basis," Steenland said in a hot line message to employees on Dec. 11.

The intention to emerge as a standalone carrier was absent from a message to employees on Wednesday in response to the Wall Street Journal story.

"Northwest intends to file its plan of reorganization in its Chapter 11 bankruptcy court prior to January 16, 2007 and to emerge from Chapter 11 in the second quarter of 2007. Northwest is monitoring developments in the airline industry and is committed to acting in the best interest of all of its constituents," the message said.

Northwest spokesman Roman Blahoski declined to comment on the difference between the two statements, or to comment on whether Northwest still intends to emerge as a standalone carrier.

Ristow said managers at Northwest and Delta talk to each other routinely about code-sharing and marketing partnerships.

"They don't talk about the competitive stuff because that's illegal, but they certainly have a real good idea of how each other operates, and whether they're compatible, and whether they make sense" as a merged operation, he said.

"It would be ridiculous to think that they haven't at least had some preliminary discussions."

Monsanto Expects DOJ Review To Delay Delta And Pine Merger (BZJRNL)

St. Louis Business Journal, January 11, 2007

Monsanto Co. said in a regulatory filing Tuesday that its proposed $1.5 billion acquisition of cotton seed breeder Delta and Pine Land Co. might be delayed past its mid-February targeted closing due to U.S. Department of Justice approvals.

In its quarterly regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Monsanto said that the deadline for the merger, initially announced in August, is Feb. 14, subject to an automatic extension of up to six months to complete regulatory reviews. The company said in the filing that it anticipates the regulatory process might extend beyond that date, invoking the automatic extension.

The merger has been approved by the boards of both company's and Delta's shareholders approved the deal Dec. 21. The transaction is being reviewed by federal and state authorities, including the Department of Justice.

To make the deal more acceptable to regulators, Monsanto pledged in August to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business and is looking for potential buyers for that business.

Monsanto had agreed to buy Delta in a deal valued at $1.9 billion when it was first announced in May 1998, but the deal was aborted the next year after Monsanto couldn't reach a deal with regulators over antitrust concerns.

A Public Pension Fund Sues Directors Of Caremark Rx (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

A public pension fund in Louisiana has sued the directors of Caremark Rx, contending that their unanimous backing of the company's $21 billion merger with CVS over a rival $26 billion bid from Express Scripts improperly benefits Caremark executives at the expense of shareholders.

Among the benefits Caremark executives and directors will receive if the CVS deal goes through, the fund's lawsuit contends, are positions at the combined company and indemnification from penalties and fines that may result when criminal and regulatory investigations into possible stock option backdating by Caremark officials are concluded.

Yesterday, Express Scripts filed suit to block the CVS deal, arguing that the terms deal supported by the Caremark board prevents its directors from executing their fiduciary duties to shareholders.

The lawsuits, filed in Delaware Chancery Court, will once again bring the fiduciary duties of directors in the post-Enron world to the forefront. Delaware is where most major United States companies are incorporated.

Caremark accepted the CVS bid on Nov. 1, even though the stock-for-stock deal offered no premium to Caremark's market price at the time.

Caremark's directors have recommended that company shareholders approve the deal at a meeting that is expected to occur before March 16.

On Monday, Caremark rejected the $26 billion bid made on Dec. 18 by Express Scripts, saying that it would "result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" if it was approved by shareholders. The Express Scripts offer of $58.50 a share is approximately 15 percent higher than the CVS bid.

The lawsuit filed by the Louisiana Municipal Police Employees' Retirement System contends that the CVS deal is unfair to Caremark shareholders not only because its price is significantly below the rival bid.

The pension fund's lawyers also argue that Caremark directors improperly accepted deal protection provisions in the CVS bid that act to deter other bidders, effectively making the deal a fait accompli even before the shareholders vote.

First, there is the $675 million breakup fee to be paid by Caremark in cash to CVS, if the target walks away. Then, there is a so-called last-look provision, which gives CVS the chance to come back and top any rival bid.

"Any potential third-party bidders will be loath to invest the time and resources necessary to pursue a superior bid while knowing full well that CVS retains control of the bidding," the pension fund's lawsuit says.

The Louisiana fund accuses the Caremark board of supporting the deal to benefit Edwin M. Crawford, the company's chief executive, and other executives.

Under the terms of the deal, nine Caremark executives will join the combined company and Mr. Crawford will become chairman of its board and receive an estimated $48 million in exit pay. While he would probably receive a similar amount if Caremark sold out to Express Scripts, Mr. Crawford might not be asked to join the combined company under the terms of such a deal.

The Louisiana pension fund also noted that the CVS deal guarantees a job at the merged company for Mr. Crawford's son, Andrew. A Caremark proxy filed last year described the younger Mr. Crawford as senior vice president for industry analysis and underwriting.

The merger with CVS would also allow an unspecified number of Caremark directors — perhaps all of them — to get lucrative seats on the combined company's board.

In its offer, CVS has also agreed to cover any costs associated with stock option backdating at Caremark, practices that are under federal investigation and the subject of another civil suit filed against the company in Tennessee. That lawsuit has challenged 4.6 million options granted to Mr. Crawford as having been possibly backdated. Stock sales covered by those options generated $262 million for Mr. Crawford, the Tennessee lawsuit contends.

"The inequities could not be more apparent," said Gerald H. Silk, a lawyer at Bernstein, Litowitz, Berger & Grossmann, one of the firms representing the Louisiana fund. "Shareholders get a coercive, zero-premium deal while Crawford gets a $48 million payout, jobs for himself and his son and complete indemnification for his alleged option backdating transgressions."

A Caremark spokesman called the pension fund's lawsuit meritless and said the company would defend against it vigorously.

DOJ_NMG_0115265

As for the Express Scripts suit, he said it was a “frivolous” attempt to interfere with the CVS merger.

“Contrary to allegations made by Express Scripts, the provisions of the CVS merger agreement are lawful and appropriate,” the spokesman said.

To be sure, many of the terms in the CVS bid for Caremark — the no-shop provisions and last-look opportunity — are common in the merger world.

But the suit filed in Delaware, comes at a time when directors’ actions as fiduciaries for their shareholders are under increased scrutiny.

As a result, the case, which is being heard by Chancellor William B. Chandler III, provides an opportunity for him to opine on the matter of directors’ duties broadly and whether the Caremark directors exercised those obligations in particular.

This is familiar territory for Chancellor Chandler, who oversaw the Disney case of 2005. In that case he chastised the company’s directors for essentially rubberstamping a contract struck by Michael D. Eisner with Michael S. Ovitz that resulted in a $140 million severance payout after Mr. Ovitz was terminated a short time later.

Chancellor Chandler has asked for a hearing on the issues before Caremark’s shareholders vote on the CVS bid, now scheduled to take place in mid-March.

In a Dec. 29 meeting with the parties in the case, Chancellor Chandler said that while he was certain Caremark would argue forcefully that its directors exercised their duties of care and loyalty to the company’s owners, he also concluded that “there is a tenable argument on the other side, and nonfrivolous claims here on the other side, that at least need to be tested against a fuller record.”

Caremark, Express Scripts Try To Sway Shareholders (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Simison And Catherine Larkin

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- Express Scripts Inc. urged Caremark Rx Inc. shareholders to vote against a proposed $22.3 billion buyout by CVS Corp. while Caremark's chief blasted Express Scripts' $24.3 billion offer.

Rejecting the CVS deal would clear the way for Caremark's board to ``give proper consideration to any other offer which it receives, including our proposal'' in stock and cash, Express Scripts said today in a proxy statement. Caremark Chief Executive Officer Edwin ``Mac'' Crawford told investors the Express Scripts bid is hurting his ability to line up new contracts.

At the center of the dispute are competing proposals for restructuring the way Caremark handles a portion of the $251.8 billion in prescriptions distributed each year in the U.S. on behalf of employers and insurance companies. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts the nation's largest manager of drug benefits. CVS, the second-largest U.S. drugstore chain, wants Caremark to gain power to negotiate medicine prices.

``This is a very, very powerful combination,'' Caremark CEO Crawford said at an investor conference in San Francisco today. ``I'm not going away. We're committed to making this work.''

Express Scripts sued Caremark today in Delaware Chancery Court in Wilmington, asking a judge to rule that a $675 million breakup fee if the CVS deal fails is ``unreasonable, unlawful and invalid.''

Seeking Injunction

The complaint seeks an injunction to bar the CVS merger and a Caremark shareholder meeting until ``directors properly review and fully inform the Caremark shareholders of Express Scripts' offer.'' Caremark directors rejected the bid on Jan. 8.

CVS, in a statement today, called the Express Scripts lawsuit a ``desperate attempt'' to derail its merger with Caremark, which CVS said has the backing of both companies' boards and strong support from customers and employees.

St. Louis-based Express Scripts said Dec. 18 that it offered $58.50 in cash and stock for each Caremark share. Express Scripts shares have fallen almost 5 percent since then, lowering the value of its offer to about $24.3 billion, based on today’s closing price and data compiled by Bloomberg citing 426.5 million shares of Caremark outstanding as of Oct. 31.

Express Scripts fell 79 cents today, or 1.2 percent, to $65.27 at the close of Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Shares of Nashville, Tennessee-based Caremark were unchanged at $55.55 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Value of CVS Offer

Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS agreed Nov. 1 to exchange each Caremark share for 1.67 CVS shares. That deal is now valued at $22.3 billion, based on today's CVS closing price of $31.32 on the New York Stock Exchange.

CVS announced after the close of markets that it had raised its quarterly dividend 26 percent to 4.875 cents, its largest- ever increase. John Heinbockel, an analyst at Goldman Sachs in New York, said in a note that the move may close the gap between the perceived value of the two offers and boost Caremark shareholders' confidence in CVS's growth prospects.

Express Scripts took steps to advance its offer yesterday by buying 591,108 shares of Caremark and saying that it planned to nominate four directors to the Caremark board. Express Scripts is seeking proxies from Caremark shareholders for the right to cast their votes in its favor.

Express Scripts told Bloomberg News it included certain types of stock options in the value of its offer, which would increase the deal's value to $24.9 billion according to Bloomberg calculations.

At today's investor conference, Caremark's Crawford said an Express Scripts takeover wouldn't provide strategic or financial benefits while creating the risk of government antitrust sanctions and hurting sales.

Contracts at Risk

Caremark may lose contracts that would generate more than $8 billion in revenue because of the threatened proxy fight as uncertainty makes customers less willing to sign new contracts for managing drug benefits, Crawford said.

``We are already being shut out by decision-makers" because of the possibility that Express Scripts may take over Caremark, Crawford said. ``They like us and our pricing, but they can't take the risk that we won't be in charge."

He cited a ``very large health plan" that may switch to Medco Health Solutions Inc., the No. 1 drug-benefits manager; ``a very large state" contract generating more than $1 billion that may be in jeopardy because of a lawsuit against Express Scripts, and a health plan in upstate New York. ``The list is long," Crawford said.

An antitrust delay in completing a takeover by Express Scripts ``will destroy the 2007 selling season and perhaps the 2008 selling season," Crawford said.

`Out of Thin Air'

Crawford accused Express Scripts of setting out to disrupt the planned combination with CVS and of making an estimate of $500 million in savings that was ``plucked entirely out of the air." A similar projection of savings from a CVS combination reflects a detailed assessment, he said. Caremark said the Express Scripts bid ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business."

Caremark said in a filing with the New York Stock Exchange yesterday that shareholders of record Jan. 15 will be eligible to vote on the CVS merger. Caremark hasn't set a date for the shareholder meeting. Express Scripts left the dates blank in its preliminary proxy statement.

``We urge you to send the company's board a clear message that a sale to CVS for little or no premium is not a desired outcome, and that they should take all necessary steps to maximize shareholder value," Express Scripts said in the proxy statement.

Express Scripts also asked the Delaware court to rule that its law firm, Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, isn't conflicted because it once represented AdvancePCS, which Caremark bought.

Equity Office May Be In Play (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Expectations were building last night that rival bidders might soon materialize to challenge the $20 billion buyout of Equity Office Properties Trust by Blackstone Group.

Top real-estate and private-equity investors were buzzing that a competing offer could come within a matter of days, possibly from an investment team led by real-estate maven Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital Group Global LLC and Neil Bluhm of Walton Street Capital. The two were seriously considering an offer last night, said one person briefed on their plans.

The two still haven't completed financing for an offer. One possible funding source could be Cerberus Capital Management, a New York-based financial conglomerate, people familiar with the matter said.

A competing bid would set off what would be the most high-stakes and high-profile bidding war since the contest for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago. And it would be a potent indicator of the intensity of the competitive rivalry to buy companies. So far, buyout firms have observed an unstated gentleman's agreement not to top, or "jump" in Wall Street parlance, signed merger deals. But real-estate firms aren't party to that understanding.

The interest comes at a time when the debt markets are happy to throw money at mega deals. Borrowers have been able to attract capital at cheap rates, and what they can borrow as a percentage of the total value of assets is also high. Moreover, any buyer would likely split off some of the trophy assets to help pay for the deal -- part of Blackstone's plan.

One major impediment to a rival bid are the matching rights enjoyed by Blackstone that allow the firm to match any price offered by a rival. A rival would also be under time pressure, given that the Blackstone deal is expected to close within three weeks.

Measured by current rental income, Blackstone's offer for the country's largest office-building owner and manager is already richly valued at some $36 billion, a figure that includes $16 billion of debt. But by at least one other important measure -- the price needed to replace the buildings in Equity Office's portfolio -- the deal doesn't look impossible to top.

A spokeswoman for Equity Office declined to comment. A spokesman for Mr. Sternlicht declined to comment. Mr. Bluhm didn't return calls for comment. Mark Neporent, Cerberus's chief operating officer, said that the firm "had no intention of submitting a bid." But Cerberus would be willing to provide debt financing to bidders.

Samuel Zell, Equity Office's founder and chairman, said in a previous interview with the Journal that it agreed in its negotiations with Blackstone not to seek competing bids. But he said a process was in place for the board to consider unsolicited offers.

Until the past few days analysts were unsure whether any bidders would be willing to go above the $49.50 per share needed to top Blackstone's price and cover the termination fee. Blackstone's offer was an 8.5% premium to the price of EOP's closing price on the day prior to the merger announcement on Nov. 20. And Blackstone's price was a 7.2% premium over Equity Office's net asset value of $45.25 per share estimated by Green Street Advisors, a Newport Beach, Calif., research firm.

Equity Offices' proxy filed to the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 14 stated that Blackstone originally wanted a termination fee of $275 million, which was negotiated down to $200 million. Green Street Advisors described the termination fee as "modestly lower than we would have expected" and pointed out that in another recent deal involving another REIT, SL Green Realty Corp., the fee was about 3% of the initial value.

Cerberus May Bid For Equity Office REIT (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

Cerberus Capital Management is considering making an offer worth more than $38 billion for Equity Office Properties Trust, the real estate investment trust that is controlled by Samuel Zell, people involved in the discussions said last night.

If Cerberus bids for Equity Office, the nation's largest owner and manager of office buildings, it would seek to top a deal reached in November to sell the company to the Blackstone Group for $36 billion.

Last night, executives of Cerberus were preparing their bid, these people said. It remains possible, however, that Cerberus could decide against making an offer.

It is unclear whether Cerberus would bid in concert with other partners. In recent weeks, the firm has held talks with Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital, who created Starwood Hotels, people involved in those talks said.

Spokesmen for Cerberus and Mr. Sternlicht declined to comment.

A Cerberus offer could result in a bidding war for Equity Office, pitting two of the most powerful financial firms in the nation against each other for a deal that would be the largest leveraged buyout in history, surpassing the $33 billion that a consortium of private equity groups paid for the health care company HCA Inc. in August.

A bid by Cerberus would also be one of the first instances of a private equity firm's trying to top another firm's deal after an agreement had been struck.

When Blackstone reached its deal with Equity Office, the purchase price — $48.50 a share — was instantly derided by some shareholders as too low. James S. Corl, the chief investment officer for the real estate firm Cohen & Steers, the largest shareholder in Equity Office, criticized the deal publicly and suggested that another bidder should emerge.

Under the terms of Equity Office's agreement with Blackstone, Equity Office can continue to solicit offers from rival bidders. A shareholder vote on that deal is scheduled for Feb. 5. If Cerberus were to top Blackstone's offer, Blackstone would be entitled to a breakup fee of $200 million.

Speculation about a rival offer has been increasing in recent weeks. Yesterday, Jonathan Litt, an analyst at Citigroup, wrote in a note to investors that he expected a "topping bid" of $50 to $52 a share.

Shares of Equity Office closed at $48.75, above Blackstone's offer, in anticipation of a bid from Cerberus.

Kroes Threatens Antitrust Action To Break Up Power Groups (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Neelie Kroes warned yesterday that she could use her powers as European Union competition commissioner to break up the region's large, integrated energy groups, opening up a potential new front in the broader regulatory crackdown on groups such as Eon, RWE and GdF.

Ms Kroes is a long-standing critic of gas and electricity suppliers that also control crucial transmission infrastructure, such as pipelines. She argues that integrated groups have used their grip on the networks to freeze out new entrants and stifle competition.

"Ownership unbundling" - the break-up of integrated energy groups - through new legislation would take years, and is certain to face stiff opposition from some member states.

But Ms Kroes stressed that a break-up could be imposed on individual companies as part of an antitrust decision, for example as a punishment for violating EU competition rules. Asked whether forced unbundling was an option as part of an antitrust investigation, the commissioner replied: "Absolutely."

The news is of special concern for Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF of France, Eni of Italy and OMV of Austria, since they are the subject of a Commission antitrust probe. The groups' offices were raided in May, following suspicions they had excluded rivals from wholesale markets and infrastructure and of "possible collusion between incumbents in the form of market sharing", Ms Kroes said.

The Commission acquired the power to break up companies that violate competition rules only in 2004 but has so far never used it.

The latest warning by Ms Kroes came as she revealed the findings of a 16-month investigation into the EU markets for electricity and gas. As reported in the Financial Times last week, the report painted a bleak picture of competition in the sector and the poor level of market integration.

"[The report's] disappointing conclusion is that, more than a decade after having launched the drive for liberalisation, we are still far from having a single, competitive and well-functioning European energy market," Ms Kroes said. "As a result, Europe's consumers, businesses and the economy as a whole are still not benefiting from the full advantages that should flow from the opening up of European energy markets in terms of lower prices and better choice of services."

The Commission probe found that many of Europe's national energy markets continued to be dominated by former monopolies. Thanks to their entrenched positions at home, the former incumbents had little incentive to venture abroad or to invest in upgrading domestic infrastructure, since this would make it easier for rivals to enter the market.

"The report reveals that the energy prices for commercial users vary significantly from member state to member state. These differences are not eroded through import competition. One of the reasons is that incumbents stick to their home markets," Ms Kroes said yesterday.

The report also criticised the excessive length of many gas and power supply contracts, as well as the tight grip that some companies have on pipeline and interconnector capacity. These contracts, it argued, served to further reinforce the power of the dominant groups.

European Union Proposes Greater Competition In Energy (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, January 11, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 10 — European Union officials on Wednesday challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming.

The region needs a new "postindustrial revolution," said the European Commission's president, José Manuel Barroso, announcing a number of energy proposals. "We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future."

The package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies.

European Union officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit.

Many of the proposals, which also aim to encourage the use of renewable fuels for cars and to improve the energy efficiency of buildings and home appliances, are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals.

The plan, called an Energy Policy for Europe, sought to echo the postwar integration of important industrial sectors, namely coal and steel, that eventually grew into the union's single market. But it fell far short of proposing a unified power market, one that could be overseen by a single regulator, operate on a common grid and benefit from a common front in dealing with energy suppliers.

Christian Egenhofer, a senior research fellow at the Center for European Policy Studies in Brussels, said it would be unrealistic to unify energy policy in a trade bloc of 27 disparate countries, some rich, some much poorer. France, for instance, relies on nuclear power for 80 percent of its electricity, while others, like Poland, depend almost entirely on coal for electricity.

In another sign that the vision of transforming the way Europe consumes energy is meeting resistance, commission officials also backed away from earlier recommendations to require that emissions be cut to levels that environmental experts say are critical to keeping down rising temperatures.

Under pressure from industries like steel, where executives fear losing business if Europe adopts stricter regulations than the rest of the world, the union recommended cutting emissions by 20 percent from 1990 levels by 2020, rather than the 30 percent sought by its environment commissioner.

The commission pushed ahead with proposals to encourage the "capture," or trapping, and storage of carbon dioxide emissions, including possibly making it mandatory for all new coal-fired power stations after 2020 to incorporate the new, cleaner technologies.

The European Union also highlighted the benefits of nuclear energy as a way to curb carbon emissions. But widespread public skepticism about the safety and price of nuclear technology led the officials to back away from pushing member states to use nuclear power as a primary tool against climate change.

The commission also proposed measures that aim to reduce power consumption by about 20 percent by 2020 as another means of reducing emissions. Union officials said those measures, including better constructed homes and offices, could save consumers $130 billion each year in fuel bills — or from $260 to $1,300 for each household.

EU Seeks Breakup Of Utilities To Boost Competition (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman And Jonathan Stearns

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators called for a breakup of energy companies to boost competition in the electricity and natural-gas markets.

The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, wants to open competition to new entrants. Most incumbent energy companies own both production businesses and the units managing the pipes and power lines. The EU regulator wants separate owners for those businesses, a practice known as unbundling. The recommendations, to be discussed by EU leaders in March, are already meeting resistance from France and Germany.

``We make it clear that our preference is unequivocally in favor of ownership unbundling," European Commission President Jose Barroso told journalists in Brussels today.

As part of the investigation into the region's 250 billion- euro ($325 billion) power and gas industry, the EU also probed utilities including E.ON AG, Gaz de France SA and Eni SpA for possible antitrust violations. The commission said energy companies may be illegally colluding to keep out rivals, calling the practice ``one of the most serious threats to competition."

Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes has threatened to fine energy companies as much as 10 percent of annual sales for failing to open their networks to competitors. Kroes also said she may break up companies if she finds they have illegally restricted competition.

Persistence

``This is a pretty unprecedented set of announcements," said Matthew Levitt, a competition lawyer at Lovells in Brussels. ``The most effective way to get an efficient energy market is through competition and regulatory powers. I don't see the commission giving up on this."

Europe's gas and electricity markets are inefficient, overly concentrated and suffer from a lack of investment, the commission said in a report released today that concluded a 19- month review of the industry.

``The EU's energy blueprint is a very major and welcome step forward," Sam Laidlaw, chief executive of Centrica, the U.K.'s biggest energy supplier, said in a statement.

German utilities E.ON and RWE AG oppose the proposed split. ``A division of network and generation businesses wouldn't be an improvement, but rather would represent expropriation from our shareholders," E.ON spokesman Josef Nelles said. RWE spokeswoman Julia Scharlemann said the company already gives ``non-discriminatory access to all power plants."

French, Italian Reaction

Electricite de France SA, Europe's biggest power generator and owner of the Reseau de Transport d'Electricite grid, said the current system already gives fair access to other power suppliers. Gaz de France declined to comment.

``We are far from where we want to be," Kroes said, referring to the aim of creating a single European energy market.

Eni said it was one of Europe's first companies to engage in ``pro-competitive" measures by separating managerial and shareholder structures of Snam Rete Gas SpA, which owns and runs Italy's gas grid and is 50 percent-controlled by Eni.

Fulvio Conti, chief executive officer of Enel SpA, Italy's largest utility, said his company favored competition by selling generation assets with the former monopoly now producing less than one-third of the country's electricity needs.

Away From Russia

The EU's ideas, included in an energy and environmental policy review, address mounting challenges facing the 27-nation bloc. The region wants to diversify its gas and oil imports away from Russia and the Middle East and cut emissions of heat-trapping gases that are blamed for climate change.

The commission also proposed lowering emissions by at least 20 percent by 2020 compared with 1990. That's less than the 30 percent cut the bloc would agree to if there's an accord among all developed nations, it said.

The EU wants to make it more costly for the energy industry to emit greenhouse gases while limiting price rises for consumers.

Existing EU legislation requires energy providers such as E.ON to have a legal separation between production and transmission businesses. Legal unbundling involves an incumbent having separate accounting and management of its transmission and production units.

Kroes said this approach doesn't go far enough because incumbents continue to favor their own distribution companies at the expense of new entrants.

Alternative Option

The commission's preferred option is to break open the market through ownership unbundling. That would involve legislation to force former monopolies to split their production and transmission businesses.

The commission also outlined an alternative approach that doesn't go as far. It would allow companies to remain the owner of their transmission and production businesses and to receive a regulated return on them, while no longer being responsible for the units' operation, maintenance or development.

The commission said it prefers ownership unbundling because ``this would create a level playing field and it would change the incentive structure in the right direction."

The commission has already applied those practices in two antitrust reviews.

Kroes approved a proposed merger between Suez SA and Gaz de France in November 2006 after the companies agreed to give up control of Belgian grid operator Fluxys NV and divest gas distributor Distrigaz SA. She also forced E.ON to release ``significant volumes" of natural gas on the market as part of her December 2005 approval of the German company's 2 billion-euro purchase of Hungary's Mol Rt.

Today's ideas will be the basis for future legislative proposals following consultation with EU leaders.

French Industry Minister Francois Loos opposes the proposal, telling lawmakers in Paris today ``our system works and the proof of that is that other producers other than EDF tell us that it is working to their satisfaction." German Economy Minister Michael Glos told reporters in Berlin that splitting energy production and transmission would be ``rather difficult."

Cisco Sues Apple Over Use Of IPhone Name (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Cisco Systems sued Apple Inc. in federal court Wednesday, saying the computer maker's new iPhone violates its trademark.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, came just a day after Apple CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the Apple iPhone in dramatic fashion at a trade show in San Francisco.

But even while Jobs was trumpeting the product, the matter of the product's naming had not been resolved behind the scenes between two of Silicon Valley's biggest names.

San Jose-based Cisco, the world's largest network-equipment maker, has owned the trademark on the name "iPhone" since 2000, when it acquired InfoGear Technology Corp., which originally registered the name.

Three weeks ago, Cisco's Linksys division put the trademark to use, releasing an Internet phone called "iPhone" that uses the increasingly popular Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP.

But on Tuesday, Jobs unveiled Apple's own iPhone, a "game-changing" touch-screen-controlled cell phone device that plays music, surfs the Web and delivers voicemail and e-mail.

Apple spokeswoman Natalie Kerris said she could not immediately comment on the lawsuit.

Cisco said Tuesday it had been negotiating for several years with Apple over a licensing agreement, but Apple lawyers had not signed and returned the final contract.

"Cisco entered into negotiations with Apple in good faith after Apple repeatedly asked permission to use Cisco's iPhone name," said Mark Chandler, Cisco senior vice president and general counsel, in a statement. "There is no doubt that Apple's new phone is very exciting, but they should not be using our trademark without our permission."

Cisco is seeking injunctive relief to prevent Apple from copying Cisco's iPhone trademark.

"Today's iPhone is not tomorrow's iPhone. The potential for convergence of the home phone, cell phone, work phone and PC is limitless, which is why it is so important for us to protect our brand," Chandler added.

Cisco Sues Apple Over IPhone Trademark (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, January 11, 2007

When Apple (AAPL) CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the much-hyped iPhone this week, he left one detail hanging: the rights to the iPhone name.

Network equipment giant Cisco Systems (CSCO) owns the trademark. Wednesday, Cisco sued Apple in U.S. District Court, asking for an injunction against its Silicon Valley neighbor.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling calls the lawsuit "silly." He says several companies use the iPhone name for products, though he could not provide examples. Cisco's claims "are tenuous," he says.

NEW PRODUCT UNVEILED: Apple wants to rock your phone | iPhone packed with goodies

Apple has made inquiries about the iPhone name for several years, says Cisco general counsel Mark Chandler. Talks picked up in recent weeks and seemed to be going well, Chandler said Wednesday. But Apple stopped communicating with Cisco at about 9 p.m. PT Monday, he said.

Jobs launched the iPhone — which combines a mobile phone, widescreen iPod and Internet capabilities — with much fanfare Tuesday morning.

Financial terms were not an issue, Chandler said. Cisco primarily wanted two things: clarity over who would use the iPhone name and interoperability between Apple's iPhone and other companies' products, he says. He would not provide specifics.

Cisco is a big advocate of standards that allow different devices to work together. That's because the company makes the networking gear that helps connect them.

In contrast, Apple leans toward products that work best with other Apple products, says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. Apple is afraid that if it makes its products more open, "Somebody can steal their stuff," he says.

Apple's shares, which have been rising lately, jumped 5% to a record $97 during regular trading before the lawsuit was announced.

The iPhone name was first trademarked in 1996 by InfoGear, a maker of Internet appliances. Cisco acquired InfoGear, and the trademark, in 2000.

Cisco sells iPhones designed to place calls over an Internet connection, not a cellphone network, so they do not compete directly with Apple's iPhone. Cisco launched new iPhones in December.

But the name iPhone "has been associated with Apple and the concept of a phone for a couple of years," says Charles Golvin, a tech analyst at Forrester Research. Apple has a line of products with "i" in the name, including the iBook laptop and iPod digital music player.

An Apple claim to the name probably would not stand up in court, Enderle says. After all, Compaq Computer and its successor, Hewlett-Packard, have sold a line of iPaq personal digital assistants and cellphones for years.

Apple has more to lose than Cisco does, Golvin says. The market for Internet phones is much smaller than that for music cellphones, he says, and Cisco doesn't have that much invested in its iPhone brand.

Apple is notorious for vigorously defending its own trademarks. It has sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms that use "pod" in product names.

Former Official Is Said To Be A Focus Of Lobbyist Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The former No. 2 official in the Interior Department has been notified by federal prosecutors that he will most likely be indicted for lying about his relationship with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, people with knowledge of the investigation said Wednesday.

A lawyer for the former official, J. Steven Griles, said Mr. Griles was recently told by the Justice Department that he was a target of the investigation as a result of his testimony about Mr. Abramoff to a Senate committee in 2005.

“We are shocked and disappointed at this turn of events,” the lawyer, Barry M. Hartman, said in a statement. “No one has suggested that Mr. Griles ever took anything of value from Mr. Abramoff or any other lobbyist, and he never did.”

Mr. Abramoff, once one of the most powerful Republican lobbyists in Washington, entered prison last year after pleading guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials.

In his November 2005 testimony to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, Mr. Griles insisted he had done no special favors for Mr. Abramoff while he was deputy secretary of the interior in President Bush's first term. But Mr. Griles acknowledged that he had been approached about leaving the department to join Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm. Mr. Griles did not take that job, and now works elsewhere as a corporate lobbyist.

Mr. Abramoff's internal e-mail messages show that he referred to Mr. Griles as "our guy" at the Interior Department, and repeatedly sought to bring pressure on Mr. Griles to do favors for Mr. Abramoff's Indian tribe clients. In a report last year, the Indian Affairs Committee said it could not "definitively conclude what, if anything, Griles did to assist Mr. Abramoff's clients."

Two Bush administration officials who have been briefed on the case said the investigation of Mr. Griles and Mr. Abramoff had also brought scrutiny to a senior Justice Department official, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general. She submitted a letter of resignation on Monday and is expected to depart this month.

Ms. Wooldridge, who leads the department's environment and natural resources division and serves as the Bush administration's chief prosecutor on environmental issues, joined the Justice Department from the Interior Department, where she had been a top aide to former Interior Secretary Gale Norton and was close to Mr. Griles.

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, declined to comment when asked if Ms. Wooldridge's departure was related to the Abramoff investigation.

Others, including the two Bush administration officials, said that while Ms. Wooldridge's ties to Mr. Griles were of interest to the Justice Department, they did not believe she was under active investigation by the grand jury. Ms. Magnuson said that in her resignation letter, Ms. Wooldridge "basically expressed that after six years of federal service, she wants to return to the private sector."

In confirming an article in The Washington Post on Wednesday reporting that Mr. Griles had been told he was being investigated by the grand jury, Mr. Hartman said his client had given the Senate committee his best recollection of his communications with Mr. Abramoff. "Mr. Griles told the committee that he knew Mr. Abramoff, just like he knew many other lobbyists, and in his view, Mr. Abramoff had no special access or relationship to him," Mr. Hartman said.

Mr. Griles "takes this matter very seriously," Mr. Hartman said, "and is optimistic that this will be resolved in an appropriate matter, based on the facts, and that neither political pressure nor news reports will undermine this hope."

There has been no suggestion from Congressional or Justice Department investigators that Ms. Norton, who resigned last year as interior secretary, has come under scrutiny in the Abramoff investigation.

Mr. Abramoff's e-mail shows he made many of his approaches to Mr. Griles through a small advocacy group, the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, and its director, Italia Federici, who has also come under investigation by the Justice Department.

Mr. Griles would be the second former Interior Department official to face charges in the Abramoff investigation. Roger G. Stillwell, who had worked in the department's insular affairs office, pleaded guilty last year to accepting sporting and concert tickets from Mr. Abramoff, whose lobbying clients often sought help from Mr. Stillwell's office.

Energy Lobbyist A Target In Ethics Probe (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Interior Department's former No. 2 official has been told by federal investigators that he is a target in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

J. Steven Griles, former deputy interior secretary during President Bush's first term, was notified by letter and told of possible charges at a meeting last week with Justice Department prosecutors, people familiar with the probe said Wednesday, speaking on condition of anonymity because the inquiry continues.

Griles told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 that Abramoff had no special access to him. Griles' attorney, Barry Hartman, has said that committee's report last September found no evidence that Griles acted improperly. Hartman did not immediately return phone calls for comment Wednesday.

Griles has since resumed his work as an energy lobbyist, which he did before joining Interior. It's those ties that were the subject of a host of internal probes while he was at the department.

Also being investigated in relation to the grand jury probe is Sue Ellen Wooldridge, the assistant attorney general who oversees the Justice Department's environment and natural resources division, one person familiar with the investigation said.

Wooldridge sent in a resignation letter on Monday, saying she wanted to return to the private sector, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said Wednesday. Wooldridge was not commenting publicly.

Before joining the Justice Department in November 2005, she was the Interior Department solicitor and was deputy chief of staff to Interior Secretary Gale Norton while Griles was at Interior.

The Abramoff grand jury has heard from several Interior officials, past and present, in recent days. Roger Stillwell, a former Interior employee who provided Abramoff with information from the department, was sentenced to two years probation and fined $1,000 on Tuesday for failing to report gifts football and concert tickets from Abramoff.

Abramoff is serving about six years in prison for a fraudulent Florida casino business deal and awaits sentencing in a Washington bribery scandal. The Abramoff investigation ensnared its first congressman this fall when former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, admitted accepting gifts in exchange for government action. Several Capitol Hill staffers and a former Bush administration official also have pleaded guilty or been convicted in the case.

Prosecutors are investigating Griles now for possible criminal charges that include lying to Congress and honest service fraud. The latter is a 1988 law saying citizens are guaranteed a right to the "honest services" of public officials.

The charges involve questions about whether Griles falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire Griles away from Interior.

The Senate committee's investigation and e-mails detailed numerous contacts with Abramoff and Italia Federici, who was a go-between for Abramoff. Federici headed the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, which she co-founded with Norton.

Federal investigators have been looking at the hundreds of thousands of dollars the group received in donations from Abramoff's Indian tribal clients and from energy and mining companies, including some that were Griles' ex-clients.

Chamber Of Commerce Blames China For U.S. Pollution Woes (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

When all else fails, blame China.

That's the novel tack the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is taking in its latest attempt to relieve states and businesses of Clean Air Act burdens.

The lobby group is petitioning the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to make it easier for states, counties and cities to discount dust and smog that drifts across their borders from places as far-flung as China and Africa from their pollution levels in order to remain compliant with federal air-quality standards.

It is well-documented that large plumes of particles and pollutants blow across the ocean. And the Clean Air Act clearly allows for their subtraction when they arrive from such foreign sources.

But the Chamber asserts that EPA guidance on the issue is so "limited, deficient and complex" that states are at a loss as to how to get the relief, and so are failing to attract cement, steel and power companies that could create jobs.

"When an area is in non-attainment [of the Clean Air Act], no manufacturer in the U.S. will work there and companies already there leave the state: They go to China," William Kovacs, who heads up environmental lobbying for the Chamber, said.

To date, no state or region has appealed successfully to the EPA to discount the foreign-born pollution, though the agency temporarily waived its standards in the wake of 1998 Mexican forest fires that caused soot levels to spike in New Mexico and Texas.

The Chamber argues that a clear mechanism for presenting evidence to obtain relief is urgent in light of the EPA's new stricter standards for particulate matter. The agency tightened the standards in November, throwing 100 additional counties into non-attainment such that most of the West Coast is now in violation of the Clean Air Act.

Last month the lobby group sent its petition for a rulemaking on the matter straight to the top of the agency, EPA administrator Stephen Johnson.

Environmental groups are chalking up the move as an artful effort by the business group to help its members evade pollution standards by pointing the finger elsewhere.

"This boils down for me to a pretty patent attempt by the Chamber to shift responsibility for clearing up air pollution from its members to sources offshore," said the director of the Clean Air Program at the Natural Resources Defense Council, John Walke.

He insisted that most of the areas in non-attainment would fail to meet the federal standards regardless of the foreign-born pollution within their borders, an assertion that the Chamber disputes.

Smog and dust can be fingerprinted and, by the EPA's own estimate, on certain days nearly a quarter of the particles floating above Los Angeles can be traced to China.

At a hearing before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works in July, the commissioner of Georgia's Walker County, Bebe Heiskell, testified that her region's non-attainment status was "almost exclusively due to outside influences," including dust and other particles blown from Alaska, Canada and Africa.

"To be forced into perpetual non-attainment will have a devastating impact on not only our economy, but on the lives of our citizens," she said.

If the EPA finds the Chamber's petition sound, it would open up a period of public comment that would doubtless become an arena for the business and green lobbies to do battle over the issue.

But Kovacs does not have high hopes for a favorable response from the EPA, citing the agency's failure to address the issue on numerous occasions. Instead, the Chamber may have to take it to the courts.

"It's very likely we could sue," he said.

Let There Be 'Blight' (WSJ)

By William R. Maurer

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

SEATTLE -- The city of Burien, Wash., recently decided that a piece of property owned by the seven Strobel sisters that had long housed a popular diner-style restaurant was not upscale enough for the city's ambitious "Town Square" development, which will feature condos, shops, restaurants and offices. Rather than condemn the property for a private developer and risk a lawsuit, Burien came up with a plan -- it would put a road through the property, and the city manager told his staff to "make damn sure" it did. When a subsequent survey revealed that the road would not affect the building itself, but only sideswipe a small corner of the property, the staff developed yet another site plan that put the road directly through the building. A trial court concluded that the city's actions might be "oppressive" and "an abuse of power" -- but allowed the condemnation anyway. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, and the Washington Supreme Court refused to hear the case.

Welcome to the post-Kelo world. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2005 decision made clear that the federal courts would not stop local governments across the country from condemning private property for economic development. While the court noted that states were free to provide greater protections for homes and small businesses if they chose, Washington state stands as evidence that a strong state constitution means little if the courts do not enforce it and local governments disregard it.

When Kelo came out, local governments and their lobbyists eagerly explained that ours was not a "Kelo state," and that the legislative efforts to restrict eminent-domain abuse in other states were unnecessary here. The Washington Constitution explicitly provides that "Private property shall not be taken for private use" (except in very limited circumstances). "It can't happen here" became the oft-repeated message used to placate home and small business owners seeking legislative protections for their property.

When it comes to governmental abuse, "it can't happen here" really means "it is happening right now." Local governments are busily using mechanisms in state law to threaten neighborhoods and abuse property owners, and the state Supreme Court has repeatedly let them get away with it.

Shortly after Kelo, the Washington Supreme Court allowed the Seattle Monorail to permanently condemn a piece of property it needed only temporarily for a construction staging area. Once the monorail had completed that legitimate public use, it intended to sell the property at a premium to raise revenue. In this way, Washington courts now allow local governments to condemn more land than is necessary, for longer than is necessary, in the hopes that the government can play real-estate speculator with whatever is left.

The court also ruled that the meetings at which a local government determines which property to condemn could take place essentially in secret, with the only notice for property owners being a posting on an obscure government Web site. The court ignored the fact that computer usage among minorities, the elderly and the poor is significantly lower than in other segments of the population, and that it is these communities that traditionally have been the target of eminent-domain abuse.

Washington courts now defer to even the most extreme examples of governmental exploitation, exemplified by Burien's treatment of the Strobel sisters. So long as the government can manufacture a fig leaf of public use or possible public use for constitutional cover, local governments can take private property to transfer to other private entities or deliberately target properties not upscale enough for the bureaucrats' "vision."

The tools available for trampling constitutional rights are already there. Since the Kelo decision, municipalities have rediscovered Washington's Community Renewal Act, the local incarnation of statutes used to destroy working-class (and often minority) neighborhoods across the country in the 1950s and '60s. The government, under the act, can condemn an entire neighborhood and transfer the property to a private developer so long as the government finds that at least some property in the neighborhood is "blighted." Unfortunately, this statute is so broadly worded that practically every neighborhood in Washington meets the definition of "blight" -- things like "obsolete platting" and "diversity of ownership" constitute "blight." The statute provides all the devices a mildly clever planner needs to pull off a Kelo-style taking.

Working-class neighborhoods are already feeling the pressure. Auburn recently declared much of its beautiful downtown "blighted," and adopted a Community Renewal Plan. One city manager explained that blight "means anything that impairs or arrests sound growth" -- a hugely elastic definition. Similarly, Seattle is considering using the Community Renewal Act in the city's Rainier Valley, one of the most diverse neighborhoods in the nation.

Regardless of strong constitutional protections for private property, governments and courts now view eminent domain as an area where few if any restrictions exist. And not just in Washington. In probably the most appalling example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit let stand a condemnation in which a developer in the Port Chester, N.Y., demanded that Bart Didden give him either $800,000 or a 50% share in Mr. Didden's property, which was slated to be a CVS pharmacy -- or the developer would have the village condemn it. Mr. Didden refused; the next day, the village condemned his property to hand it over to the developer to construct a Walgreens. Tomorrow, the U.S. Supreme Court will consider whether to take the case.

Meanwhile, state and federal courts are turning redevelopment areas into Constitution-free zones, where the government can do what it wants with few or no restrictions. It doesn't have to be this way. Courts could force the government to comply with the state and federal constitutions. Local governments could limit their takings only to legitimate public uses. But until all three branches of government begin taking their constitutional obligations seriously, property owners across the country face the continued threat of eminent-domain abuse, regardless of what the state or federal constitution says.

Ask the Strobel sisters, who are now fighting for just compensation for a property that was never for sale in the first place.

Mr. Maurer is executive director of the Institute for Justice, Washington chapter, and the author of "A False Sense of Security: The Potential for Eminent-Domain Abuse in Washington," recently published by the Washington Policy Center. The Institute litigated the Kelo case and represents Bart Didden in his appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Exxon Softens Climate-Change Stance (WSJ)

Hoping to Shape Policy, Oil Giant Joins Dialogue On Curbing of Emissions

In one of the strongest signs yet that U.S. industry anticipates government curbs on global-warming emissions, Exxon Mobil Corp., long a leading opponent of such rules, is starting to talk about how it would like them to be structured.

Exxon, the world's largest publicly traded oil company by market value, long has been a lightning rod in the global-warming debate. Its top executives have openly questioned the scientific validity of claims that fossil-fuel emissions are warming the planet, and it has funded outside groups that have challenged such claims in language sometimes stronger than the company itself has used. Those actions have prompted criticism of the company by environmentalists and by Democrats in the U.S., who now control the Congress.

• The Situation: Exxon Mobil has stopped funding some groups that challenge global-warming fears and is discussing what a U.S. emissions policy might look like.

• The Background: The company has been a vocal challenger of global-warming science and a lightning rod for environmentalists.

• The Bottom Line: The shift shows U.S. industry is beginning to conclude that government emissions limits are coming.

Now, Exxon has cut off funding to a handful of those outside groups. It says climate-science models that link greenhouse-gas concentrations to global warming are getting more reliable. And it is meeting in Washington with officials of other large corporations to discuss what form the companies would prefer a possible U.S. carbon regulation to take.

Words Are Nuanced

The changes in Exxon's words and actions are nuanced. The oil giant continues to note uncertainties in climate science. It continues to oppose the Kyoto Protocol, the international global-warming treaty that limits emissions from industrialized countries that have ratified it. It also stresses that any future carbon policy should include developing countries, where emissions are rising fastest. (See related article1.)

Still, the company's subtle softening is significant and reflects a gathering trend among much of U.S. industry, from utilities to auto makers. While many continue to oppose caps, these companies expect the country will impose mandatory global-warming-emission constraints at some point, so they are lining up to try to shape any mandate so they escape with minimum economic pain.

Exxon has stopped funding the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a Washington-based think tank that last year ran television ads saying that carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas, is helpful. After funding them previously, Exxon decided in late 2005 not to fund for 2006 CEI and "five or six" other groups active in the global-warming debate, Kenneth Cohen, Exxon's vice president for public affairs, confirmed this week in an interview at Exxon's headquarters in Irving, Texas. He declined to identify the groups beyond CEI; their names are expected to become public in the spring, when Exxon releases its annual list of donations to nonprofit groups.

Myron Ebell, director of CEI's energy and global-warming program, declined to comment about why Exxon didn't fund CEI last year. But he added: "Like any company, they are concerned about both policies and image.

"We're not at the mercy of our funders for what we believe. But we are dependent on them for funding to help promote our programs," he said. "Obviously, we would like to find a lot more funding on energy and global warming than we've had."

More significant are the meetings between executives from Exxon and other companies to discuss the potential structure of a U.S. carbon regulation. Several parallel tracks of discussions are under way, some sponsored by Washington think tanks, including the Brookings Institution and Resources for the Future.

The meetings underscore the view within much of U.S. industry that the science and the politics of global warming are changing. "The issue has evolved," Mr. Cohen said.

Exxon says important questions remain about the degree to which fossil-fuel emissions are contributing to global warming. But "the modeling has gotten better" analyzing the probabilities of how rising greenhouse-gas emissions will affect global temperatures, Mr. Cohen said. Exxon continues to stress the modeling is imperfect; it is "helpful to an analysis, but it's not a predictor," he said. But he added, "we know enough now -- or, society knows enough now -- that the risk is serious and action should be taken."

DOJ_NMG_0115278

The question is what kind of action. The economic reality is that some companies will win from a carbon constraint and some companies will lose, depending on how the regulation is written.

Question of a Cap

One question is whether a carbon tax or cap should be imposed upstream -- on producers of fossil fuels -- or downstream, on the industries, and perhaps even the individual consumers, who use those fuels. Another question is whether such a constraint should target just a few industries or should be applied across the economy.

Such questions already are sparking fierce lobbying fights among industries in Europe. There, countries have slapped carbon caps on several heavily emitting industries. Now the countries are toughening those constraints.

A similar zero-sum fight appears increasingly likely in the U.S. California adopted a broad global-warming cap last year, and now it has to decide which companies, and perhaps which consumers, to stick with the responsibility for meeting the targets. Other states say they plan to follow California's lead.

In Washington, meanwhile, Democratic congressional leaders say they will push for some sort of federal carbon constraint.

"By all indications, we'll certainly see much more legislative activity at the state and federal level going forward," Exxon's Mr. Cohen said. Among the broad options being debated, he said, "some look more favorable to us than others."

Exxon wants any regulation to be applied across "the broadest possible base" of the economy, said Jaime Spellings, Exxon's general manager for corporate planning. Exxon says avoiding a ton of carbon-dioxide emissions is, with certain exceptions, less expensive in the power industry than in the transportation sector. Though solar energy remains expensive, reducing a ton of emissions by generating electricity from essentially carbon-free sources such as nuclear or wind energy is cheaper than reducing a ton of emissions through low-carbon transportation fuels such as ethanol.

Exxon, like the U.S. government, also argues that any regulation should take into account rising emissions from developing countries, too. Both Exxon and the federal government oppose the Kyoto Protocol.

The fact that Exxon officials are beginning to lay out even these generalities is significant, said Philip Sharp, president of Resources for the Future. "They are taking this debate very seriously," said Mr. Sharp, a former Democratic congressman long active in energy-policy debates. "My personal opinion of them has changed by watching them operate."

AG Urges Patience In Mexico Drug War (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo, Express-News Border Bureau

San Antonio (TX) Express-News, January 11, 2007

LAREDO — Despite the Mexican government's inability to crack down on drug cartels responsible for thousands of deaths and kidnappings — some Americans included among the victims — the U.S. government is reserving judgment, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday during a border tour here.

Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, who already has sent troops to aid in the drug war, needs time to show his country's commitment, Gonzales said in brief remarks to reporters at the World Trade Bridge.

Gonzales met with local, state and federal law enforcement officials, some who brought up the issue of trustworthiness of their Mexican counterparts, said Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, who participated in the briefing via phone.

More than 170 homicides were reported in Nuevo Laredo in 2006, but only a handful of arrests were made, much to the frustration of local U.S. agencies whose own investigations into crimes on this side of the border often lead them to the cartels operating in Mexico.

"Let's give them the benefit of the doubt," Gonzales said of his confidence in Mexico's cooperation. "Let's just wait and see how it goes."

Gonzales also announced $300,000 in additional funds to federal crime-fighting units in Laredo and McAllen. The so-called Strike Force brings federal and state officers together to share information.

The goal is to target "not just the cartels themselves, but the transporters, money launders and smugglers," Gonzales said.

Though the grant isn't a huge amount, Laredo Port Director Gene Garza of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, called the $300,000 a "first step and definitely an important step."

Cuellar, who had invited Gonzales to tour Laredo, said, "Do we need to do more? Yes, and that's where the U.S. Congress needs to play a role."

Gonzales, who was born in San Antonio, also responded to media reports that Middle Eastern terrorists were training to cross the southern border illegally into the United States. The possibility of terrorists sneaking through the Mexican border is a concern, but there's no specific or credible intelligence to say it is happening, he said.

The attorney general flew to Mexico City after his border tour to meet with officials there.

A local group of advocates for Americans kidnapped in Mexico, Laredo's Missing, held posters of their loved ones as his motorcade drove by.

Families of the kidnap victims were upset that the nation's top law official didn't meet with them.

"It was a spit in the face that he would come down to Laredo and not even talk to the victims who can really express the need for action," said William Slemaker, whose stepdaughter Yvette Martinez has been missing since 2004.

Twenty-seven Americans kidnapped in Nuevo Laredo are unaccounted for, Slemaker said, expressing his own frustration with Mexican authorities.

Not a single arrest has been made in any of the cases, he said, asking: "How much time should we give them?" mcastillo@express-news.net

Valley Gets Grant To Battle Crime (KRGV)

KRGV-TV, January 10, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announces federal money to help battle border crime.

Laredo-A large federal grant is headed to the valley to help fight border crime. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez spent Wednesday in Laredo to tour the border, and announce a $300,000 grant to create a strike force. The strike force will be made of members from the DEA, FBI, ICE, ATF, IRS and Texas Department of Public Safety. The agencies will work together to fight border crime more efficiently, as well as working to secure our border against the threat of terrorists sneaking into the country. Gonzalez's visit comes one month after South Texas congressman Henry Cuellar wrote him a letter asking for help to battle the increase in border crime.

Chronicle Calls Federal Case Against BALCO Reporters Flawed (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 11, 2007

(01-10) 13:49 PST SAN FRANCISCO -- The Chronicle told a federal appeals court today that contempt-of-court orders against two reporters for refusing to disclose sources of leaked testimony about athletes and steroids were based on a false premise -- that the leak was a serious crime requiring a grand jury investigation.

In a final round of written arguments to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals challenging prison sentences for the reporters and fines for the newspaper, lawyers for the parent Hearst Corp. disputed prosecutors' position that journalists never have the right to withhold evidence from a grand jury investigating a crime.

A 1972 Supreme Court ruling upholding contempt orders against reporters for refusing to disclose their sources to grand juries involved serious crimes, such as drug trafficking and plots of violence, that can be prosecuted only by grand jury indictments under the Constitution, said Jonathan Donnellan, a Hearst attorney.

By contrast, he said, the current case involves a violation of a secrecy order by U.S. District Judge Susan Illston that she could have investigated herself or referred to a special prosecutor.

Either of those options would have allowed the reporters to claim the right to protect their sources, Donnellan said, and that right shouldn't be diminished by Illston's decision to refer the leak to the Justice Department, which chose to convene a grand jury.

"First Amendment rights cannot rise or fall on the District Court's discretionary choice as to where to steer an investigation," the lawyer wrote. "In cases involving violation of a protective order, at least, a rigid distinction between grand jury and other matters cannot stand."

The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on appeals by The Chronicle and reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who were held in contempt last September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify or provide documents to a grand jury investigating the leaked transcripts.

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison, and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but suspended those penalties until the appeals court rules in the case.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 quoting closed-door testimony by Barry Bonds of the Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes about their use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

Five defendants, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. A separate grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied by denying he knowingly used steroids.

After the August 2004 article on Montgomery's testimony, Illston, who had ordered all participants in the case to keep the transcripts confidential, told the Justice Department to investigate the leak. The department empaneled a grand jury, which issued subpoenas to the reporters and The Chronicle last May.

In upholding the subpoenas, White said the 1972 Supreme Court ruling established that journalists have no special right to withhold evidence from a grand jury. He said exceptions carved out by some post-1972 rulings -- requiring those who seek reporters' testimony to show that it is essential and unavailable elsewhere -- have not involved grand jury investigations.

Lawyers for the newspaper and the reporters contend a 1996 Supreme Court ruling, allowing psychotherapists to withhold their patients' confidential statements from grand juries, requires federal judges to recognize similar rights for journalists, along the lines of shield laws enacted by California and most other states.

Reporters should be allowed to protect their sources, the attorneys argue, if the value of the news coverage outweighs any harm caused by the disclosure.

43 Alleged Gang Members Indicted In Cleveland (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

CLEVELAND (AP) — Forty-three people accused of being gang members who sold cocaine and terrorized a Cleveland neighborhood have been indicted in an 18-month investigation, the top federal prosecutor in northern Ohio said Wednesday.

The indictment of those who investigators say are involved with the "7-Alls" gang was announced by U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White and officials from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the city of Cleveland.

Officers seized drugs, weapons and $151,000 in the investigation, White said.

The charges include selling cocaine, conspiracy to sell cocaine and weapons counts. The indictments named as coconspirators two men apparently shot and killed by rival gangs during the investigation, White said.

The "7-Alls" name derived from the gang's involvement in violent crimes in 70's-numbered streets east of downtown Cleveland, officials said.

Last year U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced $15 million in federal grants to six areas, including Cleveland, to fight street gang violence. Grants also went to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Milwaukee; Dallas-Fort Worth and the Easton-Lancaster, Pa., corridor.

Feds Indict Thirteen Hispanic Gang Members On Racketeering Charges (TENN)

By Kate Howard, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, January 11, 2007

Thirteen members of the MS-13 street gang have been indicted by a federal grand jury on corruption and racketeering charges, local and federal officials announced today.

DOJ_NMG_0115281

Members of the international gang were charged for corruption and homicide under the RICO act created to fight organized crime, the most severe possible indictment, U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said at a press conference held at the federal courthouse this afternoon.

The suspects are responsible for three homicides and several shootings or assaults in the Nashville area just in the last year and have been collecting dues to send to members in jail, according to the indictment.

All but one of the 13 suspects were already in federal or state custody when the indictments were handed down, Morford said, and the last suspect has since been arrested.

The investigation by Metro police and several federal agencies showed that MS-13 is highly organized and violent for the sake of harming rival gang members, Morford said.

“Unlike a lot of other gangs here, this is not a drug-based gang,” Morford said. “This is a violence-based gang.”

Several Nashville-area MS-13 members have been deported for immigration violations, and the suspects in this case are a mix of legal and illegal residents, Morford said.

Officials said they expect to bring more charges.

Metro Police Chief Ronal Serpas said the charges reinforce the need for members of the Hispanic community to report crimes to the police. The gang members preyed upon members of their own communities, Serpas said.

"This sends a clear and concise message that if you are a victim of crime, the police department is here to help you," Serpas said.

18 Arrested In Hoover For Drug, Immigration Violations (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

HOOVER, Ala. - A joint force of law enforcement officials took 18 people suspected of either drug trafficking or entering the country illegally into custody today in Hoover, said a Drug Enforcement Administration official.

Harold Willis, resident agent in charge of the D-E-A office in Birmingham said 40 or 50 federal, state and local law enforcement officers wearing bulletproof vests were involved in the operation.

The arrests took place in the parking lot of a Lowe's Home Improvement store and stemmed from an investigation that began several months ago, The Birmingham News reported on its Web site today.

Willis said the DEA led the investigation because some of the men were suspected of drug trafficking. Others agencies involved included the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Alabama Bureau of Investigation, several sheriffs departments and city police departments.

Willis said it was not certain whether all the men entered the country illegally. But all have been taken to a federal holding facility in the Etowah County Jail.

Paper: Bonds Blamed Failed Amphetamines Test On Teammate (AP)

AP, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK -- Barry Bonds failed a test for amphetamines last season and originally blamed it on a teammate, the Daily News reported Thursday.

When first informed of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from teammate Mark Sweeney's locker, the New York City newspaper said, citing several unnamed sources.

"I have no comment on that," Bonds' agent Jeff Borris told the Daily News on Wednesday night.

"Mark was made aware of the fact that his name had been brought up," Sweeney's agent Barry Axelrod told the Daily News. "But he did not give Barry Bonds anything, and there was nothing he could have given Barry Bonds."

Bonds, who always has maintained he never has tested positive for illegal drug use, already is under investigation for lying about steroid use.

A federal grand jury is investigating whether the 42-year-old Bonds perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case that he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs. The San Francisco Giants slugger told a 2003 federal grand jury that he believed his trainer Greg Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

Under baseball's amphetamines policy, which went into effect last season, players are not publicly identified for a first positive test. A second positive test for amphetamines results in a 25-game suspension. The first failed steroids test costs a player 50 games.

Bonds did not appeal the positive test, according to the Daily News, which made him subject to six drug tests by MLB over the next six months.

"We're not in a position to confirm or deny, obviously," MLB spokesman Rich Levin told the Daily News.

According to the newspaper, Sweeney learned of the Bonds' positive test from Gene Orza, chief operating officer of the Major League Baseball Players Association. Orza told Sweeney, the paper said, that he should remove any troublesome substances from his locker and should not share said substances. Sweeney said there was nothing of concern in his locker, according to the Daily News' sources.

An AP message for Sweeney was not immediately returned late Wednesday.

The Giants still are working to finalize complicated language in Bonds' $16 million, one-year contract for next season -- a process that has lasted almost a month since he agreed to the deal Dec. 7 on the last day of baseball's winter meetings.

The language still being negotiated concerns the left fielder's compliance with team rules, as well as what would happen if he were to be indicted or have other legal troubles.

Borris has declined to comment on the negotiations. He didn't immediately return a message from the AP on Wednesday night.

Bonds is set to begin his 15th season with the Giants only 22 home runs shy of surpassing Hank Aaron's career record of 755.

Bonds, considered healthy again following offseason surgery on his troublesome left elbow, has spent 14 of his 21 big league seasons with San Francisco and helped the Giants draw 3 million fans in all seven seasons at their waterfront ballpark.

After missing all but 14 games in 2005 following three operations on his right knee, Bonds batted .270 with 26 homers and 77 RBI in 367 at-bats in 2006. He passed Babe Ruth to move into second place on the career home run list May 28. AP NEWS

Report: Bonds Failed Test For Amphetmines (NYDN)

By T.j. Quinn

New York Daily News, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK - Barry Bonds, already under investigation for lying under oath about his steroid use, failed a test under Major League Baseball's amphetamine policy last season and then initially blamed it on a teammate, the New York Daily News has learned.

Under the policy, which went into effect only last season, players are not publicly identified for a first positive test.

But according to several sources, when first informed by the MLB Players Association of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from the locker of teammate Mark Sweeney. Sources did not identify the drug in question but characterized it as a serious stimulant.

When asked Wednesday night whether Bonds had an explanation for why he failed the test or if he wanted to issue a denial, Bonds' agent, Jeff Borris, said, "I have no comment on that."

Giants officials did not return calls seeking comment Wednesday night.

Bonds, who has long defended himself against steroid accusations by saying he "never failed a drug test," did not appeal his positive test but was immediately subject to an additional six drug tests by MLB during the next six months.

Sweeney declined comment, but his agent, Barry Axelrod, told The News, "Mark was made aware of the fact that his name had been brought up, but he did not give Barry Bonds anything and there was nothing he could have given Barry Bonds."

Bonds was not punished for his transgression but instead was referred to treatment and counseling. While amphetamines are considered performance-enhancing drugs, they are treated differently than steroids under baseball's drug policy. Had Bonds failed a steroid test, he would have been suspended for 50 games, but under baseball's amphetamine policy no one is publicly identified or suspended until a second positive, which would result in a 25-game suspension. A player is suspended for 80 games for a third positive.

The policy covers a range of stimulants, including the ubiquitous "greenies," or Dexedrine. Benzedrine, ephedrine and the stimulants Ritalin and Adderall, which are used to treat attention-deficit disorder, are among the substances on the policy.

"We're not in a position to confirm or deny, obviously," MLB spokesman Rich Levin said. "A second failed test would mean a suspension."

Sources said Sweeney, a first baseman/outfielder, first heard about the test when Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the players association, called to say the player's name had been dragged into the controversy.

Orza told Sweeney that if he had anything troublesome in his locker, he should remove it and that he should not be sharing substances with other players. Sweeney told Orza that there was nothing in his locker that would be of concern, sources said.

Axelrod would not comment on the conversation between Orza and Sweeney. Orza also refused to comment on what he said to Sweeney or about Bonds' failed test but added, "I can say unequivocally in my 22 years I've known Barry Bonds, he has never blamed anyone for anything."

Sweeney apparently confronted Bonds, and Bonds told him that Orza had misunderstood, that he had not intended to implicate his teammate.

Bonds has been in the doping spotlight since September 2003, when federal agents raided the BALCO lab and the home of Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson. Bonds testified before a grand jury in the steroid-trafficking case that he had taken substances identified by the government as steroids, but that he believed they were legal supplements. A Daily News reporter overheard part of his testimony that day admitting he had unknowingly used steroids, and a year later the San Francisco Chronicle published extended excerpts from the grand jury transcripts.

The leaks about Bonds' steroid use were not sufficient evidence to allow MLB to test Bonds for cause, but the failed amphetamine test is.

BALCO founder Victor Conte, Anderson and three other men served prison sentences for their parts in the trafficking ring, and Bonds has been under investigation for perjury and tax evasion for more than two years. Anderson is in prison on a contempt charge for refusing to testify against his longtime friend.

Long before steroids took hold in clubhouses in the early 1990s, amphetamines were the performance-enhancer of choice in baseball.

Even when baseball first adopted a steroids policy in 2003, amphetamines were not specifically banned or tested for, although many are illegal without a prescription.

U.S. Defends Anti - Drug Efforts In Haiti (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) -- The U.S. defended on Wednesday its anti-drug efforts in Haiti, two days after the Caribbean nation's president accused America and other major drug-consuming countries of failing to adequately fight the narcotics trade.

In a strongly worded speech to Parliament on Monday, President Rene Preval called drug trafficking the main cause of instability in his impoverished nation and said failed efforts by the United States and other countries to stop the trade had made Haiti a "victim."

U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Shaila B. Manyam said Wednesday the United States has undertaken a range of measures to defend Haiti against drug trafficking, including strengthening its weak justice system and training its coast guard.

The U.S. has also contributed more than $40 million to Haiti's national police since 2004, Manyam said.

"The United States shares Haiti's concern about drug trafficking," Manyam said. "Our two countries have a long history of cooperation on combatting this scourge and that cooperation will continue."

Drug traffickers have long taken advantage of Haiti's weak defenses and vulnerable coastline to smuggle in cocaine bound for the United States, Canada and Europe.

Manyam said Preval's comments "indicate the government of Haiti shares our strong commitment to deal with the threats to stability and security posed by drug trafficking."

DOJ_NMG_0115284

Preval's cash-strapped government has struggled to contain gang violence sparked by a bloody 2004 revolt that ousted former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Haiti's first democratically elected leader.

Ransom-seeking gangs have kidnapped dozens of people in recent weeks, prompting criticism that police and an 8,800-strong U.N. peacekeeping force are not doing enough to fight crime.

U.N. troops and police have stepped up patrols in recent days and arrested two suspected kidnappers.

IMMIGRATION:

Chinese Fugitive Ruled Eligible For U.S. Asylum (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

A Chinese man who was beaten by officials in his homeland for protesting the forced sterilization of his brother, then fled to the United States, is eligible for political asylum under a law protecting opponents of China's reproductive policy, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned an immigration court's ruling ordering the deportation of Li Bin Lin and told the immigration judges to determine whether Lin would face persecution in China. The ruling makes it likely that Lin will qualify for asylum, said his lawyer, Jisheng Li of Honolulu.

Lin lived with his brother, their parents and other relatives in a house in Fujian province on China's southeast coast. When Lin's brother's wife became pregnant with their third child, officials told Lin's brother that he would have to undergo a vasectomy.

The brother left home to avoid the operation, and birth control officials came to the home in March 1998 to seize and destroy household furnishings, the court said. When Lin tried to stop them, they beat him and called security police to have him arrested, according to his court declaration.

He went into hiding and left two months later for the U.S. territory of Guam, where he still lives. His brother was eventually sterilized.

When U.S. officials moved to deport Lin in 2001, he filed for asylum, relying on a 1996 law that makes immigrants eligible if they have been forced to undergo an abortion or sterilization, or if they have been persecuted for "other resistance to a coercive population control program." The law was intended to protect those who fled China because of its population-control policies.

The Board of Immigration Appeals, whose judges are Justice Department appointees, ruled against Lin, saying he had not shown resistance to the birth control program and had simply been trying to protect household property.

The federal court said Tuesday that Lin's motive was irrelevant under the 1996 law.

"Lin's physical altercation with the birth control officials while the officials attempted to use coercive measures to enforce birth quotas constitutes physical resistance," Judge Stephen Trott said in the 3-0 ruling.

Legislators Introduce Sweeping Agricultural Guest-worker Program (MCT)

By Michael Doyle

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - The introduction Wednesday of an ambitious agricultural guest-worker plan showcases the changed Capitol Hill circumstances that may make 2007 the year for an immigration overhaul.

Some congressional roadblocks are gone. Sympathetic new leaders are in charge. A restored Democratic majority claims new priorities.

"A year does make a difference," insisted Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho.

Or so he hopes.

Joined by lawmakers from Florida and California, and backed by hundreds of farm, labor and church groups, Craig is reintroducing a guest-worker plan that's been debated for years. As many as 1.5 million farm workers and their relatives now in this country illegally could gain legal status under the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0115285

The legislation, dubbed AgJobs, would also revise an existing guest-worker program that farmers consider inefficient. It's the first big immigration overhaul bill introduced this year, mirroring legislation passed last year by the Senate but not the House of Representatives.

"I happen to believe we have the votes," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "I believe the bill can move quickly."

Professed optimism is partly tactical, demonstrating momentum. The press conference announcing the bill amounted to a rally, as AgJobs supporters such as Idaho apple grower Kelly Henggeler, United Farm Workers President Arturo Rodriguez and Manuel Cunha, president of the Fresno, Calif.-based Nisei Farmers League, cheered on the lawmakers.

Previous press conferences convened since 2003 were similarly staged, and Henggeler - a third-generation grower from the town of Fruitland - conceded feeling "a little bit (of) deja vu." Still, the optimism may also have some foundation in fact.

The bill is bipartisan, introduced by Republicans Craig and Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida and Democrats Feinstein and Sen. Barbara Boxer of California. Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., helped negotiate the package and introduced an identical bill in the House.

The legislation would grant "blue cards" to illegal immigrants who could prove they had worked in agriculture for at least 150 days in the last two years. They must continue working in agriculture for several years before attaining permanent legal status.

The Republicans who controlled the House last year refused to bring the guest-worker legislation up for a vote. This year, Democrats control the House by a 233-202 margin.

"With the change in the majority party, I think we're going to see a situation where we get something done this year," said Barry Bedwell, president of the California Grape and Tree Fruit League.

Last year's chairman of the House immigration subcommittee, Indiana Republican John Hostettler, staunchly opposed guest-worker bills. Voters ejected him in November. This year's immigration panel chair, California Democrat Zoe Lofgren, supports the agricultural guest-worker legislation.

Likewise, the skeptical GOP chair of the House Judiciary Committee - Wisconsin Republican James Sensenbrenner - has been replaced by a sympathetic Democrat, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan. Lawmakers added Wednesday that Florida Republican Adam Putnam's service as chair of the House Republican Conference brings a sympathetic voice to the GOP's top ranks.

"There's a little bit more impetus with the change of leadership on the congressional side," said Vito Chiesa, a California peach and almond grower.

The Senate will probably move first, since it took the lead last year. As before, the agricultural guest-worker package could be folded into an immigration overhaul plan that extends beyond farm workers. Congressional negotiators have quietly been redrafting such a comprehensive plan.

The broader proposal will be introduced later with its own fanfare. It will extend to millions of illegal immigrants the opportunity to become legal U.S. residents and, eventually, citizens if they can pay fines and cross other hurdles.

As before, both the broader immigration overhaul and the AgJobs proposal will incite vigorous resistance.

"The Senate has already heard a great number of euphemisms about the AgJobs bill, but let's be clear from the start about what we are discussing," Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., warned during earlier debate. "It is amnesty for aliens employed unlawfully in the agricultural sector, and it is amnesty for the businesses that hire and exploit them as cheap labor."

If resistance to a immigration overhaul bill grows too stiff, Berman said, the agricultural guest-worker package could moved as a separate bill.

KPMG Tax-Shelter Probe Nets A Fourth Guilty Plea (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And David Reilly

DOJ_NMG_0115286

A California accountant pleaded guilty yesterday to four criminal charges related to the sale of allegedly improper tax shelters and his role in helping a former KPMG LLP executive try to obstruct a government investigation into the products. The admission marks the fourth guilty plea the government has secured in its investigation into shelters designed by KPMG.

As part of a deal with prosecutors, Steven Acosta, of Pasadena, Calif., admitted to conspiracy, tax evasion and two counts of obstruction of an Internal Revenue Service investigation. The 49-year-old faces as many as 16 years in prison but has agreed to testify against former KPMG executives facing criminal charges related to the shelters in a trial scheduled for September.

Mr. Acosta worked briefly for KPMG, but he wasn't among the 19 individuals -- including 17 former KPMG executives -- indicted in November 2005 on criminal charges related to the tax shelters. Mr. Acosta, posing as an independent investment adviser and hedge-fund operator, said he helped David Greenberg, one of the indicted former KPMG executives, to sell shelters.

Mr. Acosta said he didn't have any knowledge or understanding of the transactions he was purportedly providing advice on. In return, Mr. Acosta said, Mr. Greenberg paid him $600,000 for his role. Prosecutors said Mr. Acosta also lied to IRS agents investigating the tax shelters and that his role in the fraud generated $100 million in losses to the government.

The government contends the shelters were designed to create phony paper losses for wealthy individuals in an effort to evade billions of dollars in taxes. While one of the indicted former KPMG executives, David Rivkin, has pleaded guilty, the other 18 individuals facing trial, including Mr. Greenberg, are fighting the charges.

Mr. Acosta was "a small part of a rather large conspiracy," his lawyer, Jim Henderson, said in court.

Leonard Lesser, a lawyer with Simon Lesser P.C. who is representing Mr. Greenberg, yesterday declined to comment on Mr. Acosta's plea.

KPMG itself in August 2005 entered into a deferred-prosecution agreement with the government over the tax-shelter products and agreed to pay a $456 million fine. The government earlier this month agreed to drop the deferred criminal charge against the firm.

Tax Cuts And Consequences (NYT)

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

The tax system in the United States is supposed to mitigate inequality. But a recent report by Congress's budget agency provides fresh evidence that Bush-era tax cuts have done more to reinforce inequality than to redress it.

The agency found that in 2004, the latest year for which comprehensive data were available, the top 1 percent of households pocketed 14 percent of total after-tax income in the United States, up from 12.2 percent in 2003. That increase, the third largest in one year since the agency started keeping track in 1979, works out to an extra $128 billion. And yet despite that hefty gain, the effective federal tax rate of the top 1 percent decreased slightly.

In contrast, the share of after-tax income going to households in the middle of the income distribution fell to 15 percent in 2004, down from 15.4 percent in 2003 — the equivalent of a $29 billion loss. In that time, the share of their income going to federal taxes stayed about the same.

One of the reasons the rich are getting so much richer than everyone else is that investment income is highly concentrated among the richest Americans and has grown robustly through much of the Bush years — unlike wages and salaries. But the rise in investment income hasn't caused rich Americans' income taxes to rise substantially because — thanks to the tax cuts of 2003 — investments are now taxed at about the lowest rates in the code.

Another reason for the after-tax advance of upper-income Americans is that an ever larger share of their salaries escapes the payroll tax that pays for Social Security benefits. The annual amount of income subject to the tax — now $97,500 — has been adjusted upward each year since 1982, in line with the increase in average wages. But as pay raises at the top of the income scale have increasingly exceeded the average wage gain, incremental adjustments in the wage cap have been inadequate. In 1982, only about 10 percent of all wages escaped the tax. Today, that figure is estimated at 15 percent. The administration has yet to call for raising the cap, though doing so is a matter of simple fairness.

Unfortunately, with the administration having abandoned fiscal prudence for the past six years, it's practically inevitable that inequality will worsen. The bill for the deficit-financed tax cuts of the Bush era will arrive in the years to come. It's likely that the costs will be borne by all, even though most of the benefits have accrued to the few.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Judicial Nominees Rankle Democrats (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 11, 2007

As President Bush withdrew four contentious judicial nominees, apparently offering an olive branch to the new Senate majority, he resubmitted a handful of executive-branch nominations that have angered and dismayed senior Democrats.

The White House's acknowledgment that its withdrawn judicial picks would face near-certain rejection in the new Congress won praise from Democrats and their allied interest groups. But the renewal late Tuesday of several agency nominations signals that Bush is not backing away from confrontation with Democrats who have held up many of the appointments and could renew their previous holds.

Several of the re-nominated officials, such as Assistant Secretary of Homeland Security for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Julie Myers and Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees and Migration Ellen Sauerbrey, already are serving in the administration under recess appointments that allowed them to sidestep Senate confirmation votes but expired at the end of the 109th Congress. John Bolton, who became America's ambassador to the United Nations following a recess appointment, opted to step down from the post last month rather than face a bruising Senate battle to win formal confirmation.

Steven Bradbury's nomination to lead the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel was blocked in August by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) in protest of the administration's denial of security clearances necessary to investigate warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency (NSA). Though Justice since has initiated an internal inquiry of the NSA program, Kennedy said yesterday he wants more time for oversight before Bradbury is considered.

"Bradbury was deeply involved in defending the president's program, which allowed warrantless surveillance of ordinary Americans," Kennedy said through a spokeswoman. "We need more information and cooperation from the administration — until then, we should not move forward on this nomination."

Another of Bush's resubmitted nominees, Armenian ambassador hopeful Richard Hoagland, sparked the ire of several senior Democrats by publicly questioning the veracity of the Armenian genocide, a flashpoint in U.S. relations with Turkey. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) blocked Hoagland's nomination last September, and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) joined him in a post-election request for Hoagland's outright withdrawal.

"It would serve neither our national interests nor the U.S.-Armenia relationship to expect ambassador-designate Hoagland to carry out his duties under these highly contentious and profoundly troubling circumstances," Reid and Menendez wrote to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Dec. 1.

Bush also renamed Leon Sequeira, a former aide to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), as assistant secretary for policy at the Labor Department. Sequeira drew holds last year from Colorado Sens. Ken Salazar (D) and Wayne Allard (R), both of whom were concerned about an unheard petition from workers in their state seeking compensation from Labor. The petition continues to languish, setting the stage for another hold.

C. Boyden Gray, founder of conservative interest group Committee for Justice, was serving as ambassador to the European Union under a recess appointment and also resubmitted. Gray was the subject of several reported Democratic holds in 2005 over judicial-nomination issues that may have evaporated after this week's withdrawal of the four disputed nominees.

Other nominees resubmitted this week that have earned strong Democratic disapproval include Richard Stickler, a coal-industry executive recess-appointed as assistant secretary for mine safety and health at the Labor Department, and Paul DeCamp as wage and hour administrator at Labor.

Minimum Wage Boost Races Through House (AP)

By David Espo

DOJ_NMG_0115288

The House voted to raise the federal minimum wage Wednesday for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, as majority Democrats marched briskly through their 100-hour agenda at the dawn of a new Congress.

Ebullient Democrats stood and cheered as the final vote — 315-116 — was announced.

"For 10 years the lowest-paid Americans have been frozen out," said Rep. George Miller of California, berating Republicans who had refused for years to allow a vote on a stand-alone minimum wage increase.

"The little guy is not going to be forgotten any longer," said Rep. Bill Pascrell, whose district includes gritty Paterson, N.J. He estimated the increase would mean an additional $4,400 a year for a family of three.

"The small businessmen we are trying to help for the most part are little guys," countered Rep. Howard McKeon, R-Calif. He said Republicans favor an alternative coupling a minimum wage increase with tax breaks for small businesses.

Other Republicans argued that raising the minimum wage would hurt employment chances for the lowest-paid workers.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, would raise the current $5.15 minimum to $5.85 effective 60 days after the measure became law. The minimum would go to $6.55 a year later and $7.25 a year after that.

The White House issued a statement of opposition to the legislation as drafted. It called for the increase to be accompanied by "tax and regulatory relief to help small businesses stay competitive and to help the economy keep growing."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has already signaled that Democrats will accept pro-business changes. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters that he and other lawmakers are working on between $8 billion and $10 billion in relief over 10 years.

Businesses that bring in less than $10 million a year would receive relief under one of the provisions in the emerging legislation, and the restaurant industry would be favored under another.

By contrast to the partisan debate on the wage legislation, one of the House's most cherished traditions fell without a struggle.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., issued an order banning smoking in an ornate lobby just off the House chamber where tobacco smoke and political intrigue have coexisted for generations.

"We can no longer risk the health of colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby each day," Pelosi said, and by midafternoon, the ashtrays were gone. Not so a portrait of John Nance Garner, cigar in hand, one of many past House speakers whose likenesses preside over the room.

There was distress across the Capitol, when 89-year-old Sen. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, who walks with the aid of two canes, arrived in the chamber too late to cast a vote.

Reid had cautioned senators he intended to run proceedings more efficiently. But Byrd observed that the Senate also "reveres tradition, seniority, debate, deliberation, experience and common courtesy."

The minimum wage bill is the second of six measures that Democrats intend to pass in the first two weeks of the new Congress. Legislation aimed at making the nation safer from terrorist attacks passed easily on Wednesday. The agenda for Thursday includes a measure to permit expanded federally funded embryonic stem cell research, a bill Bush has threatened to veto.

On Friday, the House is expected to pass legislation directing the administration to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices on prescription drugs for Medicare recipients. Republicans said Wednesday they believed Bush would veto that bill, as well, if it reached his desk as drafted.

Democrats have long claimed the measure would result in significant savings, but congressional budget analysts bluntly disputed that. "We anticipate that the (administration) would be unable to negotiate prices across a broad range of ... drugs that are more favorable than those obtained" under current law, said a letter signed by Donald B. Marron, acting director of the Congressional Budget Office.

The remaining measures on the early Democratic agenda would cut the interest rate on student loans and raise taxes on energy companies to pay for an effort to reduce dependence on foreign oil.

All 233 Democrats voted for the minimum wage measure, along with 82 Republicans. All 116 votes in opposition came from Republicans.

Less than a week after Congress convened under Democratic control, the minimum wage bill offered an early challenge of the party's ability to maneuver in an environment shaped by friendly outside interest groups as well as the White House and Republicans who hold 49 votes in the 100-member Senate.

House Democrats insisted that the bill pass without any relief for small businesses, and the AFL-CIO has lobbied Senate Democrats to go along. Several officials said the issue flared in this week's closed-door caucus of the rank and file, when some liberals challenged Baucus and questioned a strategy that called for early concessions to Republicans.

In response, Reid said Democrats did not have 60 votes that would be needed to pass a stand-alone minimum wage increase over a Republican filibuster, these officials added.

The final measure will be worked out in negotiations between the two houses, and it is likely that Pelosi and House Democrats will ultimately have to accept tax breaks for businesses if they are to get Bush's signature on one of their top priorities.

Under budget rules enacted last week, though, no tax legislation that clears the House can increase the deficit — meaning that the minimum wage bill would have to contain provisions to offset the costs of the tax cuts.

Inflation has eroded the minimum wage's buying power to the lowest level in about 50 years in the time since the last increase took effect. According to Labor Department statistics, 479,000 workers paid by the hour earned exactly $5.15 in 2005, the most recent estimate available. They tend to be under 25 and never married and more likely to be women, minorities and part-time workers.

More than two dozen states and the District of Columbia have minimum wages higher than the federal level. The political potency of the issue was evident last November, when proposals to raise statewide minimums passed in all six states where they came to a vote.

Minimum-Wage Increase Easily Clears House Vote (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Legislation to increase the federal minimum wage cleared the House by an almost three-to-one margin, giving Senate Democrats increased confidence that they can win quick enactment together with tax breaks targeted to small business.

Ending years of party resistance, 82 House Republicans joined in approving the increase, raising the minimum hourly wage standard to $7.25 from $5.15 over the next two years. The first of three 70-cent increments would take effect 60 days after the bill becomes law and would be the first increase in the federal standard in almost a decade.

The long gap, under Republican control of the House, both raised the political stakes of the wage issue and diminished its direct impact on the economy. Labor economists estimate that the six million workers directly affected by an increase represent about 4% of the work force, compared with the 9% directly affected when Congress last approved an increase in 1996.

The impact also varies, since more than half the states have raised their own minimum-wage standards, often to a higher level than the new federal requirement.

Nonetheless the symbolism of the 315-116 vote was huge for the new House Democratic majority, which is struggling to stay focused on its domestic agenda as the debate over the Iraq war increasingly dominates Congress. "This is a question of economic fairness...this goes way beyond the dollars and cents of the minimum wage," said House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D., Cal.).

Final passage followed skirmishes over Republican efforts to add tax- and health-related amendments. But Senate Democrats are poised to add a small-business tax package that will require tax-loophole closings to pay for the estimated 10-year cost of $8 billion to $10 billion.

"This will pass," said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.), who is moving to attach the tax package to the House-passed bill and thereby pick up the extra Republican votes needed to assure Senate passage. He wants to make permanent the current work-opportunity tax credit for employers hiring low-wage workers. Small-business depreciation benefits could be expanded, and Mr. Baucus said he is looking at a proposal to make it easier for small employers with inventories to still use cash accounting under tax rules.

When Congress last approved a minimum-wage increase in 1996, the attached business-tax benefits approached $20 billion -- or twice what is now envisioned. But Mr. Baucus is reluctant to go further and use up more of his tax offsets, options he will need in the future to pay for Democratic energy initiatives as well as some form of middle-class protection from the Alternative Minimum Tax.

Instead, he and the ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, are expected to rely on a small reservoir of tax-shelter changes that the Senate has passed before but were resisted by the House when under Republican control. Among these targets are leasing tax shelters known as sale in and lease out transactions, which have been criticized by the Internal Revenue Service and which Congress has largely outlawed for leases entered into after March 12, 2004.

Given the continued IRS criticism of the shelters, Senate tax writers have argued that even in cases of leases entered into before the 2004 law, the holders of the shelters shouldn't gain future benefits, especially if the lessee is a foreign person or company. Mr. Baucus said companies that rushed to enter leases after he and Mr. Grassley had set a cutoff date in 2003 could be vulnerable.

House, By A Wide Margin, Backs Minimum-Wage Rise (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The House overwhelmingly approved a $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage on Wednesday, in a vote that Democrats hailed as overdue and a symbol of new leadership on Capitol Hill.

The Democrats, who campaigned against Republicans last year for repeatedly allowing Congressional pay raises when they were in the majority and yet refusing for almost a decade to raise the wage floor from $5.15, said the new, three-step increase for hard-pressed employees would be in sharp contrast to Republican tax cuts approved for the affluent.

"This is the day for the people who empty the bedpans, change the bed linens, sweep the floors and do the hardest work of America," Representative Robert E. Andrews, Democrat of New Jersey, said before the 315-to-116 vote.

Several Republicans spoke against the legislation, a centerpiece of the House Democrats' 100-hour domestic legislative agenda, on the ground that it would reduce the number of available jobs and so deny opportunities to those trying to enter the work force. But 82 Republicans joined all 233 Democrats in supporting the bill, unwilling to cast a vote that could have made them appear unsympathetic to Americans trying to get by on a minimum wage that has not been raised since September 1997.

"Let's not trample on the market, but recognize that nine years is long enough," said Representative Zach Wamp, Republican of Tennessee.

The measure would increase the minimum wage to $5.85 an hour 60 days after being signed into law, to $6.55 one year after that, and to $7.25 after an additional year. For a minimum-wage employee working full time, $7.25 would mean about $4,000 a year more than the current floor.

But the House vote is far from the final word. The legislation now goes to the Senate, where members of both parties have indicated that they intend to tie it to tax breaks for small businesses, to help offset any new costs arising from the wage increase. Linking the two is seen by many as a prerequisite to rounding up the 60 votes needed to overcome any filibuster and open the door to negotiations between the House and the Senate over a final bill. President Bush has indicated that he would sign a bill providing for a wage increase with related tax breaks.

"The 110th Congress is going to do the right thing and finally deliver a minimum-wage increase," the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, said Wednesday. "And at the same time, we should help keep jobs available to America's workers by helping small businesses absorb this wage hike."

In recent years, Republicans repeatedly rebuffed Democratic proposals to raise the minimum, arguing that it could slow the economy. Under pressure from Republicans in swing districts, the leadership last year did allow a vote on an increase, but tied it to a repeal of the estate tax. Democrats, backed by organized labor and other interests, blocked that proposal in the Senate.

During the fall campaign, Democrats made inaction on the minimum wage a mainstay of their arguments against Republican control. Breaking an informal agreement with Republicans not to trade partisan charges over Congressional pay, they contrasted the stalled minimum-wage rate and lawmakers' regular cost-of-living increases. Trying to insulate themselves, the Republicans agreed late last year that Congress would get no more pay raises until a minimum-wage increase was approved.

On Wednesday, Republicans criticized Democrats for blocking any efforts to change the House measure by including small-business tax breaks.

"It is troubling that this bill gives no thought to softening the impact on our engines of new job growth," said Representative Wally Herger, Republican of California.

But Democrats were determined to raise the wage floor with no strings attached.

"Can't you just give these workers an increase and be done with it?" Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and the new chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, asked his colleagues.

Despite their longstanding opposition, two mainstays of the Washington business lobby — the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business — made only a perfunctory effort to influence the House vote, sending members letters of opposition but otherwise conceding the issue.

"It was a foregone conclusion," said Michael J. Donohue, a spokesman for the federation, which represents small businesses. "Our lobbyists assessed that this wasn't the best way to spend their energy."

The vote was celebrated by organized labor, which is seeing its influence in Congress enhanced with the return of a Democratic majority. But John J. Sweeney, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., joined with Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and a longtime advocate of the wage increase, in urging the Senate to pass the measure without offsetting benefits for businesses.

"Business has enjoyed hundreds of billions of dollars in tax cuts since Bush took office," Mr. Sweeney said in a statement, "while health care, secure retirements and the minimum wage have all been on government's back burner."

On the House floor, meanwhile, Speaker Nancy Pelosi beamed after the final vote as she brought down her gavel and Democrats cheered the lopsided margin.

House Passes Increase In Minimum Wage To $7.25 (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

The House yesterday overwhelmingly approved the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade, boosting the wages of the lowest-paid American workers from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over the next two years.

The 315 to 116 vote could begin the process of ending Congress's longest stretch without a minimum-wage increase since the mandatory minimum was created in 1938. In the past decade, inflation has depleted the value of the minimum wage to the lowest level in more than 50 years.

Senate Democratic leaders promise to press for a vote on their own minimum-wage legislation this month. Unlike the House-passed bill, the Senate's would include small-business tax cuts that Democrats believe are necessary to placate Republicans and the business community and win the 60 votes necessary to break a possible filibuster.

"On Monday, we commemorate the life of a great American, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. And Dr. King once said: 'Equality means dignity. And dignity demands a job and a paycheck that lasts through the week,' " said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "Today, we heed those words."

The minimum-wage vote followed House action on Tuesday approving legislation to implement many of the remaining anti-terrorism recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. The House launched its legislative blitz last week by tightening rules on lobbying and imposing new controls on deficit spending. In all four tallies, Republicans who held in lock step during their 12 years as the majority party went over in droves to the Democratic side.

Democrats used the minimum-wage issue effectively during last year's midterm campaign, vowing to approve an increase if they won control of the Congress.

Republican leaders, backed by small-business lobbyists and restaurant groups, argued fiercely that raising the minimum wage would cripple the economy and must be accompanied by significant tax cuts for small businesses to lessen the effect on them. Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) predicted that a wage increase "will leave recent economic growth dead in its tracks."

But with Democrats ascendant, such arguments did not go far -- especially now, when a tight labor market has boosted incomes and rendered the minimum wage almost irrelevant in many states. Eighty-two Republicans joined 233 Democrats to approve the increase. More surprisingly, 54 Republicans abandoned their leadership and voted with the Democrats on a procedural motion that would have forced House leaders to add business tax breaks to the bill.

Under the Democratic measure, the minimum wage would jump to $5.85 within 60 days of enactment. One year later, the wage would rise to $6.55; it would reach $7.25 a year after that. The bill for the first time would also apply the federal minimum wage to the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. protectorate that was protected from federal labor laws for years because of the efforts of now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his Republican allies in Congress.

Democrats estimate that a minimum-wage increase will lift the income of 13 million workers -- 5.6 million earning the current minimum wage and 7.4 million just above that level.

"Today we finally release them from being frozen in time, stuck at that wage level when their gas prices are higher, their education prices are higher, when their medical costs are higher," said George Miller (D-Calif.), the House Education and Labor Committee chairman and the bill's author.

But hurdles remain. When the Senate last year brought a simple minimum-wage increase to a vote, it fell well short of passage. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) plans to complete a package of small-business tax breaks by next week that would cost the Treasury up to $10 billion over the next 10 years. Those measures would mainly extend existing tax breaks, such as a tax deduction for the hiring of welfare recipients, generous tax deductions for business investments and breaks for property leases.

Some Senate Republicans are pushing for tax measures worth twice that much, and they could push a controversial measure to allow small businesses to pool together to buy health insurance. The bill, long sought by Republicans and small-business lobbyists, is strongly opposed by Democrats who say it would allow such "pools" to ignore state health insurance mandates.

John J. Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, said that an increase in pay for the nation's lowest-paid workers "should not have to depend on even more payoffs to business."

The White House yesterday released a statement opposing the House's minimum-wage increase and praising the Senate for considering small-business tax breaks. But the statement of administration policy did express the Bush administration's support for a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage and pointedly stopped short of threatening a veto.

House OKs New Minimum Wage (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The House overwhelmingly approved a raise in the minimum wage yesterday, hailing the first increase in 10 years as a principle of basic fairness that will lift millions out of poverty.

"This is a matter of fairness," Rep. John Lewis, Georgia Democrat and civil rights icon, said of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, the second of the six bills that new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised her party would pass. "This is a matter of human decency. This is a matter of human dignity."

The bill, approved yesterday on a lopsided 315-116 vote that prompted cheers from the new Democratic majority when the roll call was announced, would raise the minimum wage over two years from the current $5.15 per hour to $7.25, with intermediate steps at $5.85 and $6.55.

Democrats backed the bill by 233-0, while Republicans opposed it by 116-82.

But what Mr. Lewis called matters of fairness and human decency and dignity will not reign over all U.S. soil.

Although the legislation specifically extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the U.S. territory of the Northern Mariana Islands, it exempts American Samoa, another Pacific island territory that would become the only U.S. territory not subject to federal minimum-wage laws.

"It's ironic to me that one of the first bills they bring up that promises across-the-board fairness for all has an exception," said Steve Forde, Republican spokesman for the House Education and Labor Committee.

Democrats agreed yesterday that pay rates in Samoa should be raised and that the minimum wage should be uniform across all U.S. territories. But, they said, the working conditions in the Northern Mariana Islands are "screaming out" for immediate attention.

The loophole pleases the tuna corporations that employ thousands of Samoans in canneries there at $3.26 an hour -- an industry-specific rate set by the U.S. Department of Labor. They have lobbied Congress for years, arguing that imposing the federal minimum wage on Samoa would cripple the economy by driving the canneries to poor countries that don't require a minimum wage.

One of the biggest opponents of the U.S. minimum wage there is StarKist Tuna, which owns one of the two packing plants that together employ more than 5,000 Samoans, or nearly 75 percent of the island's work force. The other plant belongs to California-based Chicken of the Sea.

StarKist's parent company, Del Monte Corp., is headquartered in San Francisco, which is represented by Mrs. Pelosi.

A spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi said yesterday that the speaker has not been lobbied in any way by StarKist or Del Monte.

A spokesman for Rep. George Miller, California Democrat and author of the bill, also said he is aware of no lobbying to exempt Samoa from minimum-wage laws.

Tom Kiley, Democratic spokesman for the Education and Labor Committee, said the Northern Mariana Islands were included in the legislation because "they were building an economy on importing cheap labor where you had worker abuse that was unparallelled in Samoa or anywhere else." He added that the "goal is for there to be a uniform standard" and that lower Samoan wages should be re-evaluated.

Democrats have long criticized Republicans and the government of Northern Mariana Islands for suppressing wages in their garment industry by not applying the federal minimum wage to the territory's standing $3.05 minimum wage. In particular, they charged former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and a lobbyist for the Mariana Islands government -- Jack Abramoff -- for fostering sweatshops.

Republicans are not expected to try to avert the increase, simply insisting that a minimum-wage raise be accompanied, as yesterday's House bill was not, with what the White House called "tax and regulatory relief to help small businesses stay competitive and to help the economy keep growing."

But Democrats and their allies in such groups as labor unions hailed the bill.

"This country doesn't belong only to the giant corporations and the fat-cat lobbyists," John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, said during a press conference with Democrats on Capitol Hill. "You deserve a decent day's pay for a decent day's work. No more excuses. No more delays."

House Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

WASHINGTON — The first increase in the federal minimum wage in a decade passed the House of Representatives on Wednesday, and both the Senate and President Bush voiced support if small businesses get tax breaks.

Democrats, who control the House for the first time since 1994, pushed through the 41% wage increase on a 315-116 vote in a matter of hours. All 233 Democrats voted yes, along with 82 Republicans. Under Democrats, "the little guy's not going to be forgotten any longer," said Rep. Bill Pascrell, D-N.J.

The measure would boost the wage, $5.15 an hour, to $7.25 over two years in three 70-cent increments. It would affect about 5.6 million people, or 4% of the workforce, and there would be ripple effects for about 7.4 million others.

The federal minimum wage was last increased in 1997, the longest gap since it was set at 25 cents in 1938. The $10,712 salary for a full-time worker has the lowest buying power in 51 years.

SMALL BUSINESS CONNECTION: Your thoughts on the wage increase?

"Walk in the shoes of people who work every single day for a living," said Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn. Most members of Congress earn $165,200, and "this Congress in the last session barely worked two days a week here," she said.

Twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia, representing 70% of Americans, have higher minimums, ranging up to $7.93 in Washington state. The law would immediately affect those who live in the South and Midwest.

Gina Walter, 44, a thrift store cashier from Columbus, Ohio, makes $6.25 under her state's minimum wage law, a wage that will rise to $6.85 this month. She brings home $388 every two weeks; her monthly rent is $365. She can't afford health insurance.

"Sometimes I eat one time a day," Walter said Wednesday.

Republicans offered to raise the wage if the increase was accompanied by tax and health care breaks for the nation's 23 million small businesses. Otherwise, they said, up to 1 million people in the restaurant industry alone could lose jobs, and "what we can't count are jobs that are never offered," said Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga.

The GOP plan, which would let companies band together to buy health plans, was rejected by a 2-1 ratio. Then, 40% of Republicans voted for the wage hike alone. "You can't defend not raising it for nine years," said conservative Rep. Zach Wamp, R-Tenn.

John Nicholson, the owner of Company Flowers in Arlington, Va., said a higher wage would stop him from hiring young people new to the job market. "Some of my best customers have come to me and said on occasion, 'Would you hire my daughter or my son?' " he said. "Now I'm not going to be able to."

To pass the Senate, the higher wage probably will be combined with tax breaks for small businesses, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., said. That action, backed by Bush, could come late next week.

"The administration looks forward to working with Congress to maintain a flexible labor market and provide a complete package that helps both workers and small businesses," a White House statement said.

House Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

WASHINGTON - The House of Representatives voted Wednesday to raise the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 by 2009, giving millions of poor Americans who work their best prospects in a decade to earn higher standards of living.

The legislation, which passed 315 to 116, doesn't include tax relief for small businesses, which President Bush says must be part of any increase he signs. Many Republicans say any such wage hike must be matched by incentives for small-business employers, particularly in the restaurant industry, which they say could lose the most when the minimum wage is raised.

Senate Democrats are expected to include some tax breaks in their version of the legislation in coming weeks and to urge House Democrats to go along, despite objections from liberal lawmakers and the AFL-CIO, in order to clear the Senate and win Bush's signature.

"It's very important we pass a minimum wage - it's also important that small businesses thrive in this country," said Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., one of the new crop of moderate-to-conservative Democrats who won election in November.

Americans working full-time jobs at the federal minimum wage would see their salaries rise under the proposed increase from about $11,000 a year to $15,000.

Democrats, back in control of Congress after a dozen years, see the minimum-wage increase as a key statement of their priorities. It's both a symbol to voters of the Democrats' ability to move legislation that Republicans bottled up for years and a reward to labor unions, a key constituency group for their party. It's also an idea overwhelmingly supported by Americans, including higher earners, polls show.

"This is a matter of fairness. This is a matter of human decency. This is a matter of human dignity," said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a noted leader of the `60s civil rights movement. "It is time Congress actually reflects the will of the American people."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, chairman of the Republican Study Committee, said "lucky" workers would see their pay rise to $7.25 an hour, but he predicted, "Many more will have their hours cut, many will have their benefits cut, and many will lose their jobs."

Rep. Wally Herger, R-Calif., called the legislation "detrimental to small-business growth and job creation."

The last time Congress increased the minimum wage was in 1997, and the nation's unemployment rate fell in each of the next three years as the economy boomed.

In the 10 years since the minimum wage was raised, lawmakers increased their own pay by more than $31,000, to $165,200 last year. And more than half of the states have adopted their own minimum-wage increases.

The proposed increase would affect an estimated 5.6 million workers, largely those employed in service industries and likely to vote Democrat: younger Americans, Hispanics, blacks and women.

It also could pressure employers to raise the salaries of more than 7 million other workers earning slightly more than the minimum wage, economists predict.

Democrats noted that Wal-Mart's chairman came out recently in support of the increase, saying the discount chain's customers have too little income.

Anna Burger, secretary-treasurer of the SEIU, a union representing service workers, applauded the House vote, saying, "We are pleased to see the House is listening to working families and acting on the issues that matter most to them."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said that if minimum-wage increases had kept up with the cost of living, the current minimum wage would be $9.05 an hour.

Crossing The State Line Is Worth It For $7.93 (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

LIBERTY LAKE, Wash., Jan. 9 — Just eight miles separate this town on the Washington side of the state border from Post Falls on the Idaho side. But the towns are nearly $3 an hour apart in the required minimum wage. Washington pays the highest in the nation, just under $8 an hour, and Idaho has among the lowest, matching 21 states that have not raised the hourly wage beyond the federal minimum of $5.15.

Nearly a decade ago, when voters in Washington approved a measure that would give the state's lowest-paid workers a raise nearly every year, many business leaders predicted that small towns on this side of the state line would suffer.

But instead of shriveling up, small-business owners in Washington say they have prospered far beyond their expectations. In fact, as a significant increase in the national minimum wage heads toward law, businesses here at the dividing line between two economies — a real-life laboratory for the debate — have found that raising prices to compensate for higher wages does not necessarily lead to losses in jobs and profits.

Idaho teenagers cross the state line to work in fast-food restaurants in Washington, where the minimum wage is 54 percent higher. That has forced businesses in Idaho to raise their wages to compete.

Business owners say they have had to increase prices somewhat to keep up. But both states are among the nation's leaders in the growth of jobs and personal income, suggesting that an increase in the minimum wage has not hurt the overall economy.

"We're paying the highest wage we've ever had to pay, and our business is still up more than 11 percent over last year," said Tom Singleton, who manages a Papa Murphy's takeout pizza store here, with 13 employees.

His store is flooded with job applicants from Idaho, Mr. Singleton said. Like other business managers in Washington, he said he had less turnover because the jobs paid more.

By contrast, an Idaho restaurant owner, Rob Elder, said he paid more than the minimum wage because he could not find anyone to work for the Idaho minimum at his Post Falls restaurant, the Hot Rod Cafe.

"At $5.15 an hour, I get zero applicants — or maybe a guy with one leg who wouldn't pass a drug test and wouldn't show up on Saturday night because he wants to get drunk with his buddies," Mr. Elder said.

For years, economists have debated the effect that raising the minimum wage would have on business. While the federal minimum wage has not gone up for 10 years, 29 states have raised their wage beyond the federal minimum.

These increases, according to critics like Brendan Flanagan of the National Restaurant Association, are a burden on the small, mostly family-run businesses in fast food and agriculture that employ workers at the lowest end of the pay scale.

"We see the political momentum for this," said Mr. Flanagan, a vice president at the association, "but we cannot ignore what our members are telling us, which is that it will lead to job losses."

But the state's major business lobby, the Association of Washington Business, is no longer fighting the minimum-wage law, which is adjusted every year in line with the consumer price index.

"You don't see us screaming out loud about this," said Don Brunell, president of the trade group, which represents 6,300 members.

"It's almost a no-brainer," Mr. Brunell said, that the federal minimum should go higher. Association officials say they would like to see some flexibility for rural and small-town businesses, however.

Washington's robust economy, which added nearly 90,000 jobs last year, is proof that even with the country's highest minimum wage, "this is a great place to do business," Mr. Brunell said.

During a recession five years ago, the same group had argued that Washington's high minimum wage law would send businesses fleeing to Idaho. The group sent out a news release with a criticism of the law from John Fazzari, who owns a family-run pizza business in Clarkston, Wash., just minutes from the Idaho town of Lewiston.

But now Mr. Fazzari says business has never been better, and he has no desire to move to Idaho.

"To tell you the truth, my business is fantastic," he said in an interview. "I've never done as much business in my life."

Mr. Fazzari employs 42 people at his pizza parlor. New workers make the Washington minimum, $7.93 an hour, but veteran employees make more. To compensate for the required annual increase in the minimum wage, Mr. Fazzari said he raises prices slightly. But he said most customers barely notice.

He sells more pizza, he said, because he has a better product, and because his customers are loyal.

"If you look 10 years down the road, we will probably have no minimum wage jobs on this side of the border, and lots of higher-income jobs," Mr. Fazzari said.

Job figures from both states tend to support his point. While Idaho leads the nation in new job growth, it has a far higher percentage of minimum-wage jobs than Washington. Minimum-wage positions make up just 2.4 percent of the jobs in Washington, while about 13 percent of the jobs in Idaho pay at or less than the proposed federal minimum wage, according to a study done for the state last year.

Part of the difference could be accounted for by a lower cost of living in Idaho and the higher percentage of technology, manufacturing and government jobs in Washington, economists say. Still, it is hard to find a teenager in Idaho who lives anywhere near Washington who is willing to work for $5.15 an hour.

"Are you kidding? There are so many jobs nearby that pay way more than minimum wage," said Jennifer Stadtfeldt, who is 17 and lives in Coeur d'Alene, which is just a few minutes from Washington. She pointed out that Taco Bell, McDonald's and other fast-food outlets in her town were posting signs trying to entice entry-level workers with a starting pay of $7 an hour.

The House today passed a bill increasing the minimum wage, and about 13 million workers would see a pay raise if the Senate and President Bush approve it. Mr. Bush has said he would approve the wage increase so long as concerns of small-business owners were taken into account; the Senate has not yet taken up the bill.

Several studies have concluded that modest changes in the minimum wage have little effect on employment. A study two months ago by an economist at Washington State University seemed to back the experience of Clarkston and other border towns in Washington. The economist, David Holland, said job loss was minimal when higher wages were forced on all businesses. About 97 percent of all minimum-wage workers were better off when wages went up, he wrote.

But other business groups argue that an increase would hurt consumers and workers at the low end.

In a survey released on the eve of the November elections — in which voters in six states considered raising their minimum wages — the National Restaurant Association said restaurants expected to raise their prices and eliminate some jobs if the voters approved the measures. The initiatives all passed.

Here on this border, business owners have found small ways to raise their prices, and customers say they have barely noticed.

"We used to have a coupon, $3 off on any family-size pizza, and we changed that to $2 off," said Mr. Singleton, of Papa Murphy's. "I haven't heard a single complaint."

White House Is Opposed To New Bill On Stem Cells (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0115297

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The Bush administration jumped back into the bitter debate surrounding embryonic stem cell research on Wednesday, urging lawmakers to vote against House legislation to expand such research and calling for a new focus on scientific studies that would not harm embryos.

In a White House position paper, officials pressed for consideration of alternative research strategies that would be "free of the ethical violations of embryo destruction." Administration officials said President Bush was also considering an executive order that would call for increased financing for studies that did not involve embryos.

The move came as the House prepared to pass a bill on Thursday that would expand federally supported stem cell research. The legislation, sponsored by Representatives Diana DeGette, Democrat of Colorado, and Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, would permit federal financing of studies on stem cells derived from embryos at fertility clinics that are scheduled for destruction.

The legislation is expected to pass the House with bipartisan support this week and to pass the Senate in coming weeks. Supporters of the House bill acknowledged, however, that they did not expect to have enough votes to override a presidential veto.

Mr. Bush, who vetoed stem cell legislation passed by the Republican-controlled Congress last year, is expected to do so again, and the White House's engagement on the issue on Wednesday appeared to be aimed primarily at limiting the size of the votes in favor of the bill in Congress.

A fierce social, scientific and political debate over embryonic stem cell research rose in several Congressional campaigns last year and exposed deep fissures among Republicans, pitting the president against members of his own party and what polls say is a majority of the public.

Proponents of the studies say they may ultimately provide cures for illnesses like cancer, heart disease, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease. Opponents say the studies violate the sanctity of human life by encouraging the destruction of embryos left over from fertilization procedures.

Supporters of the measure have argued that such embryos would be destroyed anyway.

The White House position paper highlighted research suggesting that adult stem cells may be reprogrammed to function like embryonic stem cells and a new study that says stem cells present in amniotic fluid might ultimately prove to be as flexible as embryonic stem cells.

Tony Fratto, a spokesman for Mr. Bush, said administration officials were also "reaching out" to lawmakers in the House to press the president's position.

"A thoughtful review of the issue would lead most reasonable people to believe this is a line that we don't need to cross," Mr. Fratto said. "This is a vote of conscience for a lot of members. We hope they take the time to review all aspects of it before casting their vote."

Ms. DeGette said that although she supports all types of stem cell research, the alternatives highlighted by the White House remain at a preliminary stage.

"They keep trying to muddle the issue," she said of White House officials. "None of these other types of research are a substitute for embryonic stem cell research."

Mr. Castle, the Delaware Republican, emphasized that the new legislation was urgently needed. "It is time to update the federal policy to enable scientists in the United States to participate in the race for cures and treatments," he said.

Mr. Bush supports limited scientific research involving embryonic stem cells. Under his policy, which he announced on Aug. 9, 2001, the federal government pays for studies on stem cell colonies, or lines, created before that date, so that the government does not encourage the destruction of additional embryos. In the past six years, more than $130 million has been devoted to such research, officials say.

Because the cells have the potential to grow into any tissue or organ in the body, scientists believe that they hold great promise for treatments and cures. But because human embryos are destroyed in extracting the stem cells, the studies draw intense objections from abortion opponents.

Republican opponents of the proposal say the potential medical advances being promised by its backers offer false hope. “To date, embryonic stem cell research has not produced a single medical treatment, and I believe it is morally wrong to create human life to destroy it for research,” Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, said Wednesday.

On Stem Cell Legislation, A Reprise With Twists (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

The House is expected to pass today, by a substantial margin, legislation that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on human embryonic stem cell research -- a bill identical to the one it passed in 2005.

Next month, the Senate is expected to do the same, as it did last year.

And all indications are that soon after that, Bush will, for the second time, veto the bill.

But the final outcome of this year's emotional fight over the science and ethics of stem cell research is not as predictable as it may seem, said scientists and congressional strategists on both sides of the issue.

Opponents of the research say they have never been stronger, not only because of the ongoing support of the president but also because several recent studies have suggested that non-embryonic cells have significant medical promise that may rival that of embryonic cells.

Proponents, however, have a new ace up their sleeve as well: the political shifts wrought by voters in November. With stem-cell-friendly Democrats in the majority for the first time since the cells were discovered in 1998, supporters of the research will be able to work Congress's complex rules in their favor.

"This is not a 'one bill and you're out,' but a two-year time frame with potentially multiple legislative possibilities," said a research supporter involved in Capitol Hill strategizing, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly.

"They can stretch it out," the strategist said, so Bush and his backers in Congress must keep saying no to research that the public says it strongly supports. The research advocates "can make it as painful as possible."

Congressional leaders driving the legislation say they hope to avoid all-out war. Compromise language "is welcome," Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) said Tuesday at a news briefing, conceding that Bush has rebuffed all entreaties so far.

But if it comes to war, members of Congress and aides from both parties said, supporters have many options not available to them last year. They range from subtle moves that could enhance the odds of overriding a veto to heavy-handed tactics such as attaching the bill to must-pass budget legislation.

"I'm confident we'll have a veto-proof bill this time," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of three high-powered Republican supporters of stem cell research who attended the Tuesday briefing. In an odd Washington moment, all three seemed briefly grateful that the Democrats were back in charge.

Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who has led the stem cell charge in the Senate along with Specter, agreed. "One way or another, we're going to get this done this year," he said yesterday in a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters.

At issue are five-day-old human embryos that are about the size of the period at the end of this sentence. Stem cells from those embryos show promise for their ability to treat a wide array of diseases and for the secrets they may reveal about one of biology's biggest mysteries: how a fertilized egg cell can become a fully formed person.

Under a policy initiated by Bush on Aug. 9, 2001, taxpayer dollars can be used to study only those cells derived from embryos that were already destroyed by that date -- about 21 colonies of cells out of almost 400 that exist today.

The new legislation would expand that pool by allowing funding of work on cells from embryos slated for disposal at fertility clinics and donated by parents. It would also impose some of the first federal ethics rules on stem cell research, including a provision banning the sale of embryos.

The bill has the support of 66 senators, say Senate leaders, and more than the 238 representatives who voted for it in 2005.

Opponents, however, call the research an assault on nascent human life and an abandonment of society's most vulnerable, and there were reports last night that they might try to block passage in the House by attaching "poison pill" language that many stem cell proponents would have a hard time supporting.

Recent news about other, less controversial kinds of cells with traits resembling those of embryonic cells has already complicated the legislative push.

Opponents have long argued that "adult stem cells," various kinds of which exist in bone marrow, umbilical cords and other tissue, are suitable substitutes for embryonic cells. The true potential of those cells remains mostly unknown. But this week researchers published some of the strongest evidence yet that non-embryonic cells -- in this case, cells in the amniotic fluid of pregnant women -- might have much the same capacity as embryo cells.

In an unusual move, the White House itself touted the news Monday in a flurry of "In Case You Missed It" e-mails, as did activist groups such as the National Right to Life Committee.

"We applaud the work of those researchers who continue to look for ethical stem cell research alternatives that do not require destroying human life, and we call on Congress to support such ethical alternatives," the group's legislative director, Douglas Johnson, said in a statement.

But scientist after scientist said that, attractive as the new findings are, they remain preliminary and unconfirmed. Moreover, the work is eight years behind the progress already made with embryonic cells, which researchers hope to start testing in patients by next year.

Even the scientist who led the amniotic cell study released a letter Tuesday warning against using his work as an excuse to vote against broader stem cell funding.

"I understand that some may be interpreting my research as a substitute for the need to pursue other forms of regenerative medicine therapies, such as those involving embryonic stem cells," Anthony Atala of Wake Forest University School of Medicine wrote in a letter to DeGette and co-sponsor Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.). "I disagree with that assertion. . . . It is essential that National Institute[s] of Health-funded researchers are able to fully pursue embryonic stem cell research."

One strategy being considered by supporters is to add mollifying amendments to the Senate version, Castle said -- an option that was not open to the Senate last year under the arrangement brokered by then-Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Although specific provisions have not been discussed in detail, Castle said senators could add funding for programs that donate unwanted frozen embryos to infertile women, a favorite program of Bush's; require extra ethical oversight for stem cell research; or beef up support for parallel studies of non-embryonic cells.

Procedurally, if a veto does come, supporters would benefit if the Senate first modified the bill. That is because full passage would require a House-Senate conference, and under congressional rules the Senate would then control the bill. That means the first attempt to override the veto would be in the Senate -- where the votes are believed to be within reach -- instead of the House, which was first to vote on an override last year.

The House effort failed and would have a difficult time succeeding this year. But inspired by a Senate override and perhaps appeased by amendments in conference, some members who vote against the bill today could feasibly vote yes after a veto. Even if the override failed there, the bill would have gotten further than last time, aides say.

At that point, several strategies could come into play, including attaching it to a must-pass bill or holding hearings featuring desperate patients, which might embarrass the White House -- all possible because Democrats now chair the relevant committees. Subsequent votes could follow, forcing a string of vetoes.

"There is nothing wrong with this bill," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "We should pass this bill again and again and again and again, until we get a president who will sign it."

Stem Cell Research Bill Resurfaces In Congress (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, January 11, 2007

Congress and the White House begin a political science experiment today as the House prepares to vote on whether to override President Bush's restrictions on federal funding of stem cell research.

In the House, voting will proceed on the Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act of 2007, which is identical to the one that was passed in the House and Senate last year and then vetoed by the president. A Senate version of the bipartisan bill should come up for a vote after committee consideration in coming weeks, says Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, a bill sponsor.

"We want to basically move research forward," said Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del., a co-sponsor of the House bill, at a Tuesday briefing. "We want to help people in medical situations."

On Aug. 9, 2001, Bush limited federal funding of human embryonic stem cell research to cells from colonies, or lines, collected from embryos that were destroyed before that date, calling it a compromise between medical advances and moral concerns raised by the research.

Bush echoed those views in last year's veto of the new bill, which would open federal funding of research to stem cell lines created from excess embryos donated by fertility clinics with their patients' consent.

"The president's policy strikes a balance of supporting funding — federal funding for research into stem cells — while avoiding federal funding that would encourage the destruction of embryos," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Although the House bill is expected to pass easily, the real question is whether it will attract enough votes, two-thirds of the total, to override another veto, says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., a bill co-sponsor. Last year, the bill passed 235-193. A veto-proof majority is more likely in the Senate, Harkin said Tuesday.

"It is just a matter of time before the bill passes," DeGette says. "Even if it will be the next president of the United States who signs it."

Human embryonic stem cells are the precursors to almost every type of tissue formed in the body before birth. Since 1998, when stem cells were first isolated by a team led by James Thomson of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, researchers have seen them as a source of rejection-free transplant organs — if they can be safely grown into specialized cell types — to treat diabetes, Parkinson's syndrome and other ailments.

Opponents of such research, such as Richard Doerflinger of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, decry the destruction of days-old embryos that is needed to generate stem cells, equating it to murder.

The National Institutes of Health spent $609 million in 2006 on stem cell research, most of it on animal stem cells; only $39 million went to human embryonic cells. (In comparison, NIH spent $293 million on asthma and $652 million on Alzheimer's research in 2006.)

Under the Bush policy, fewer than two dozen stem cell lines can be studied using federal money, chiefly in efforts to understand their basic biology. "Exponentially more" embryonic stem cell lines would become available for federal research money if the bill becomes law, says spinal cord repair researcher Aileen Anderson of the Christopher Reeve Foundation Research Consortium.

"Absolutely, the impact of overturning the policy would be significant," says researcher Leonard Zon of the Children's Hospital in Boston, if only in relaxing the necessity that scientists who work on new cell lines raise private funds for their work. Passage of the bill would allow researchers to use at no cost facilities and equipment purchased earlier with NIH money.

In July, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found that a majority, 58%, of Americans disapproved of Bush's veto. Reintroduced last week, the bill is one of the first brought to a vote by the House's new Democratic Party leadership. Many candidates who were newly elected to Congress last year ran on their opposition to Bush's policy.

Conflict Ahead (RC)

President Bush is likely to sign onto the first two big-ticket measures coming out of the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but he and the legislative branch are on a collision course on most other issues of national importance this year.

Given the bipartisan efforts on both a minimum-wage hike and a new lobbying and ethics reform measure, it appears unlikely that Bush will have to use his veto power on either bill. But the same can't be said for myriad other issues that Democrats will tackle this year, notably a $100 billion-plus supplemental Iraq War spending bill, judicial nominations, a stem-cell research measure, and legislation to give Medicare officials the ability to negotiate lower drug prices.

"The fact is, there's a reason the president has only vetoed one bill so far, and that's because the Republican Congress gave him everything he wanted," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "That undoubtedly will change, and he'll have to make tough choices about whether to veto bills."

Likewise, House Democrats conceded that if their efforts to work with Bush fail, "We won't let his opposition on any particular issue stop us from doing what we promised to do," said Stacey Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

And Republicans weren't shy about noting that Bush is likely to pad his record of vetoes.

"That's going to be easy for him to do," said Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.). Still, he noted, "I don't think you'll see Republicans in the Senate rolling over on any piece of legislation just because the president is a backstop."

The White House, however, refused to speculate on the president's future use of the veto.

"It's a little too early to make those predictions right now," said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. "The president will make his veto decisions after the final bills reach his desk."

Still, no one disputes that the highest profile fight will be over the supplemental war spending bill, where Democrats are no doubt poised to use their newfound power to try to make good on their election promises to change the way the war has been run.

One Bush administration official conceded that the White House's biggest concern is what Democrats might try to include in the war supplemental, the request for which Bush is expected to send up in early February.

And the White House has cause to be concerned.

"There will be a significant difference in the way supplementals have been handled in the past," said a senior House Democratic aide, alluding to the Democratic charge that Republicans were a rubber stamp for Bush. "This Democratic Congress will scrub this supplemental. We'll use the power of the purse to affect the policy" in Iraq.

While both Reid and House Democratic leaders essentially have ruled out any attempt to completely stop funding the war, Senate Democratic aides noted that there are many other ways to use the supplemental bill as a vehicle to change the policy on Iraq.

By using report language in the bill, Democrats may be able to highlight their concerns about the war and other issues by requiring periodic reports from the Pentagon on Defense contracting abuses and troop readiness, by mandating that the Bush administration write the costs of the war into its annual budgets, by prohibiting funds for the rendition of terrorism suspects to countries that employ torture in their interrogation methods, or even by demanding that Bush reassign combat troops to support and training missions, to name a few proposals that Democrats have pushed for in the past.

Though Senate Democrats plan a test vote on a nonbinding Iraq resolution as early as next week, much of what Democrats do on Iraq in the supplemental depends on the feedback Members receive from constituents regarding Bush's speech Wednesday on increasing troop levels in Iraq. Plus, Democrats cautioned that whatever they do would have to garner a filibuster-proof majority in the Senate, or 60 votes, and would have to be widely supported by the American people.

"The first thing we have to gauge is the reaction of the American people tonight and tomorrow," Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said Wednesday before the president's speech. He added that anything that would be added to the supplemental would have to enjoy bipartisan support to survive. "We're not in that big a majority. We may have to wait" on looking at sweeping changes to Iraq policy, he said.

In the House, caution also was the name of the game. "It's a bit tricky because it's funding for the troops," said the senior House Democratic aide. Whatever they do "has to be simple, clear cut and compelling," the aide added.

Though the veto power is meaningless when it comes to nominations, another area of contention between the White House and Democrats will come from Bush's judicial nominations. Although Bush decided to drop some of his most controversial picks earlier this week — a move Democrats praised as a sign the White House recognizes the new political realities in the Senate — it is unlikely bipartisanship will prevail for long.

Although none of the nominees at first blush appear to be as controversial as many of Bush's previous selections, there are a few names that jump out on Bush's list that could cause partisan divisions.

Thomas Hardiman, currently a federal district court judge in Pennsylvania, was embroiled in a mini-controversy in 2003 during his confirmation to the district court when, at the urging of former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), he declined to meet with the Allegheny County Bar Association during their review of his nomination. The association subsequently rated Hardiman as "not recommended at this time."

Likewise, Bush's pick for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, Peter Keisler, also is likely to draw partisan fire. A founder of the influential conservative Federalist Society, Keisler was involved in a number of controversial issues while a lawyer in the Reagan White House, ranging from the Iran-Contra scandal to Reagan's handling of the then-unfolding AIDS crisis.

Similarly, Bush's nomination of Norman Randy Smith to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, originally made last year, likely will face significant opposition. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) in May 2006 announced his opposition, noting that Bush had broken "with the long-standing precedent of filling circuit court vacancies with a nominee from the same state as the judge who created the vacancy" in nominating the Idaho native over a California judge.

And while Republicans no longer can use the threat of the "nuclear" option to try to force a compromise on Democrats, GOP leaders have made it clear they will continue to push for floor votes on Bush's nominees. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) in his opening statement of the 110th Congress last week noted Republicans "expect an up-or-down vote" for Bush's picks, a common refrain for much of the judicial wars of the past six years.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and Congressional Republicans also are gearing up for a clash over Democrats' plan to give Medicare officials the power to negotiate lower drug prices for beneficiaries. Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) already has threatened to filibuster, but if the bill makes it out of the Senate, it is likely headed for a veto, Grassley said.

"I don't have any doubt that we have enough [votes] to sustain a veto," Grassley said of the 67-vote hurdle proponents of any vetoed bill would have to overcome. "I don't know if we have the votes to sustain a filibuster, though."

Additionally, Bush already vetoed a bill to federally fund stem-cell research that involves the destruction of donated human embryos last year; another veto of a virtually identical measure would not come as a surprise to many.

Other potential measures that could cause heartburn for, and a veto threat from, the White House are a nascent Democratic attempt to revisit a bill that curtailed habeas corpus rights for terrorism suspects and any measure Democrats may devise to deal with the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program.

Experts Fault House Bill On Medicare Drug Prices (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Democrats are fond of citing the Department of Veterans Affairs as evidence that Medicare officials could squeeze lower prices out of drugmakers if the government merely used its negotiating clout. But that comparison ignores important differences between the two systems, experts say.

Unlike Medicare, VA by law receives an automatic 24 percent discount from the average price that wholesalers pay. Its prices are also low because VA, which prescribes medications for 4.4 million veterans annually, has a relatively narrow formulary, or list of approved drugs. The agency secures big discounts from the manufacturers of a few drugs in each class by promising not to offer competing drugs. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) is prohibited by law from adopting such a list for the year-old Medicare drug benefit, in part because seniors enrolled in what is known as Part D want to have a wide range of drug choices.

The legislation that House Democrats hope to pass tomorrow to require the Bush administration to negotiate drug prices for Medicare would neither permit a formulary nor require an automatic discount. It would simply require the secretary of health and human services to pursue negotiations and report back to Congress in six months.

That is part of the reason that many experts do not expect the measure to deliver significant savings even if it overcomes opposition in Congress and escapes a possible presidential veto.

In fact, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office said yesterday that the House bill would have a "negligible effect" on federal Medicare spending because without a formulary the HHS secretary probably could not obtain better drug prices than those negotiated by the many private insurers who offer Medicare drug plans.

"The federal government can get lower prices, but only if it's willing to exclude a certain number of drugs from the formulary," said Robert Laszewski, a nonpartisan health policy consultant in Washington. "And that's a huge political leap that I would be very surprised if this Congress took. I don't think they are going to give CMS any teeth."

"The VA is really a different animal than Medicare Part D," said Robert B. Helms of the American Enterprise Institute, who was an assistant secretary of health and human services in the Reagan administration.

But Democrats and their allies say that the gulf between drug prices under the VA system and those under Medicare is too large to ignore, and that requiring the government to negotiate prices for Medicare would help narrow the gap significantly.

On average, prices are 58 percent higher in Medicare than in the VA system for the 20 drugs most commonly prescribed for seniors, according to a study released Tuesday by the nonprofit advocacy group Families USA. The lowest price for a year's supply of 20-milligram pills of the cholesterol-lowering drug Lipitor, for instance, was $1,120 in Medicare and $782 in the VA system, the report said.

"These high prices are devastating seniors," said Ron Pollack, the group's executive director.

Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on health, called eliminating the current prohibition on government negotiations a "no-brainer."

"It makes absolutely no sense to say that the administration should not be able to negotiate prices for all these seniors," Pallone said. "There's no way it's not going to save a significant amount of money."

Pallone said Medicare could obtain prices similar to the VA system's even without a formulary. "I have every reason to believe that there is enough persuasion power, with different things that could be implemented by the secretary, that could get down to those levels," he said. He added that Democrats will consider further changes down the road.

Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), lead sponsor of the House bill, discounted the importance of the CBO analysis. "Common sense tells you that negotiating with the purchasing power of 43 million Medicare beneficiaries behind you would result in lower drug prices," he said.

Critics of the VA comparison note that some of VA's costs are buried in overhead. The department employs the doctors and nurses who write the prescriptions, and it operates the mostly mail-order pharmacies through which 76 percent of veterans' prescriptions are distributed. Medicare does not have that kind of infrastructure, and seniors have demonstrated a preference for retail pharmacies, CMS officials say.

CMS officials also note that about a quarter of the 3.8 million Medicare beneficiaries who get VA health-care benefits are also enrolled in Part D, in which the choice of drugs is broader.

"It's apples to oranges," former CMS administrator Mark B. McClellan said of the comparison. "The VA is a closed health-care system relying on mail order and a tighter formulary than Medicare beneficiaries have shown they prefer."

House Set To Vote On Medicare Drug Benefit (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 11, 2007

The debate over legislation amending the Medicare prescription-drug benefit moves to the legislative arena from the campaign trail this week with a vote in the House tomorrow and a Senate hearing today.

So far, congressional Democrats are moving ahead without asking the Bush administration to weigh in, but that hasn't stopped the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) from taking a lead role in pleading the Republican case against Democrats' claims that federal negotiation of drug prices will save money for taxpayers and senior citizens over the deals the private Part D plans are striking with pharmaceutical companies.

The House Democratic leadership may not be allowing its Republican counterpart to offer alternative bills, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) may not have invited any administration officials to this morning's hearings, but the GOP message against the Democratic bill is taking shape in advance of the real battle in the Senate set for later this year.

Current law expressly forbids the government from "interfering" with negotiations between the private plans and the drug companies. The House Democratic bill proposes to strike that language and instead require CMS's parent agency, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), to negotiate with drug makers but also prohibit HHS from excluding any drugs from Part D.

The administration's mounting campaign against the Democratic proposal also is accompanied by a more aggressive defense of Medicare Part D by congressional Republicans, most of whom previously had appeared reluctant to claim credit for the creation of the entitlement program expansion despite high approval ratings from beneficiaries.

CMS claims that the private Part D plans are negotiating discounts with drug makers that are good enough to make federal involvement unnecessary.

CMS and Part D's defenders in Congress note that the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) determined in 2004 that federal price negotiations would be ineffective.

In a letter sent to then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in January 2004, then-CBO Director Douglas Holtz-Eakin wrote, "We estimate that striking that provision would have a negligible effect on federal spending because CBO estimates that substantial savings will be obtained by the private plans and that the Secretary would not be able to negotiate prices that further reduce federal spending to a significant degree."

House Minority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office re-circulated that letter to reporters this week.

But congressional Democrats and their allies contend that CBO's evaluation is wrong, citing the deeper discounts obtained by the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) for former military-service members.

The liberal advocacy group Families USA this week released a study comparing the VA's prices for the 20 drugs most commonly used by senior citizens with those paid by the five largest providers of Part D benefits. According to the Families USA report, "Among those top 20 drugs, the median difference between the lowest Part D plan price and the lowest VA price is 58 percent."

Although the administration consistently has touted Medicare Part D as a success, most congressional Republicans have been slow to embrace the program.

Democrats made Part D, and federal negotiation of drug prices, a central point of their campaigns during the midterm elections and one of their top priorities at the start of the 110th Congress. Nevertheless, few Republican candidates chose to tout the program on the campaign trail.

But with the House bill speeding its way to the floor and the Senate debate looming in the coming months, congressional Republicans are adopting a more aggressive stance.

This morning, members of the House Republican leadership will be joined by conservative rank-and-file lawmakers at a press conference to rail against the Democratic bill, which is set for a vote on Friday. Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) headline the event, which also will feature GOP Reps. Paul Ryan (Wis.), Pete Sessions (Texas), Patrick McHenry (N.C.), Tom Price (Ga.) Michael Burgess (Texas) and Phil Gingrey (Ga.).

In the Senate, Finance Committee ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), one of few authors of the bill that created Part D still in office, has taken on the role of lead attack dog against the Democratic proposals and already has made several floor speeches.

One of Grassley's speeches highlighted the fact that Democratic proposals from the 1990s to create a Medicare drug benefit also included language excluding the government from price negotiations, a talking point also used by House Energy and Commerce Committee ranking member Joe Barton (R-Texas) and other Republicans. Democrats maintain they long ago rejected that position and that these past bills are not relevant to the current debate.

Medicare And The Market (WP)

By Mike Leavitt

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

We all want people with Medicare to get the prescription drugs they need at the lowest possible prices. The issue before Congress this week is how best to do that. Should consumer choice and private-sector competition determine prices -- or should government?

The success of the Medicare prescription drug benefit provides strong evidence that competition among private drug plans has contributed significantly to lowering costs. The average monthly premium has dropped by 42 percent, from an estimated $38 to $22 -- and there is a plan available for less than $20 a month in every state. The net Medicare cost of the drug program has fallen by close to $200 billion since its passage in 2003.

Seniors and people with disabilities like the benefit. Studies consistently show that three-quarters of Medicare beneficiaries are satisfied with their coverage. Individuals like being able to choose the plan that best fits their needs. A single, one-size-fits-all drug plan would have made the choice easier, and Congress did create a standard plan. But fewer than 15 percent of enrollees have selected that standard plan -- opting instead for plans with lower premiums, no deductibles and enhanced coverage.

Despite the success of the benefit, some people believe government can do a better job of lowering prices than a competitive marketplace. Legislation under consideration would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate and set the prices of drugs. In effect, one government official would set more than 4,400 prices for different drugs, making decisions that would be better made by millions of individual consumers.

There is also the danger that government price setting would limit drug choices. Medicare provides access to the broadest array of prescription drugs, including the newest drugs. But price negotiation inevitably results in the withholding of access to some drugs to get manufacturers to lower prices.

The Department of Veterans Affairs, often cited as an example of how government can negotiate prices, operates an excellent program for veterans, but the VA formulary excludes a number of new drugs covered by the Medicare prescription benefit. Even Lipitor, the world's best-selling drug, isn't on the VA formulary. That may be one reason more than a million veterans are also getting drug coverage through Medicare.

Some observers point to the massive buying power of the federal government as the means to exert clout over drug companies, but the federal government has nowhere near the market power of the private sector. Private-sector insurance plans and pharmacy benefit managers, who negotiate prices between drug companies and pharmacies, cover about 241 million people, or 80 percent of the population. Medicare could cover at most 43 million.

The independent Congressional Budget Office has said that government price negotiation would have a "negligible effect on federal spending." And previous experience with Congress and Medicare regulating drug prices has not been reassuring. Medicare Part B, which covers physician services, outpatient hospital care and other services, sets the prices for some medicines -- notably a number of cancer drugs. It has a history of reimbursing at rates substantially greater than prevailing prices. In 2005, Part B drug spending increased by almost 20 percent.

If the federal government begins picking drugs and setting prices for all Medicare beneficiaries, administrative costs would add a new burden to taxpayers. The Department of Health and Human Services would have to hire hundreds of new employees. Legions of lobbyists would follow, each seeking higher Medicare payments for the drug companies they represent. As a Post editorial noted in November, "having the government set drug prices is a sure way of flooding the political system with yet more pharmaceutical lobbyists and campaign spending."

There is a proper role for government in setting standards and monitoring those who provide the benefit. We should ensure that beneficiaries have access to medically necessary treatments. But government should not be in the business of setting drug prices or controlling access to drugs. That is a first step toward the type of government-run health care that the American people have always rejected.

There are many ways the administration and Congress can work together to make health care more affordable and accessible. But undermining the Medicare prescription drug benefit, which has improved the lives and health of millions of seniors and people with disabilities, is not one of them.

Bush Urged To Extend Healthcare Cover (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Senator Edward Kennedy called on the White House to follow the lead of state governors and move to extend healthcare coverage to the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0115306

Mr Kennedy will play a key role as chairman of a congressional committee on health in shaping a debate on broad US healthcare reform that is likely to coalesce around the 2008 presidential elections.

The Democratic party is attempting to devise a politically viable approach to health reform that addresses the high level of anxiety Americans express in polls about economic security and health insurance.

Mr Kennedy said: “Insurance coverage is down. Costs are up. And America is heading to the bottom of the league of major nations in important measures of the quality of care.”

The call for the Bush administration to look to state governments for leadership follows a plan set out by Arnold Schwarzenegger, the Republican governor of California, this week that would extend healthcare to 6.5m uninsured Californians.

Mr Kennedy also cited bipartisan co-operation in his home state of Massachusetts, which is the first state to require all residents to have a health plan.

Under Governor Mitt Romney, a contender for the Republican presidential nomination, the state introduced a mix of subsidies and penalties to make the insurance more affordable and compel people to buy into plans.

The efforts by state governors to reduce the number of uninsured are likely to be the most far-reaching in the next two years, as Congress focuses on addressing existing loopholes by increasing funding to cover poor families and children who fall foul of income rules.

The proposals presented at Senate hearings convened on Wednesday by Mr Kennedy are more likely to inform Democratic policy going into the next election.

Jacob Hacker, a Yale professor, presented a plan that would compel employers to pay into publicly administered health plans or offer staff comparable private plans. That would leave most large employers’ existing plans untouched but would raise payroll taxes by at least 6 per cent for those that did not offer robust coverage. The 32-year-old professor is gaining influence withthe Democratic party and said the plan was designed around existing private and public programmes “to avoid the dismal fate of previous reform campaigns”.

The Bush administration’s budget next month will include its plans to expand means-testing in Medicare.

Sen. Kennedy Seeks Universal Health Plan (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 11, 2007

The federal government should join the state of Massachusetts in enacting universal health coverage, said Sen. Edward Kennedy, the new chairman of the Senate committee with jurisdiction over numerous health issues.

Kennedy's home state is the first to require everyone to have health insurance, just as drivers must have automobile coverage.

Kennedy has his own version of what universal health coverage would look like. He wants to extend Medicare to all. In his first hearing Wednesday as chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, the Massachusetts Democrat called on 10 witnesses from all over the country to talk about how to make health care more affordable.

"Insurance coverage is down. Costs are up. And America is heading to the bottom of the league of major nations in important measures of the quality of care," Kennedy said.

Kennedy emphasized how Democratic legislators in his home state worked last year with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney in crafting universal coverage there. He wants the same spirit of compromise to take hold in Congress.

However, the hearing also showed that finding agreement won't be easy. While all the witnesses agreed that health care is becoming less affordable every year, they often had very different solutions.

For example, the Business Roundtable renewed its calls to change medical liability laws and for the federal government to give consumers more information about the cost and quality of the care they get, two priorities often cited by the Bush administration.

"High health care costs are affecting job creation, and high health care costs are hurting our ability to compete in global markets," said Larry Burton, the roundtable's executive director.

But Andrew Stern, international president of the Service Employees International Union, called for much more dramatic change. He told lawmakers that it's time to recognize that employer-based coverage "is dead." The statement infers a much more active role for the federal government in funding health care.

Karen Davis of the Commonwealth Fund, which conducts health research, told lawmakers to look at Denmark as a model for the U.S. She said that nation's government pays doctors a capped rate for each of their patients, plus additional amounts when they perform a service. Each doctor handles about 1,500 patients, and they can handle walk-ins and same-day appointments. And Denmark residents love their health care system, she said.

Most of the witnesses agreed on two points:

First, Congress should expand funding for a health insurance program that now provides health insurance to about 5 million children. The children live in families that make too much to qualify for Medicaid, but not enough to afford the monthly health insurance premiums offered through the private sector.

Second, Congress should not get in the way of states trying to grow the number of residents who have health insurance.

The state of Massachusetts employs a combination of subsidies and penalties to make insurance more affordable and to force people to buy it. The law requires employers with 11 or more full-time employees to offer health coverage or be subject to a $295 fee for each employee, as well as face being billed for services their uninsured employees get.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger this week proposed a plan that would extend health care to 6.5 million uninsured Californians. Under the proposal, all Californians must have insurance, although the poorest would be subsidized.

Some of the committee's Republicans would like the committee to renew its attention to help for small businesses. They support a plan that would let businesses buy insurance through regional or national trade associations. The insurance would be free of many state mandates. That could make it a cheaper alternative, but would also provide scaled-back coverage in some instances.

"My primary interest is to provide health insurance reform for small businesses and working families, and I believe that 1 million more people will be insured if we enacted the (small business health plans)," said Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo.

Also, Wednesday, the Children's Defense Fund called on Congress to provide health insurance for all children in the U.S. About nine million live in families without insurance. The organization said all children in Medicaid or the State Children's Health Insurance Program should be automatically enrolled in one program that provides all medically necessary care.

Children in families with incomes over 300 percent of poverty could also pay premiums that would allow them to participate.

"A child's chance to survive and thrive should not depend on the lottery of geography," the organization said.

Where '100 Hours' Will Hit The Brakes (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

The three rooms on the third floor of the Capitol, steps away from the Senate floor, have a storied past. They are called the LBJ Suite, because they were the domain of Lyndon B. Johnson, who as majority leader famously installed two wet bars and added a bathroom, from which he conducted meetings and issued directives while taking care of his personal business.

The suite's new occupant is a man as anonymous as Johnson was flamboyant, Richard Durbin, the 62-year-old senior senator from downstate Illinois. In the next two years, however, a great deal of the Democrats' fate depends on Durbin. As assistant majority leader, or whip, it is up to him to figure out how to corral enough votes in the narrowly divided Senate to pass at least some of the flood of bills that the energized House Democratic majority will send over.

Durbin recognizes the magnitude of the challenge. "I just spent two years as minority whip," he recalled in an interview the other day, "where I had 45 Democratic votes. And, as you well know, if you can find 41 votes to block cloture" -- the move to cut off debate -- you can prevent the majority from bringing its bills to an up-or-down vote.

"So my job, time and again, was to find 41 stalwarts out of 45. Now, I look at [Republican Minority Whip] Trent Lott, and he has the same job, but he has 49 Republican senators, so he has a larger pool from which to find his 41."

So as the role of the minority whip has become easier, the role of the majority whip has become harder. While Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada leads the policy debates and handles the public relations, the onus is on Durbin to produce the votes at critical moments.

Having served in both the House and Senate over 24 years, he understands the differences between them. "The Senate is designed to stop things," he said, and that poses a challenge to ambitious Democrats.

Ask Durbin what will happen when the flood of bills -- raising the minimum wage and achieving other Democratic goals -- coming out of the House during the ballyhooed "100 hours" reaches the Senate, he laughs and recalls the words of former House speaker Tom Foley to his colleagues: "Remember, the Republicans are the opposition. The enemy is the Senate."

No doubt, Durbin says, House members and perhaps some of the public will be frustrated because "it's going to take us longer, and it will be done differently."

"They will finish their 100 hours with great pride, and then we will begin 100 days," he said.

As he has gotten to know his flock of new senators, Durbin said he is struck by the diversity of the Democratic caucus. "Jon Tester and Bernie Sanders are two different souls," he said, referring to the freshman senators from Montana and Vermont, the first a nonideological rancher, the second an avowed socialist.

"But there's a lot of commonality on the basics," he said, meaning economic, educational and health-care concerns. "Where we're likely to break down is on the bumper-sticker issues" -- abortion, gay marriage, etc.

Durbin said he thinks "the last election was a sobering experience for many Republicans," and he is hopeful of finding support from the other side on at least some issues.

That is particularly true of the Iraq war, which, Durbin said, "overshadows everything else in this session." In a floor speech last week, Durbin listed the domestic programs that could have been financed with what the Iraq war has cost -- and it was a staggering array. He said at least 45 of the 51 Democrats are supportive of beginning a troop withdrawal.

The final complication for Durbin is the number of presidential candidates within his ranks -- probably at least five. Durbin said he notices that "they watch each other a lot," but he hasn't encountered sabotage related to White House ambitions. As time goes on, and they start spending even more time on the campaign trail, "I worry about absenteeism," he said.

But he credited Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon with a creative solution to that problem. "Ron says we ought to form a designated-driver caucus," Durbin said, "of people who are ready to drive the Senate agenda while their colleagues who are intoxicated with the idea of being president are sitting in the back seat."

Reid Runs Tight Ship, Leaves Byrd Behind (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Just days into his tenure as majority leader, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) received a tongue-lashing from Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) for a decision to end a vote before the senior statesman had cast his "yea" or "nay."

Byrd, who has served in the Senate since 1958 and is a noted stickler for the rules and etiquette that guide the chamber, was unable to make it to the floor in the 15 minutes allotted for a vote yesterday -- his first missed vote since March.

"The leadership arbitrarily closed the vote before I could get to the floor," Byrd told the Associated Press. "That is not the way legislation is done in a body such as ours."

Had he made it to the floor on time, Byrd would have cast the 17,780th vote of his career. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, played down the controversy, insisting that the majority leader has "nothing but the highest regard for Senator Byrd."

Since the 110th Congress was convened last week, Reid has emphasized his intention to run the body more efficiently, a plan that includes limiting votes, which often have lasted a half-hour or more, to just 15 minutes. An e-mail sent Monday to the offices of Democratic senators reiterated the point.

At 89, Byrd is slowed by a neurological condition known as benign essential tremor and uses two canes to get around the Capitol. On Friday, he tripped while on the Senate floor but was quickly pulled to safety by former senator John Glenn (D-Ohio), who is 85.

Byrd's age and physical condition were an undercurrent in his reelection race in November, though Byrd dismissed its import. The voters of West Virginia agreed and elected Byrd to a ninth term with 64 percent of the vote.

Republicans Come Out Swinging (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

House Republicans have chosen leaders who aren't afraid to attack Democrats to serve in key positions for the 110th Congress, suggesting that the civility on Capitol Hill may not last long.

Republicans say they have every intention of fighting tough to regain power.

For example, Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, beginning his second term, was recently named to serve as a member of the deputy Republican whip team, typically made up of more senior lawmakers. Considered one of the party's up-and-comers, the 31-year-old is known for his frequent tongue-lashings aimed at Democrats.

"I will not hesitate to point out their hypocrisy and their unwillingness to live by their own campaign pledges," said Mr. McHenry, the youngest member of Congress. "I'll work to get our conservative ideas enacted into law and stop the bad things the Democrats want to do to our country."

Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri held nothing back when he criticized Democrats for not allowing Republican amendments on their "first 100 hours" agenda. He said the new majority party members were being disingenuous when they promised bipartisan spirit.

"Unfortunately, so far, we don't see much of that partnership," Mr. Blunt said Tuesday. "It's a sort of a check-is-in-the-mail approach to the things the American people have been told and what we've been told."

The Republicans are also quick to note Democrats' use of unfair tactics -- such as not subjecting their opening legislative package to committee hearings -- but did not acknowledge that they used the same strategy for years.

"It's a shame that the agenda they campaigned on so publicly is being put together so secretly," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Republicans say Mr. Putnam, 32, has fire in his belly and a hunger to return to the majority. And they say what Mr. McHenry lacks in age he makes up for in energy and bark.

"We will hold their feet to the fire, just as ours were," Republican Conference Vice Chairman Kay Granger of Texas said of the Democrats. "Patrick will be a good messenger for that."

As one of several deputy whips, Mr. McHenry will aid Mr. Blunt and Chief Deputy Republican Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia in helping to track votes on legislation and pushing minority-party legislation.

As for this week, Republicans have adopted a refrain of complaint, saying the opening hours of the 110th Congress have been unfair and smack of political design.

It was "truly a shame" that Democrats turned the September 11 commission debate into a "partisan political tool," lamented Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida.

Rep. David Dreier of California had some fun as he managed the opposition time on the floor, calling Republicans the "struggling minority."

"I'm loving my role here in the minority, Madame Speaker," he said, later handing the floor to one of his colleagues.

"I yield to the former chairman and future chairman of the committee on appropriations," Mr. Dreier said, hardly able to stifle a laugh as he introduced Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis, a fellow Californian.

Senate-Foiled Dudley Named Bush Adviser (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appointed conservative academic Susan Dudley to an influential new job advising on regulatory policy, at a time the regulatory process could serve as a conduit for the White House to push through any policies opposed by a hostile Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0115310

Her appointment came after Congress blocked her nomination to be the White House's regulatory czar last year. Her position as a senior adviser to the White House's regulatory office will enable her to influence policy decisions, although she won't be able to implement them on her own. She could, for example, push for better scientific justification for new rules.

The apparent end run around Capitol Hill angered liberals who object to her criticism of the federal rule-making process, among other things.

Most recently, Ms. Dudley headed regulatory studies at the Mercatus Institute, a market-oriented research center under George Mason University, which has received funding from large Republican donors.

Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Dudley last summer to run the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, a division of the White House budget office. At her Senate hearing, she got tough questions from Democrats and some Republicans.

The committee didn't vote on her nomination. Mr. Bush has resubmitted her name to the Senate, but she is considered unlikely to be approved. Instead, in her new White House job, she likely will serve some of the same functions as the office director. Environmentalists complained. "The White House is again displaying its contempt for carrying out and enforcing the law to protect the public," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen.

A White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, said Ms. Dudley is "a respected voice who understands that careful research and transparent analysis lead to good regulatory policy. She is exceptionally qualified and will make an outstanding administrator of OIRA."

U.S. Banks Oppose New Capital Rules (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta And Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., and two other large U.S. banks brought concerns about pending international capital standards known as Basel II to White House officials as crucial deadlines for the standards approach.

The Jan. 4 meeting represents the most recent -- and perhaps highest level -- attempt by the group of banks, which include Wachovia Corp. and Washington Mutual Inc., to bring substantive changes to the Basel II capital proposal before next year. The Federal Reserve and other bank regulators are still discussing how to implement the standards by next January.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto confirmed the banks met with National Economic Council staff, but he said NEC Director Allan Hubbard didn't attend. The NEC advises the president on domestic and global economic issues.

"We have an interest in it, obviously, but the Fed and the Treasury have been taking the lead," Mr. Fratto said.

Since last year, the four banks have publicly complained that the U.S. Basel II standards aren't in line with the capital requirements that foreign banks will be using under Basel II. They have said this could put U.S. lenders at a competitive disadvantage.

One concern has been that if foreign banks are able to hold less capital than their U.S. competitors, foreign banks might be able to offer lower prices on things such as multimillion-dollar syndicated loans and other products.

Fewer than 20 of the largest U.S. banks are expected to use the new Basel II standards. More than 8,000 other banking companies are expected to be able to use simplified rules known as Basel IA.

In June, the four banks met with officials from the White House's Office of Management and Budget to discuss their Basel II concerns. They have also met several times with U.S. lawmakers on the issue.

Tape Reveals Defiance (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 11, 2007

A secretly recorded meeting of researchers working for the Department of Veterans Affairs indicates that the department did not take seriously congressional requests intended to safeguard the personal and medical information of veterans.

The recording, obtained by The Hill from a researcher who attended the meeting, sheds light on a behind-the-scenes struggle between lawmakers and Veterans Affairs officials over the handling of veterans' personal information.

"If you want to know what's the real purpose of the data call, read Machiavelli. It's about power, it's about Congress saying, 'VA, you're accountable to us,'" one Veterans Affairs official, Dr. Joseph Francis, says on the tape. "We're not asking people to do an A-plus job on this report."

Questions on the security of the information rose to prominence last May when a Veterans Affairs employee lost to theft a laptop computer containing the personal information of 26.5 million veterans and military personnel. Although authorities eventually recovered the laptop, the incident sounded alarms on Capitol Hill.

Since then, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee has held eight hearings on the department's information technology. The panel also has asked the department repeatedly to report on the security of its information systems, a task that entails providing information about who had access to sensitive information and how it was stored.

The Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee also asked for reports on what sensitive information is accessible to government contractors.

"We've had multiple requests on where they are and what they're doing," a House Veterans' Affairs Committee source said, adding that department officials failed to provide adequate answers when Congress demanded them. "We've asked that for multiple times, who had access to what, and they still could not tell us at the time."

The source said the department has responded to bipartisan congressional requests very slowly. The source predicted that there would be additional hearings in coming weeks.

But Veterans Affairs research officials with access to millions of medical records thought the congressional requests to be unreasonable and simply an exercise in exerting power.

Francis, the deputy chief of research and development at the department, told researchers at a private meeting held last year in Baltimore that Congress would not get what it was looking for.

"We basically told folks that that was impossible and we were told, 'We know that it's impossible but we were told by Congress to do it,'" Francis told subordinates during the Sept. 6 meeting, referring to higher-ups at the department. "I can tell you we will do the best job we can and it will not be everything we're being asked to look for.

"You're not going to be able to look at every question of every issue between now and Sept. 20," he said. "You're not going to be able to look at every study.

"Frankly, we had a lot of discussions, and there's a lot of guidance that could not be put in writing because it would cost people jobs in Washington," he added. "But there's a lot of people who know how unreasonable this request is."

Francis told the researchers to remember the core mission of the department.

"Take care of veterans, take care of their needs," he said, but he did not seem to believe answering fully Congress's security concerns was the best way to do so.

Veterans Affairs spokesman Terry Jemison defended the department in a statement.

"VA takes information security seriously and is fully committed to continue to work closely with Congress to bolster our data protection," he said. "The purported comments of a single employee do not reflect our culture and pledge to improve control, training, responsibility and accountability in all aspects of data security that put custody of veterans' personal information first."

Francis declined to comment.

One of the researchers secretly recorded the talk and shared it to expose what that person believes is lack of concern for veterans' privacy. Francis is the acting deputy chief research and development officer at Veterans Affairs, handling many of the administrative responsibilities of VA's chief research and development officer, who is in charge of all research at the department.

"This shows the cynicism," the whistleblower said. "Here when Congress does step forward to do something good, the agency takes it very casually and cavalierly. It really illustrates that, to the researchers at the VA, the veterans are guinea pigs and are there to promote the research, which is used in turn to promote researchers' careers."

The source claimed that high-level researchers at the department are not sufficiently concerned about the vulnerability of medical information because of financial stakes tied to their research. The source said that many researchers sign lucrative contracts to work for pharmaceutical companies after leaving the department.

Forty percent of all VA research involving human subjects is funded by industry, according to Veterans Health Administration directive 2003-031, dated June 13, 2003. The document also states that when simple chart reviews are excluded, industry funds 80 percent of all research VA conducts on human subjects and that "systematic weaknesses" exist "in the human research protection programs, especially in studies funded by industry."

The president of the Alliance for Human Research Protection, Vera Hassner Sharav, criticized Francis's comments when she was told of them.

"Why is he saying it is impossible?" she said. "It is because they don't want to have anyone looking over their shoulders. What it shows is that they don't really give much of a priority to people's personal privileged information.

"The area of research subjects is always shrouded in secrecy. The secrecy in this arena is to protect the researchers and the sponsors, not the subjects, because when people get hurt they don't want to be held responsible."

The House Veterans' Affairs Committee source said that the department knows its data is vulnerable and that securing it poses a significant challenge.

"They must have 250,000 access points that enter into the VA database system at some point or another," the House source said. "There are 230,000-plus employees, and contractors and residents. They [are] in collaboration with 122 medical schools with which they are affiliated."

The House source said lawmakers have tried to find out how many people connected to VA have the same access to personal information as the employee who lost the infamous laptop in May but that VA still can "not completely" answer that question.

The source said if the department followed proper information accounting practices, "you should be able in an hour to find on a data call who has access to what."

But Francis said in his candid comments that the VA has ignored federal legislation directing executive-branch departments to adopt higher cyber-security standards.

"Congress is actually rather angry at the VA because we've been technically breaking the law for a decade," Francis said. "In 1996 legislation was passed called the Clinger-Cohen Act that really set the timing for all agencies to follow certain types of business principles in IT [information technology] procurement and IT management, including cyber security. We've basically ignored that; many agencies didn't."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Speaker's Lobby (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, January 11, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Wednesday that smoking in the Speaker's Lobby will no longer be permitted.

"The days for smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over," Pelosi said in a press release issued this morning. "I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example. Effective immediately, smoking will no longer be permitted in the Speaker's Lobby."

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), a close ally of Pelosi's, has long been pushing for the smoking ban.

Pelosi said that the dangers of secondhand smoke put the health of "colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby" at risk every day.

At the start of this year, the District of Columbia followed the lead of several other major metropolitan areas by banning smoking in public areas.

The American Lung Association praised Pelosi for eradicating smoking in the Capitol.

"The decision to make the U.S. Capitol, the symbol of our nation's democracy, smoke free is both an important public health victory and a symbolic decision," said John Kirkwood, president and CEO of the American Lung Association. "By making the Speaker's Lobby smoke free, Speaker Pelosi has ended the days of smoke-filled rooms."

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is among many members who regularly smoke in the Speaker's Lobby.

Pelosi Tells Smokers To Butt Out (RC)

By John Mcardle

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115313

While smoke-free advocates celebrated Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) announcement that Members would no longer be allowed to light up in the Speaker's Lobby as of Wednesday morning, those known to enjoy a smoke break during House votes attempted to shrug off just how much they'd be impacted by the new rule.

When asked about Pelosi's new ban, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who is known for having an ever-present cigarette in hand when doing interviews in the ornate room just off the House floor, said, "That's fine. ... No it won't affect me at all."

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), a well-known cigar smoker, said, "It's not a big deal. If it had come to a vote on it I would have voted against it."

And while Pelosi's announcement made national headlines Wednesday morning, Frank said the subject of where he and his fellow smokers will now go to light up "is way too trivial to get into print. ... I have constituents who have much bigger concerns than how I relax."

But Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), co-chairman of the Congressional Task Force on Tobacco and Health, was quick to rush out a press release Wednesday morning applauding Pelosi's smoke-free policy.

"With so many interns, pages, and young staff looking up to Members of Congress it is important that we be held to a higher standard," Meehan wrote. "I look forward to working with Speaker Pelosi and my colleagues to continue to fight against tobacco use and to save thousands of lives, children and adults."

House Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson (Conn.) said he expects the Sergeant-at-Arms office will be charged with enforcement of the ban. Also, Democratic sources explained Wednesday that peer pressure will be a main enforcement mechanism.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), also a co-chairman of the tobacco task force and longtime advocate for ending smoking in the House, said he certainly would say something to a colleague if he saw him or her smoking in the Speaker's Lobby in the future.

"I sure would," Waxman said. "But I think Members would respect the rules. ... I'm pleased this finally happed. It was such an outrage to jeopardize the health" of those who work in the Speaker's Lobby each day.

While Meehan noted that "the next step should be to expand this ban to include the entire Capitol complex," Pelosi's new rule will affect only the indoor portions of the Speaker's Lobby. (By early Wednesday afternoon workers from the Architect of the Capitol's office had taken away the four gold ashtrays that decorated the room and put them into storage, according to AOC officials.)

Pelosi did maintain a smokers' refuge on the balcony that Members have access to from the Speaker's Lobby, although Democratic sources said there are no plans to add any new amenities to the few chairs and ashtray pots that adorn the outside space.

Members still are allowed to determine their own policies on whether to allow smoking in their personal offices, and Pelosi is not expected to alter that long-standing tradition. Also House-side smokers are permitted to light up in two designated public areas; Room B-219 of the Longworth Building, which is located adjacent to the Longworth Food Court; and Room B-112 of the Cannon Building, across the hall from the Cannon Carryout. Both smoking areas are enclosed and equipped with ventilation systems. Smokers who go outside to smoke must stay at least 25 feet away from any public entrances or exits to the buildings.

In making her announcement, Pelosi cited the recently enacted Washington, D.C., smoking ban, which outlawed smoking in bars and restaurants in the city as of Jan. 2.

"I applaud the District for joining the dozens of other major cities, including my home town of San Francisco, in recognizing the need to protect the public from secondhand smoke," she said. "As Members of Congress, we must be held to a higher standard. We can no longer risk the health of colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby each day."

On his way into the Capitol on Wednesday afternoon, former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who controlled the policy of the lobby for the past seven years, didn't have much to say about Pelosi's new nonsmoking rule.

"It's certainly her prerogative to do it," he said. He also pointed out that the decision doesn't really affect him. "I don't smoke."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Lounge Of House (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The days of cutting deals in smoke-filled back rooms in the Capitol are officially over. At least the smoke-filled part, that is.

Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday issued a ban on lighting up in the speaker's lobby, a lounge behind the speaker's rostrum where House members relax between votes, talk to reporters and chat among themselves.

Until Tuesday, the portrait-lined room with its high-backed chairs was often hazy with cigarette and cigar smoke.

"The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over," Pelosi said. "Medical science has unquestionably established the dangerous effects of secondhand smoke."

Pelosi said the ban was effective immediately.

"That's fine," said minority leader and cigarette smoker Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio.

"That's how life is now," said Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Calif., an occasional smoker.

Some members were a little abrupt. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., a cigar aficionado, told reporters asking about the ban to call back "when you have some serious issues you want to talk about," spokesman Steve Adamske said.

Pelosi's decision brings the Capitol closer in step with local laws and a national trend. The District of Columbia banned smoking in workplaces in April and in restaurants and bars as of New Year's Day. Twenty-one states and dozens of cities have banned smoking in workplaces, restaurants and bars.

"We're quite pleased," said Angela Bradbery, co-founder of Smokefree DC, which was behind the recent ban in Washington. "It's about time."

Cynthia Hallett of the California-based Americans for Non-smokers' Rights said, "People in the Capitol deserve the same smoke-free protections as other workers in the District of Columbia. Smoke-free air in the workplace is no longer just a California trend — it is a national expectation."

William Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, urged members of Congress to follow Pelosi's lead by adopting smoke-free policies in their personal offices.

Pelosi's ban only applies to the lounge area behind the House gallery, said Drew Hammill, her spokesman. Hallways and other public areas were already covered by a ban issued in 1993 by then-speaker Tom Foley. Last year, smoking was banned within 25 feet of entrances to the House office buildings. By tradition, personal office policies are set by the members, and Pelosi is not changing that tradition, Hammill said.

"This is the decision she's made for now. There's no timeline for anything else," Hammill said.

Pelosi's reference to "smoke-filled rooms" has symbolic significance when spoken by the first female speaker of the House, said Muriel Fox, a co-founder of the National Organization for Women.

"In the old days, decisions were made undemocratically between small groups of people, all smoking their heads off," Fox said. "It happens that only men had power in those days."

In Nancy Pelosi's House, It's No Ifs, Ands Or Butts (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats took control of Congress aiming to erase perceptions of lawmakers and lobbyists drafting legislation in smoke-filled rooms. Now they are targeting the smoke-filled room itself.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi used her newly won powers to ban smoking in an anteroom off the House floor where lawmakers can relax and talk during floor debate. The so-called Speaker's Lobby was one of the few remaining havens where smokers could indulge their habit. But under the new Democratic Congress, that tradition is over.

DOJ_NMG_0115315

The federal government banned smoking in federal buildings more than a decade ago. In the spring, the District of Columbia outlawed smoking in all workplaces and most indoor public areas. Starting this month, it became illegal to smoke in nearly all bars and restaurants in the nation's capital.

But Congress often exempts itself from the law. Unlike most other employers, members of Congress are exempt from laws governing maternity leave. They may also carry guns on the Capitol grounds, despite a District-wide ban.

In a similar vein, lawmakers were allowed to smoke in certain places on Capitol Hill, primarily in the Speaker's Lobby and in their own offices. The Lobby is an anteroom off the House floor -- behind the podium where the Speaker and the President stand during the State of the Union -- that may be used only by lawmakers, reporters and some congressional staff.

In the lobby, a group of mostly Republicans, led by Minority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, used to lounge in a set of leather chairs and smoke. On Tuesday evening, the night before Ms. Pelosi issued the smoking ban, Rep. Tom Cole (R., Okla.) was among lawmakers who enjoyed a final cigar in the room.

Smokers say they will either step outside to smoke or light up in their offices, where smoking is permitted.

In the Senate, smoking is allowed only in senators' offices. The smell of cigar smoke often hangs in the air outside the Capitol office of Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W. Va.), while visitors can catch Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) sneaking a few puffs outside the building.

The smoking ban, which is effective immediately, is a victory for California Democratic Rep. Henry Waxman's long-running campaign against smoking. Mr. Waxman, the new chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, led the effort to ban smoking in the U.S. Capitol and the House's office buildings. Last year he prodded then-Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois to eliminate the smoking section in one House cafeteria. "The smoke didn't respect the old dividing line," he said.

Democrats had made headway in banishing smoking from Capitol Hill before they lost control of Congress in 1994. Former Democratic Speaker Thomas Foley banned smoking in most of the House side, though not the Speaker's Lobby. But when Republicans took control, tobacco-using leaders reversed course. Even Mr. Waxman's ban on smoking in his health and environment subcommittee was reversed by the panel's new chairman at the time, Rep. Tom Bliley, a pipe-smoker from Virginia.

The new ban didn't please all Democrats, several of whom are cigar-smokers. Rep. Barney Frank, the senior Massachusetts Democrat, said: "I'm not happy about it, but there's nothing I can do about it."

House Bans Smoking, And Few Complain (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — Democrats banned smoking inside the House on Wednesday. Then they quickly congratulated themselves, squeezing as much symbolism out of the moment as they could.

“The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over,” the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, declared.

Whether Democrats are any less inclined to make backroom deals than Republicans, the new majority will be remembered for bringing the rules of the House into line with those in the rest of the District of Columbia, numerous states and corporations, several European countries and all major airlines.

And it did so with surprisingly little outcry from the smoking crowd. “I’m O.K. with it,” Representative Mike Simpson, Republican of Idaho, said as he headed out onto an adjoining balcony for a cigarette between votes.

He did, however, glance nostalgically toward the spot where a large ashtray once stood.

“That was the circle,” Mr. Simpson said, referring to the spot where he and other Republicans once gathered around Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader and a noted chain smoker. “That was where the decisions on the future of the country were made.”

It was also where some of the more geriatric members of the House — including at least one who used an oxygen tank and rode a motorized cart during the last session — came and went during votes. Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California Democrat and a longtime advocate of the ban, said he had received numerous complaints from members about the second-hand smoke, which wafted onto the House floor and into halls.

"Why should people have to quit their jobs to protect their health?" Mr. Waxman asked, beaming as he talked about the ban. "It was long overdue. It took Nancy Pelosi to put this in place."

Lawmakers can still smoke in their individual offices, but they can no longer light up in the ornate hallway outside the House chamber known as the Speaker's Lobby, the spot where lawmakers often gather to talk with each other and with journalists. Most other areas of the Capitol, including the public areas outside the Senate, had already banned smoking.

Now, Mr. Waxman was asked, could he eliminate the phrase "smoke-filled room"?

"I don't have the power to do that," he replied. "I only have the power to investigate clichés."

On a day when Iraq and the minimum wage dominated the news in Congress, few smokers were clamoring to discuss the change. Mr. Boehner — who has been spotted cradling a lit cigarette inside his palm when he darted from the Speaker's Lobby to the House floor for votes — dismissed a question about the ban, saying it was fine. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who often puffed on a cigar in the lounge, refused to comment on it (his aides recommended calling back with a more serious question).

One lawmaker who was spotted heading out to the balcony for a cigarette — and who did not want his name used because he was "not known to be" a smoker — said he was glad to obey the new rules. And then he pointed at a reporter and said, "It's a lot healthier for you."

A Smoking Tradition Snuffed Out By Pelosi (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Some fresh air blew into the Capitol yesterday, after House Speaker Nancy Pelosi banned smoking from the most venerable nicotine haven on the hill -- the Speaker's Lobby outside the entrance to the House floor.

Pelosi, of smoke-free California, is known to detest the tobacco habit. Ever since her ascension as top Democrat with authority over the lobby and most other space in the House, smokers have been bracing for the moment when they'd be ordered to extinguish their butts.

One of the heaviest smokers, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who is partial to Barclays, was resigned to the new reality yesterday. As majority leader in the last Congress, Boehner ignored calls to ban smoking from the Speaker's Lobby. But now, as minority leader, he has little choice but to abide by Pelosi's wishes and told reporters he was fine with the ban.

For generations, the Speaker's Lobby has been the most visible space where smokers gather inside the Capitol. It is an ornate space dotted with fireplaces, leather armchairs and chandeliers. Lawmakers relax there between votes and debates, often meeting with staff members, reporters or the public and huddling in informal groups. Cigarette smokers tended to dominate the daytime hours there; at night, the cigar smokers took over.

Pelosi said she was banning smoking from the area to protect the health of the staff, reporters and public who spend time in the lobby. "Medical science has unquestionably established the dangerous effects of secondhand smoke, including an increased risk of cancer and respiratory diseases. I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example," Pelosi said in a statement. "The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over."

Not quite.

Smoking is still permitted in lawmakers' offices, in two designated smoking rooms in the House office buildings and in a small, concrete room in the Capitol's basement.

And Pelosi's ban took effect a week after the District prohibited smoking from most public spaces, including restaurants and bars.

Yesterday afternoon, two Senate staffers and two Capitol Police officers puffed away inside their basement hideaway, a cramped, room stuck amid maintenance closets and stacks of bottled water. A ceiling-mounted ventilation box drew up their fumes as they ate lunch, smoked Marlboros and worked Sudoku puzzles. "What are you going to do?" one of the staffers shrugged as she considered the dwindling number of places she can smoke. She asked not to be identified, saying it would anger her boss.

Paul Billings of the American Lung Association said that smoking room and others ought to be eliminated, too. "This is a first step, we want to extend smoke-free to all workplaces in the congressional complex," said Billings, whose organization has collected 9,000 signatures on a petition asking Congress to ban all smoking on Capitol Hill.

Pelosi Snuffs Out A House Smokers Haven (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Throughout the U.S. Capitol are reminders of the days when tobacco was king.

Tobacco-leaf designs decorate walls. Brass spittoons adorn the Senate chamber. A portrait of a former House speaker shows him clutching a cigar.

And until Wednesday, ashtrays could be found indoors just steps away from the House chamber.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Wednesday snuffed out smoking in the speaker's lobby, previously one of Washington's most famous smoke-filled rooms. It is an ornate place where lawmakers for decades have puffed away between votes.

No more, Pelosi declared.

"I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example," she said, citing the dangers of secondhand smoke.

Hours after the decree, the ashtrays were gone and nary a whiff of smoke sullied the air.

Smokers, already restricted from lighting up in many places, seemed resigned.

"That's fine," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), a smoker who along with others will now be forced to light up on an outdoor balcony off the speaker's lobby.

"I'll survive," added Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.), another smoker.

Anti-smoking advocates took a deep breath of relief. "It's just great," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles).

Smoking was banned on the House floor in 1871 and in the Senate chamber in 1914. The Senate has no equivalent to the speaker's lobby, so smoking was not permitted anywhere on the Senate side of the Capitol — though Congress members are allowed to smoke in their offices.

The policy comes about a week after a smoking ban on bars and nightclubs went into effect in Washington, making virtually every workplace in the city smoke-free — except those controlled by Congress.

John Kirkwood, president and chief executive of the American Lung Assn., praised Pelosi's decision, saying it demonstrated to the nation that "Congress is playing by the same set of rules as everyone else."

Bernanke Set To Speak Before Budget Committee (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's efforts to stay out of politically charged fiscal questions will be tested next week as he makes his inaugural appearance before a congressional budget committee.

Mr. Bernanke is to testify on the fiscal and economic outlook before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday, Jan. 18. Committee officials confirmed the appearance Wednesday. President George W. Bush releases his budget on Feb. 5.

Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, frequently testified and commented on budget policy, often generating great controversy, in particular for endorsing Mr. Bush's tax cuts at the Senate Budget Committee in January 2001. Mr. Bernanke, who took office in February last year, has said he does not want to comment on specific tax and spending proposals, saying those are the purview of Congress and the administration.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.), who confirmed Mr. Bernanke's appearance, said the Fed chief "doesn't want to get into this specific spending program, this specific revenue program. I think he thinks that's not his purpose."

Mr. Conrad, an outspoken critic of Mr. Bush's fiscal policies, added, "It's entirely reasonable for him to talk about effects on the economy [of] deficits and growing debt, to give us an economic outlook -- that's entirely appropriate."

Mr. Bernanke has shown he's willing to talk in broad terms about fiscal issues. In previous speeches and testimony, he has talked about the need to address a projected surge in spending on Medicare and Social Security as the population ages.

A Sweet Deal For 'Official' Felons (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

James A. Traficant Jr., the former Democratic congressman convicted of racketeering and taking bribes, is wiling away prison time painting colorful pictures but also able to collect a congressional pension of nearly $40,000 a year.

He is one of about 20 former senators and congressmen with felony rap sheets who can receive the taxpayer-financed benefit.

"They have lost their cases, lost all their appeals and still collect the check," said Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, an Illinois Republican who introduced a bill that would stop future congressional felons from pocketing retirement pay.

"Millions of taxpayer dollars have gone to felons," Mr. Kirk said.

A similar measure is being offered by Democratic Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and John Kerry of Massachusetts in an amendment to that chamber's ethics reform bill, which is expected to go to a vote tomorrow.

Other recent convicts include former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican convicted of graft and imprisoned last year, and former Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican convicted last year of corruption charges tied to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Cunningham is eligible for about $36,000 a year, while Ney is in line for a $29,000 annual pension, according to estimates from the National Taxpayers Union (NTU). Other estimates, from groups such as the Congressional Research Service, vary slightly.

Former Rep. Daniel Rostenkowski, an Illinois Democrat convicted in 1996 of mail fraud related to the House post office scandal and pardoned by President Clinton in 2001, this year will collect an estimated $125,000 congressional pension, according to NTU estimates.

Ney and Mr. Rostenkowski could not be reached for comment.

Prison officials said Traficant could not be contacted by telephone at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., a prison that provides mental- health services; nor could Cunningham at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, a temporary prison for inmates awaiting placement in the federal penal system.

Currently, only a conviction for treason or espionage results in a forfeiture of the pension.

The average congressional pension is estimated at $50,000 a year.

"The only thing crazier than giving a member of Congress convicted of a crime a federal pension is the fact that we still need a bill to prevent a convict from receiving their pension," Mr. Salazar said. "Any member of Congress who abuses their position of authority for their personal profit deserves a prison sentence, not a government pension."

Bills that would withhold the pensions from members of Congress convicted of major crimes have been introduced in the past and failed. They usually die in the Senate.

"They always worry that somehow they will get caught and lose their pensions," Mr. Kirk said of the senators. "They have always killed this common-sense reform."

The measure's supporters say they are optimistic this time because of the strong push for ethics reforms this session -- a response to voter anger at Washington corruption that is credited in part for Democratic gains in last year's midterm elections.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, promised "serious consideration" of the proposal.

Still, the effort is encountering the usual skepticism among seasoned lawmakers in both chambers and on both sides of the aisle.

"I understand the image," Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said of the pension payments. "I think the concept is achievable, but we had better be careful about it."

"It is easy to pontificate and take this great ethical stand, but then you have to ask yourself, 'Well, what about this senator's or this congressman's innocent spouse who still has to live? What about the money that was actually paid into the retirement system?' "

DOJ_NMG_0115319

The specter of punishing "innocent spouses" also was raised by Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

"I would think the type of offense committed should have some weight, especially for someone who violates the public trust," he said. "We shouldn't have any different standard than any other part of government."

Honoring Jamestown's Intrepid (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

JAMESTOWN, Va., Jan. 10 -- Danny Schmidt stood in the big hole and talked fast, peeling away the centuries with words just as he and other archaeologists have been doing with shovels and wheelbarrows for the past few years.

Around the rim of the hole stood some of the most powerful people in Virginia, peering down at the curious scars gouged into the hard-packed earth some 400 years ago, uncharacteristically quiet for an assembly of legislators.

This was the place where it all began, the site of the first permanent English-speaking settlement in North America, the point of contact between African, European and Native American cultures.

Wednesday was the highest-profile event so far in a series that began last year to commemorate the settlement of Jamestown. To mark the 400th anniversary, Vice President Cheney addressed members of the General Assembly inside the cramped Memorial Church that was built in 1907, and legislators toured the grounds of the settlement where representative democracy would take hold. The festivities will culminate in a three-day celebration this May and a visit by Queen Elizabeth II.

Inside the hole, Schmidt explained, was one of the shallow pits -- not much bigger than a foxhole and cut like a square -- that probably served as an English colonist's original shelter after the settlers made landfall in May 1607.

And over there were the cobblestone remains of the foundation of the governor's house and the shaft of a well that ran dry.

And way over there, where the James River offered the closest thing to silver that any of the adventurers would ever find in that malarial swamp, were the excavated graves of the first 22 Europeans to die.

One had been a boy, maybe 14, who had been struck in the thigh by an Indian's arrow, said Schmidt, a staff archaeologist with the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, a nonprofit organization digging at the site of the original fort since 1994.

"Oh my God," Del. Albert C. Eisenberg (D-Arlington) blurted out as Schmidt talked of the death toll. "Remember, they all came here to get rich."

A major theme of yesterday's event was that Virginia's key role in the creation of American democracy has sometimes been overshadowed by New England's. A whoop went up when Cheney noted that the Jamestown colonists had already convened a representative assembly by the time the Pilgrims arrived on the Mayflower.

Another theme, also touched on by Cheney, was that the Europeans' many glowing achievements had been accompanied by more unpleasant realities, such as the enslavement of African Americans and the destruction of Native Americans.

Delegates tramped the grounds on a brisk and gusty day under a bright blue sky, more than a few embarrassed that they had never visited before. And many, like Del. William H. Fralin Jr. (R-Roanoke), felt uplifted and somewhat diminished at the same time by their predecessors' achievements.

"I'd like to think we'd be as hardy and faithful and trusting to fate as these settlers were," Fralin said. "But the reality is, they were a separate breed."

Fralin paused to send a squirt of tobacco juice downwind, mindful that the pinch of Skoal in his lip could be traced, in a way, to the cash crop that rescued the struggling colony. Then he continued, thinking about what it must have been like for the voyagers to leave their homes in England to cross the Atlantic to the New World.

"For most of these guys -- and women -- when they stepped on that ship and saw the land of civilization pass away, they most likely knew they were not going to see that civilization again. That takes a lot of faith and courage," he said.

That was also on the minds of a few tourists who strolled the museum and living history reenactments at the nearby Jamestown Settlement before the security cordons and delegates took over.

"We're so used to our conveniences now," said Lonnie Spielman, 50, an electrician who lives in Hagerstown, Md., and was spending a week in a timeshare with his wife, Debra, 50, an office manager.

"If the electricity goes out for three hours, or we don't have a hot shower for a day, we're inconvenienced," he said.

Cheney Opens Legislature At Jamestown (WT/AP)

By Dena Potter And Bob Lewis

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

JAMESTOWN, Va. -- It was fitting for Virginia to begin its 2007 legislative session at the place where representative democracy in America was born, Vice President Dick Cheney told legislators yesterday.

In a speech that stressed themes of religious faith, sacrifice and personal courage, Mr. Cheney helped open the Virginia General Assembly's winter session at the site where the first English settlement in North America was established 400 years ago.

"It's striking to realize how much of America's story begins with a little three-sided fort raised on the banks of the James River four centuries ago," Mr. Cheney told legislators who packed into the historic Jamestown Memorial Church.

The first meeting of Virginia's legislative body in nearly 350 years at Jamestown was held to mark the start of the anniversary year. The highlight of the commemoration is a scheduled visit in May by Queen Elizabeth II -- retracing the steps she made to Jamestown in 1957 when she visited the site on its 350th anniversary.

Although the first meeting of the House of Burgesses wasn't until 12 years after the settlers landed in May 1607, Mr. Cheney recognized Jamestown's contributions to America.

"Indeed, so much of what defines our country -- its language, legal traditions and institutions -- have roots in the community that rose in this corner of Virginia," Mr. Cheney said.

The Republican vice president entered to cheers by Republican legislators and polite applause from Democrats. His 10½-minute speech, however, was devoid of partisan tinge and often lyrical.

Mr. Cheney's best line came when he said, "The history of our country did not begin on Cape Cod in 1620," and Democrats and Republicans alike cheered the comment. Toward the rear of the chapel, Republican Delegates Chris B. Saxman of Augusta and William H. Fralin Jr. of Roanoke stood and shouted their approval.

During the speech, Mr. Cheney read from a dispatch written by a Jamestown colonist in 1610, after starvation, disease and attacks from Indians during a bitter winter killed nearly three-quarters of the settlers.

"It read, and I quote: 'Be not dismayed at all. Let England know our willingness, for our work is good, and we hope to plant a nation where none before has stood,' " Mr. Cheney said.

"Even across the centuries, it is admirable and inspiring that such hopeful words could be written in the year 1610 amid difficulties that our generation can scarcely imagine. And it's a reminder that no matter how important deeds may be, things of the spirit are first," he said.

As he spoke, a chill wind fanned whitecaps across a milewide stretch of the James River a few feet from the reconstructed log palisades of the original three-sided Jamestown Fort and the rustic brick church.

The session opened with a prayer from Steven R. Adkins, chief of the Chickahominy Indian tribe. It was his ancestors who greeted the first settlers.

He opened the prayer in his native tongue, saying, "Great Spirit, the loving Father of all nations."

The session closed with a prayer by the Rev. Jay Timothy Harrison Sr., a black Baptist pastor. The first Africans brought to America came as servants to Jamestown in 1619, beginning a 250-year legacy of slavery in the state.

The opening-day events -- held about 50 miles southeast of the Capitol in Richmond -- drew bipartisan praise.

Delegate Mamye E. BaCote, Newport News Democrat, said she enjoyed Mr. Cheney's speech and being able to take the time to see where America's form of government began.

"It kicked off the beginning of representative government in America, and it has evolved," Mrs. BaCote said. "This is what we preach when we go out to other countries."

Delegate Phillip A. Hamilton, Newport News Republican, said that he was humbled to be a part of what he called a historic event and that Mr. Cheney was right to recall the horror and privations the original settlers endured.

"It's a great boost to Virginia, and it does reaffirm the role of Virginia in the history of this nation," Mr. Hamilton said.

$200-a-Head Dinner Doesn't Pass Taste Test (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

While the Senate began debating stricter ethics rules for its members this week, a fancy dinner planned for some Senate press secretaries tomorrow night in New York, paid for with corporate money, has raised a few eyebrows.

Two dozen flacks will arrive in Manhattan today for an annual excursion to meet with media outlets, a trip sanctioned by the Senate ethics committee as "official" business. This means that the aides pay for costs out of pocket -- Amtrak, W Hotel, chartered bus -- and later request reimbursement from official funds. The itinerary shows the members of the bipartisan Senate Press Secretaries Association with a full schedule of meetings with such organizations as the Wall Street Journal, CBS, NBC, the United Nations and others connected to their work.

But the "gasp" factor, as one corporate executive put it, centers on the $200-a-head closing dinner at the elite Rainbow Room, one of the country's best-known upscale restaurants, sponsored by seven high-profile corporations with business interests before Congress. They include the American Gas Association, Toyota, the Recording Industry Association of America and Microsoft. Because rules limit to $50 what an aide can accept for a meal, and because fried calamari alone costs $35 at the Rockefeller Plaza establishment, one might ask how these folks can justify accepting an invitation to the dinner.

Here's how: Their letter from the ethics committee explains that under the rules, they may accept a free meal if it is at a "widely attended event" -- at least 25 people from outside Congress. This rule, as it turns out, is a real boon to these sponsoring corporations that have each been asked by Dittus Communications, the organizer, to bring five guests to the dinner.

John Reid, president of the Press Secretaries Association and former spokesman for defeated senator George Allen (R-Va.), said the group was meticulous in its commitment to staying within the letter of the law.

But one lobbyist who is not attending the dinner noted that "given the [political] atmosphere right now, appearances matter. . . . Everyone is being very careful about this type of stuff."

As far as the ethics watchdogs are concerned, the dinner doesn't pass the smell test. "This is a kind of access and influence buying that concerns us," said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause. "Why are these companies doing this? The only answer is for goodwill. They want to be remembered, they want to influence these communicators. Everyone knows press secretaries are very influential."Kerry Stepping Up?

As Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) waits patiently for his Senate colleague John Kerry to get off the fence and reveal his presidential intentions, the 2004 Democratic standard-bearer is adding high-profile operatives who could easily slide into campaign mode. Kerry has brought on as a consultant Erik Smith, onetime communications strategist for former congressman Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.), and Vince Morris, most recently the spokesman for former D.C. mayor Anthony Williams, as his Senate press secretary.

Kennedy said that he would support Kerry in 2008 if he makes another presidential run but that he can't wait forever for his decision. No clue where Kennedy would turn should Kerry not run -- but his best pal is Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), who has ambitions of his own.The Limits of Power

Sources say that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has told the Democratic committee chairmen who were angered by the six-year term limits imposed upon them last week that she would consider revisiting the issue -- but only if they muster the votes to abolish the rule. This raises the question: What ambitious legislator hoping to rise to chairman before being moved into a nursing home is going to oppose term limits? Among those who are sore after having waited 12 years for their turn at the helm: Appropriations Chairman David Obey (Wis.), Oversight and Government Reform Chairman Henry Waxman (Calif.), and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (Mich.).A Very Safe Landing

It can never be said that Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), whose ties to lobbyists cost him his Senate seat last November, is inconsistent. He'll be joining Gage, a Washington lobbying firm that was founded by his former aide, Leo Giacometto. While most Beltway insiders will recall the more than $150,000 that Burns accepted from now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients, Burns was also excoriated for the tens of millions of dollars in earmarks he steered to Giacometto's clients, which sparked an audit by the Montana legislature. Now, rather than asking Burns for official earmark favors, Giacometto will get to boss around his old boss. Under Senate rules, Burns, hired as a senior adviser, will have to wait one year before he can directly lobby his former colleagues.Final Note

We heard a number of complaints last week because we used the word "catfight" to describe a disagreement between two distinguished members of Congress -- Pelosi and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.). To those who civilly articulated reasons why the term is inappropriate, we say: Point taken.

Trade Deficit Drops For Third Consecutive Month (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

American companies sold more goods like airplanes, cars and precious metals overseas in November, helping to narrow the trade deficit for a third consecutive month.

Despite the improvement, the United States is still on track to end 2006 with a record trade imbalance, eclipsing the $716.7 billion deficit in 2005.

The Census Bureau reported yesterday that the trade deficit — the amount by which the value of America's imports of goods and services exceeded the value of its exports — fell to $58.2 billion in November, the smallest it has been since July 2005. In October, the deficit was $58.8 billion.

Yesterday's figures surprised many economists, most of whom expected the deficit to widen. Through November, the cumulative deficit for 2006 was $701.6 billion, well within reach of the previous record.

But some economists expect the trade outlook to improve this year as a weaker dollar combined with a slower domestic economy and stronger growth overseas help narrow the disparity between imports and exports.

"The factors that are causing the improvement are really in the case of exports and the strengths of the economies abroad," said Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with the Bank of America. "Japan continues to grow moderately, and emerging Asia is growing at a good clip, led by China. Then Europe also continues to at least outperform expectations. When you put all of that together, that's a boost to U.S. exports."

In November, exports grew to $124.8 billion, from $123.7 billion in October. The increase was fairly broad-based. Exports of consumer goods like jewelry and sporting goods rose, as did exports of heavy duty goods like parts for commercial aircraft.

At the same time, imports are slowing. American businesses imported $183 billion worth of goods and services in November, up $500 million from October. That brought the three-month moving average for imports down to $184.3 billion, the lowest level since June.

The gap narrowed in November in part because Americans bought fewer goods from China, one of the nation's main trading partners. The net deficit with China fell to $22.9 billion in November, down from $24.4 billion in October. Also, the trade gap shrank because of the third monthly decline in petroleum imports, a factor that economists expect to help improve the trade gap this year if oil prices continue falling.

The Chinese government reported its full-year trade figures yesterday as well, posting a record surplus of $177.5 billion with the world as a whole in 2006. China's exports, and its surplus, continue to grow rapidly; the 2006 surplus was 75 percent greater than 2005's. Imbalanced trade with China has become an issue straining relations with the United States.

Top American officials, including the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., and the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, traveled to China last month to press for a shift in the country's trade and currency policies. China accounts for a larger portion of the deficit than any other country.

A reason that Washington says that trade with China remains one-sided is the exchange rate. China keeps its currency, the yuan, loosely pegged to the dollar and the euro at a level that many economists say is undervalued, making its exports affordable and imported goods more expensive.

But economists expect Chinese imports to have less appeal in the United States as a slowing housing market damps consumer appetites.

"I imagine as U.S. domestic demand growth slows," said Paul Ashworth, senior United States economist with Capital Economics, "the wider trade deficit with China will probably continue to grow, but probably at a slower pace."

Also yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that inventories at American wholesalers accumulated in November at the fastest pace in three months, a sign that imports could slow further.

Surplus Widens in Canada

OTTAWA, Jan. 10 (Bloomberg News) — Canada's trade surplus widened more than expected in November to the largest since March, as exports of cars and energy products rebounded.

The surplus widened to 4.67 billion Canadian dollars ($3.97 billion), from a revised 3.76 billion Canadian dollars in October, Statistics Canada said. Exports rose 2.8 percent, to 38.1 billion Canadian dollars ($32.4 billion).

Surging Exports Brighten Trade Picture (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

For more than a decade, the rapidly widening trade deficit acted as a drag on U.S. economic growth. But surging exports are reversing that trend, buoying the economy at a critical time and starting to pare back the bloated deficit.

The U.S. deficit in trade in goods and services fell 1% in November to $58.23 billion, the third straight monthly decline and the lowest level in more than a year, the Commerce Department said yesterday. Even so, the overall trade gap for 2006 remained on track to hit an annual record. Underscoring the long-term challenges posed by global trade imbalances, China yesterday said its already-huge trade surplus expanded sharply in 2006.

Economists React: See what some economists are saying1 about the data, and what their outlook is for trade and gross domestic product. • Wholesale Inventories Rise2

In the near term, the U.S. trade picture is brightening. The Commerce Department said imports rose only slightly in November to $183 billion, pushed up by holiday demand for foreign-made consumer goods, such as stereos, toys, and apparel. Meanwhile, American exports rose by $1.1 billion to a record $124.76 billion, thanks to increased shipments abroad of semiconductors, civilian aircraft, telecommunications equipment and other U.S.-made capital goods. Overall, the growth of U.S. exports outpaced that of imports in the month.

The data suggest trade has emerged as an important cushion for the economy, as it adjusts to a sizable contraction in housing activity. Trade has for years been a drag on U.S. growth, as weak economic growth abroad, strong consumption at home and a strong dollar held back the nation's exports and boosted imports.

That trend has begun to shift in the past year, as world growth has stayed strong, U.S. consumers and businesses have pulled back a bit, and the dollar's weakness begins to alter the flow of trade by making U.S. exports cheaper abroad and imported goods more expensive for Americans.

David Greenlaw, an economist at Morgan Stanley, estimated the economy expanded at a 2.8% annual rate in the fourth quarter and that a narrower trade deficit contributed 1.5 percentage points of that. He expects trade to contribute to growth in 2007, which would be the first year that has happened since 1995. "With each month of data, it's more and more suggestive that the tide has turned," he said.

In the past, U.S. companies and workers didn't get the full benefit of buoyant consumer spending, because so much of what consumers bought came from abroad. Conversely, the shrinking trade deficit now suggests the burden of cooling of U.S. demand will be borne in part by foreign suppliers -- lessening the impact on domestic businesses.

"It's a mirror image of prior years," said economist Stephen Stanley of RBS Greenwich Capital.

This year's brighter outlook comes against the backdrop of a dim performance overall in 2006. Through November, the trade gap was on pace to break the annual record of $716.73 billion set in 2005, and much of the weakness is due to imbalanced trade with China. The U.S. reported a $22.92 billion trade deficit with China in November, by far its largest with any country. The November gap pushed the year-to-date deficit with China to $213.55 billion, compared with 2005's full-year record of $201.62 billion, according to the Commerce Department.

The U.S. deficit with China for all of 2006 is expected to hit a record of at least $230 billion, heightening bilateral trade tensions. Last month, a delegation of U.S. officials led by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson visited China to discuss the trade imbalance and other economic issues.

China yesterday reported a record trade surplus of $177.47 billion for 2006, up 74% from $101.88 billion in 2005, according to the official Xinhua news agency. China exported $969.08 billion of goods last year and imported $791.61 billion. (U.S. and Chinese estimates of trade don't match because of different methods of accounting for the ebb and flow of goods between the two countries.)

China's huge trade surplus has become a sore point with businesses and workers in other countries that have been displaced by the Chinese-export juggernaut, particularly in the U.S., China's biggest export market and a source for relatively few of its imports. But increasingly, China's surplus also is causing headaches at home and putting pressure on policy makers to respond.

The surpluses are flooding China's banking system with cash, leading to many undesirable effects: rising inflation, bubbles in stock and property markets, and questionable investments by corporations. Chinese policy makers are trying to find a way to contain those effects without harming the broader economy.

Chinese central-bank Gov. Zhou Xiaochuan, speaking this week in Basel, Switzerland, said China can further increase the flexibility of its exchange rate if trade surpluses continue.

The past two years of massive Chinese surpluses differ markedly from previous years. In the past two decades, China's trade balance typically ranged from about 1% to 3% of the economy. The trade surplus for 2006 is close to 7% of the forecast GDP for the year, up from 4.5% in 2005.

Home Prices Seen Rising In '07 (WSJ)

By Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

U.S. home sales will decline less sharply this year than they did last year, while home-price appreciation is expected to gain steam, the National Association of Realtors said.

In its latest forecast, the NAR said sales of existing homes are likely to decline about 1.2% this year to 6.42 million, following a sharp drop last year, while sales of new homes are seen falling about 9.7% to 957,000.

Because the market is starting this year at a relatively low point, even a gradual recovery of sales during the year would mean that annual totals for 2007 are likely to show no substantial improvement, according to NAR Chief Economist David Lereah.

"The good news is that the steady improvement in sales will support price appreciation moving forward," Mr. Lereah says.

The Realtors' group, which is running a $40 million ad campaign designed to encourage consumers to contact their local realtors, expects moderate price increases this year. The group forecasts the median sales price for existing homes to grow 1.5% nationally to $225,300, following last year's estimated 1.1% rise. The national median price for new homes will increase 3% this year to $248,900, according to the NAR, after estimated growth of 0.3% last year.

As builders rein in new projects to support prices, housing starts are expected to drop 16.6% this year to 1.51 million, their lowest level in a decade, the NAR said.

Mortgage Bankers Association chief economist Doug Duncan expects home prices to rise 1% to 2% annually for the next couple of years. But some markets could see price declines of 10% to 20% this year, he says, a shift from the last four to five years, when there were "almost no markets where prices were declining."

Home sales will decline 7% to 8% this year, with most of the decline in the first half, adds Mr. Duncan, who expects the market to bottom out in mid- to late 2007.

Meanwhile, the volume of mortgage applications filed with major U.S. banks rose 16.6% on a seasonally adjusted basis last week, compared with the week before, the MBA reported yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0115325

The number of applications -- for both purchases and refinancings -- increased 12%, compared with the same period a year earlier. Application volumes, on a seasonally adjusted basis, fell about 14% just before the holidays.

Applications for loans to buy homes stood at the highest level in nearly a year, according to the MBA. Applications to refinance rose about 28% from a year ago.

The average rate for a 30-year fixed-rate loan fell to 6.13% from 6.22% the previous week, which was the highest rate seen in eight weeks. The average rate for a 15-year fixed-rate mortgage dropped to 5.85% from 5.93% the previous week. The rate for a one-year adjustable-rate mortgage, or ARM, averaged 5.79%, down from 5.84% the previous week, the MBA's data showed.

Why Economists Are Still Grasping For Cure To Global Poverty (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

With intellectual humility, Mr. Johnson, a professor at Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management, faced a roomful of peers at the annual meeting of the American Economics Association last weekend and said, "Public health had the germ theory of disease. Economics has made great progress, but it's still waiting for its 'germ theory of disease.'" That probably overstates the challenges remaining to public-health warriors -- avian flu, AIDS/HIV, malaria and all -- but not the shortcomings of economic understanding of what poor countries should do to achieve sustained growth.

The U.S. and Europe pulled ahead of the rest of the world in the 19th century, the result of the Industrial Revolution, the evolution of financial markets and the discovery of new drugs and chemicals. With a few remarkable exceptions -- South Korea, for one -- the gap between rich and poor nations persists. The notion that there was something special about "development economics" dates to post-World War II years when mostly poor, mostly rural colonies gained their independence. Says Anne Krueger, an economist who recently finished a stint as No. 2 at the International Monetary Fund: "It was natural that a major objective of...the 'modernizing elite' was to achieve economies and living standards similar to those in the 'developed,' as they were then called, economies." Poor countries had rice patties or coffee plantations; rich ones had factories. The trick, it was believed, was to hasten the industrialization of poor countries, and government had to lead the way.

The prescriptions didn't work out as well as optimistic postwar poverty fighters hoped. Poor countries have had growth spurts punctuated by crises. Rich countries have crises, too, but they bounce back much more quickly, while poor countries often stagnate for years after a crisis, observes Sebastian Edwards, an economist at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Why is that? Why aren't more poor countries catching up faster?

One view, articulated by Ms. Krueger, is that so-called Third World governments and their First World advisers applied sound economic principles incorrectly or without sufficient attention to the reality. Policies to encourage exports and shield embryonic industries from imports until they got rolling sounded good, for instance, but bred corruption, infantilized industries and created politically powerful vested interests that blocked needed change.

Another view is that poor countries got bad advice and paid the price, but that today's experts know much more than their predecessors. "We don't have recipes, or a checklist," Mr. Edwards says. But, he says, we do know the ingredients: educating workers, accumulating capital and investing it widely, improving productivity. Even he concedes economists are better at dissecting success stories -- China, for one -- and identifying particular reasons for each one's success than generalizing to advise struggling countries what steps to take to boost living standards for the masses.

A third view is that earlier economists focused on the wrong thing. Mr. Johnson, among others, argues that what really matters is having solid political, legal and economic institutions -- courts, central banks, honest bureaucrats, private-property rights -- that allow entrepreneurs to flourish. Imposing what seem to be sound economic policies on corrupt, incompetent or myopic governments is doomed. Building strong institutions is a necessary prerequisite. In this camp, there is a running side argument about which comes first: the institutions or the educated people who create them. Was the Constitution key to U.S. success, or was it Jefferson, Madison and Hamilton?

Technological advances and the spread of markets likely will boost the overall income of the world significantly over the next 25 to 50 years. "But," Mr. Johnson warns, "at least half the world's population will likely not participate fully" -- unless his crowd finds better ways to spread prosperity along with better health to poor countries.

Justices Express Support For Limiting Use Of Union Fees (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to uphold a Washington state law that restricts when unions can use fees collected from non-members for political purposes.

The dispute is being watched closely by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation and other anti-union groups, as well as the AFL-CIO.

The case revolves around the Washington Education Association, which bargains for the state's 70,000 teachers. About 3,500 of the teachers have refused to join the union. They are required by state law to pay "agency shop" fees to cover their share of the union's bargaining on behalf of all workers.

Under state law, the fees unions get from a non-member cannot be used for political advocacy — such as the union's lobbying the state Legislature for more school funds — unless that person consents to having his fees used for such purposes.

The teachers union opposes the policy on non-members' fees, saying it is an administrative burden that restricts the union's right to engage in political advocacy. The state's highest court agreed last year. It struck down the law as a violation of the union's speech rights.

Wednesday, many of the justices' queries focused on the rights of teachers who are not in the union.

Most of the high court, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy, David Souter and Samuel Alito, expressed some support for the law limiting how non-member fees are used. "It seems to me that Washington acted quite properly in saying we will use this to protect our workers' First Amendment … rights," Kennedy said.

Washington state Attorney General Robert McKenna said the law "serves the state's interest in election integrity" by ensuring that union political activity is funded voluntarily.

John West, representing the teachers union, countered that the law wrongly assumed that non-members would not back the union's lobbying.

Alito responded, "These are teachers who have chosen not to join the (union). Isn't it overwhelmingly likely that they, if you spoke to them and said, 'Would you like to give money to the union to spend on elections,' would say no?"

West said the union believes teachers support its political efforts, including those aimed at increasing teachers' cost-of-living raises and reducing class sizes.

Court Unlikely To Grant 1st Amendment Rights To Union Political Activity (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to reject claims that the First Amendment prohibits Washington state from forcing unions to get permission before spending some of the money they collect on political causes.

Most oral arguments at the high court end ambiguously, with the justices leaving small hints about how they'll resolve tricky legal dilemmas.

But once in a while, there are arguments where the only lingering question seems to be who'll write an opinion that reaches an obvious conclusion.

Wednesday's arguments, in Davenport v. Washington Education Association and Washington v. Washington Education Association, fell into that category.

At issue is how the state's largest teachers union handles the so-called agency fees it collects from school employees who choose not to be union members.

Those fees, under state law, are paid to cover collective bargaining activity that benefits everyone, whether they're union members or not.

But a 1992 law, adopted by voters, prohibited unions in the state from using that money for political activity without first getting permission from the non-members.

DOJ_NMG_0115327

The hourlong session Wednesday turned largely on whose First Amendment rights were at stake. Lawyers for the state - backed by the Bush administration - argued that the most important rights in the case belong to employees, who shouldn't be forced to support causes with which they disagree. The state also says the "opt-in" system best protects those rights.

Lawyers for the union say its rights to lobby are being infringed by the Washington restrictions.

The Supreme Court already has said non-members must be able to "opt out" of paying for political activity; the Washington law went further, saying unions must get them to "opt in" before pursuing political causes with their money.

Both the state attorney general and several teachers sued the Washington Education Association, accusing them of violating the 1992 law. The state's highest court ultimately concluded that the law violated the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, essentially because it placed undue burdens on the unions' political speech.

The court agreed that the "opt-in" requirement would create an administrative nightmare for the union in its effort to collect the fees, and that the "opt-out" requirement was a less burdensome alternative that the state should have chosen.

That reasoning clearly fell flat with Chief Justice John G. Roberts and with justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Samuel Alito.

Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg also hammered the union's lawyer with questions that reflected serious doubt about his arguments.

Justice Stephen Breyer seemed similarly inclined, but less certain. Justice Clarence Thomas, as is his custom, said nothing during arguments.

The justices' response to the union's arguments was best summed by Kennedy.

"States have considerable discretion in determining how to protect federal constitutional rights," he said at one point. "It seems to me that Washington acted quite properly in saying we will use this mechanism in order to protect our workers' First Amendment constitutional rights."

Later in the arguments, he accused union lawyer John M. West of disregarding employees' rights altogether.

"You want us to consider this case as if the First Amendment rights of non-union members were not involved," he said. "That's been your whole argument."

West responded by saying he recognized the employees' rights, but that the state infringed the union's rights by going too far to protect non-members.

"The non-members have the absolute right to prevent the use of their funds not only for . . . any kind of political ideological speech . . . with which they disagree simply by sending in a letter," West said.

Justices Hear Case On Right Of Unions To Use Nonmembers' Dues (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

First Amendment rights are threatened in the state of Washington, the Supreme Court was told yesterday, but it will be up to the justices to decide who needs protection.

The Washington Education Association, the state's largest teachers union, said its freedoms would be endangered by a state law that would increase restrictions on the union's ability to use workers' money for political causes.

On the other side are workers who do not join the union but under state law must pay dues anyway. They say their money should not be used for the union's election causes without their explicit approval.

The issue could be boiled down to a somewhat straightforward question: Is it enough that nonmembers have the chance to opt out of having a portion of their money spent on political activism, or may states put the onus on the unions, forcing them to get explicit approval from each worker?

The issue is somewhat narrow, but the case has drawn special attention from the politically influential AFL-CIO on one side, and from conservative legal groups and national right-to-work organizations that want to limit the power of unions on the other.

The Washington Supreme Court ruled last year that the state's law requiring the union to get affirmative authorization from nonmembers was unconstitutionally burdensome.

"This has the practical effect of inhibiting one group's political speech (the union and supporting nonmembers) for the improper purpose of increasing the speech of another group (the dissenting nonmembers)," the state court ruled.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy seemed to see it just the opposite way yesterday, saying it appeared to him that Washington had acted properly to protect the rights of nonmembers. He told union attorney John West: "You want us to consider the case as if the First Amendment rights of nonunion members were not involved."

West said that was not true, and that the Supreme Court in the past had found that those workers were properly protected by giving them the right to opt out of having their dues spent for political purposes. Those workers can object "simply by sending in a letter," West said.

"So it's a First Amendment right that is waived by failing to make a timely objection," Justice John Paul Stevens responded.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Washington Attorney General Robert McKenna (R), who was defending the state law, seemed to agree that nonmembers have already made a statement about the union's political activities when they decided not to join. "They shouldn't be required to say no twice," McKenna said.

The Bush administration also joined the case in opposition to the union's position.

In practice, only about 5 percent of the teachers and other educational personnel eligible to join the Washington Education Association choose not to become members. The state nevertheless requires them to pay dues, and about 75 percent of that money is spent on collective-bargaining efforts. West said the other share spent on political purposes is used to support or oppose ballot issues rather than being used for candidate campaigns.

The consolidated cases the court heard yesterday are Davenport v. Washington Education Association, 05-1589, and Washington v. Washington Education Association, 05-1657.

Rights Of Unions And Nonmembers Vie At Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — A case argued before the Supreme Court on Wednesday about how labor unions must handle the fees paid by nonmembers could turn out to be little more than a footnote to a long line of decisions about the respective rights of labor unions and dissident employees.

Or the case might turn out to be a good deal more consequential, the first step toward a recalibration by the court of the constitutional balance between the two.

Each of these contrasting outcomes appeared plausible during an argument that had a bit of something for everyone: First Amendment law, labor law, election law and an animated performance by the court's newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Justice Alito appeared particularly energized by the case, a defense by the state of Washington of a provision of its campaign law that bars unions from spending nonmembers' fees on political activity without first receiving permission.

This "opt-in" provision of the Washington law, adopted by referendum in 1992 as part of a broad campaign finance measure, goes a step beyond the protection for nonmembers that the Supreme Court has found to be constitutionally required. The court has required unions to permit nonmembers to "opt out" of having their fees used for any purpose that is not "germane" to the union's collective bargaining responsibilities.

Under federal labor law, states may authorize "union shop" provisions under which employees who choose not to join the union must pay fees to support the union's collective bargaining.

The Washington Supreme Court held in this case that requiring the union to receive affirmative permission before spending nonmembers' money on election-related activity imposed an unconstitutional burden on a union's right of free speech and association.

The state teachers' union is defending that judgment, while the state and a group of teachers, represented by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, challenged it in separate appeals. The justices consolidated the cases, Davenport v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1589, and Washington v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1657, for a single argument.

DOJ_NMG_0115329

The Bush administration entered the case on the state's side. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said the Washington Supreme Court had "rigidly constitutionalized an area of labor law" that should be left to the "substantial discretion" of the states and the federal government.

Mr. Clement said that just because "as a minimum constitutional matter, the workers have to have an opt-out right" did not mean that a state could not go further and provide that the union could not spend nonmembers' money on politics unless those workers affirmatively agreed.

That argument seemed to appeal to Justice Alito. "Why should the First Amendment permit anything other than an opt-in scheme?" he asked.

That was a "fair question," the solicitor general replied, while at the same time carefully avoiding a full embrace of Justice Alito's suggestion. The opt-in right should be an option but was not constitutionally required, he said.

Later in the argument, addressing the union's lawyer, John M. West, Justice Alito suggested that it seemed only common sense to presume that employees who had chosen not to join the union were likely not to support the union's political activities.

The presumption built into the court's precedents is that nonmembers do support the union's outside activities unless they declare otherwise. "Dissent is not to be presumed" is the phrase the precedents use. So it would be a substantial change in labor law if the presumption were reversed.

"Isn't it overwhelmingly likely," Justice Alito asked Mr. West, that if nonmembers were asked whether they wanted to "give money to the union to spend on elections, they would say no?"

Mr. West said he "absolutely" disagreed, explaining that the union used its political money to campaign for higher taxes to support local school districts and other purposes "that it has every reason to believe is in the interest of the vast majority of teachers."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. sounded unpersuaded. "Well, surely," he said, "you don't get to say, well, this is in your interest, whether you want to spend the money or not."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was also critical of the union's position. "You want us to consider this case as if the First Amendment rights of non-union members were not involved," he told Mr. West on two occasions.

Washington is the only state with a campaign finance law that singles out labor unions for special treatment. Mr. West's basic argument was that the law violated the First Amendment by discriminating against speech based on its content. The union is permitted to engage in legislative lobbying, for example, without first getting the nonmembers' permission to use their money, but is barred from campaigning for or against ballot measures.

About 5 percent of Washington's 80,000 teachers have declined to join the union.

Ballot Firm Hits House Democrats (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

The Nebraska-based electronic voting machine manufacturer at the center of the still-contested Congressional race in Florida's 13th district demanded Tuesday that a court throw out what the company characterized as a threatening letter from House Democrats.

Lawyers for Election Systems & Software filed the motion with Florida appellate Judge Jon Wheeler in response to a letter that House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) sent the court last week.

Millender-McDonald wrote that Christine Jennings, the Democratic candidate in the Nov. 7 race to replace former Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has preserved her right to contest the election before Millender-McDonald's committee. So the court, she said, has an obligation to consider all the facts of the case, an apparent reference to a Dec. 29 lower court ruling not to require Election Systems & Software to disclose how its electronic voting machines work.

The machine's "source code," Jennings contends, may reveal why 18,000 individuals in Sarasota County did not cast votes in the Congressional race on Nov. 7. The company contends that such information is proprietary and that releasing it could damage the company financially.

But in court papers, the company claims that the chairwoman is an unrelated party to the case and "has no standing to participate in the review of the trial court's order." Even more, it states, Millender-McDonald's action is little more than a political ploy and an abuse by one branch of government against another.

"The response is a thinly veiled attempt by one member of Congress to intimidate this court and unduly influence its deliberations in order to give [Christine Jennings], a member of Millender-McDonald's political party, an unwarranted advantage in this election contest," wrote Harry Thomas and Jeffrey Frehn, lawyers for Election Systems & Software.

The motion closed: "The fairness of this election will be assured by the due process of law, not by tactics or threats that are intended to interfere with the independence of the judiciary."

Romney Says He Was Wrong On 1994 Issues (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 11, 2007

A 1994 videotape mysteriously posted on YouTube.com prompted Republican Mitt Romney to declare Wednesday, "I was wrong on some issues back then," while also insisting to social conservatives key to his presidential campaign that he is one of them.

The tape of a Senate debate between Romney and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy showed Romney defending a woman's right to abortion, saying he supported allowing gays in the Boy Scouts and distancing himself from former President Reagan by noting he was a registered independent during the period the conservative icon was leading the nation.

All of the material has been previously published, but its presentation in video form — and on the easily shared YouTube medium — prompted an immediate response from Romney, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week.

"If you want to know where I stand by the way, you don't just have to listen to my words, you can go to look at my record as governor," Romney said during a late-day appearance on the "Glenn and Helen Show," a radio program featuring Tennessee psychologist Helen Smith and her husband, Glenn Reynolds.

"Frankly, in the bluest of states, facing the most liberal media in the country, I've led the fight to preserve traditional marriage. I've taken every legal step I could conceive of, to prevent same-sex marriage."

A tape of Romney's call was immediately posted on YouTube. Asked whom the campaign suspected of posting the tape, Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said: "It doesn't matter. We used the very same mediums made available to those seeking to attack Governor Romney to set the record straight in his own words with the facts."

In the 1994 tape, Romney is asked about abortion rights and responds: "One of the great things about our nation is we're each entitled to have strong personal beliefs — and we encourage other people to do the same. ... I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country."

Kennedy retorted that while he was "pro-choice," Romney was "multiple choice."

At another point, Romney was asked if he ever publicly opposed the Boy Scouts' exclusion of gay members while he served on its executive board.

"I feel that all people should be allowed to participate in the Boy Scouts regardless of their sexual orientation," Romney replied.

On a third point, Kennedy accused Romney of harboring the same economic philosophy as Reagan and former President George H.W. Bush.

Romney replied: "I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush; I'm not trying to return to Reagan-Bush. My positions don't talk about the things you suggest they talk about; this isn't a political issue."

In recent speeches, however, Romney has wrapped himself in Reagan's mantle.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way," Romney told conservative activists last weekend.

Jim Gilmore For President? It's Not An Easy Sell (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115331

Article II of the Constitution says that the President of the United States must be a "natural born Citizen" who is at least 35 years old. So far, so good for former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore (R), who announced this week that he is forming an exploratory committee for a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

Having watched former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean run a stunningly effective early campaign in his bid to win the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004, I am trying to remain open-minded early on when considering long-shot candidates for president.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.)? Sure, he's a 10-year Senate veteran who might be able to take advantage of a vacuum on the right in the GOP race. Democratic Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.)? They've been Senators for 26 and 36 years, respectively, so they have earned the right to be treated seriously as Democratic contenders.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D)? They are or were reasonably popular two-term governors, which means they aren't stuck on Capitol Hill and can run as successful chief executives. Give them a chance to see what they can do.

But Gilmore? I don't think he fits in the same category. Still, let's look at his pluses and minuses before jumping to a conclusion.

Gilmore, 57, holds undergraduate and law degrees from the University of Virginia. He was elected Commonwealth's Attorney in Henrico County — suburban Richmond — in 1987. Six years later he was elected Virginia Attorney General, serving one term in that office before winning the governorship in 1997. He left four years later having successfully divided the state GOP into warring factions during a budget crisis that he helped create — and alienated enough voters that Democrat Mark Warner was elected to succeed him.

Gilmore then served briefly — from January 2001 to January 2002 — as Republican National Committee chairman. Gilmore widely was assumed to have been installed at the RNC because Bush political strategist Karl Rove assumed that the former governor would be little more than a figurehead, while Rove really ran the committee. But Gilmore didn't see things that way. As a former governor, he was accustomed to making decisions and having others defer to him. When Rove realized that he and Gilmore had different views of how the committee should be run, the former governor had to go. "It was a disaster from the start," says one GOP insider familiar with the situation.

Gilmore chairs a commission created by Congress called the Congressional Advisory Panel to Assess Domestic Response Capabilities for Terrorism Involving Weapons of Mass Destruction. He also formed a nonprofit, the National Council on Readiness and Preparedness.

Shortly before Christmas, Gilmore indicated his interest in a 2008 run. He told The Associated Press, "There is not a committed conservative in the field who can put together a national campaign. I am and I can. I have people on the ground right now in Iowa and South Carolina." Veteran Virginia political operative Boyd Marcus and New York political strategist Kieran Mahoney are involved in Gilmore's early planning.

Gilmore's tax-cutting record would be a plus for Republican caucus and primary voters, and the opening on the right in the battle for the GOP nomination could be a lure: The two early Republican favorites, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, aren't exactly movement conservatives.

But caucuses and primaries aren't only about ideology. They also are about candidates, organization and money.

Maybe time has distorted my memory, but I don't remember him as being a dynamic, inspiring conservative speaker. Others I have spoken with remember him much as I do.

Sympathetic Republicans, however, say Gilmore is "very disciplined" and "plain-spoken," and one media professional recently argued that Gilmore has been "terrific" as a "junkyard dog" on TV. That, combined with his ability to play to a partisan crowd, would be a strong asset for Gilmore.

Gilmore never has demonstrated the fundraising muscle that McCain or Romney have, and he also is far, far behind those rivals in lining up activists in the key early states. And there are other obstacles: Despite his service on the weapons of mass destruction commission, Gilmore, like most governors, has no direct foreign policy experience. And few outside of Virginia have ever heard of him.

In other words, Jim Gilmore begins with no name identification, no money and no organization. And that army of vaunted Virginia GOP operatives that once was mentioned as an asset for former Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)? Well, they don't look quite so intimidating now.

Gilmore's chance of winning the GOP nomination would be based on a single scenario: Romney doesn't sell to conservatives, while McCain, for one reason or another, doesn't make it to Minneapolis, Minn. Under those circumstances, lightning could strike anyone who is (or was) a candidate, even Jim Gilmore.

I find it awfully difficult to take seriously a presidential wannabe who left office having divided his own party and alienated voters, and who begins with no major assets except his alleged strategic positioning on the right. Jim Gilmore surely has a better chance of becoming a nominee than Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), but that doesn't make him a major player for '08 in my book.

Democrats' Litmus: Electability (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- For a party long known for subjecting presidential wannabes to a battery of litmus tests, on issues from abortion to trade, Democrats are uniting in raising one big issue for 2008: electability.

Who can win? That question is paramount for many activists, donors and voters, desperate to reclaim the White House. And it's one that poses a big hurdle for both Democratic front-runners, Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Widespread concerns about whether either could get elected -- Mrs. Clinton because she is a woman, and a polarizing figure; Mr. Obama for being African-American, and relatively inexperienced -- potentially prevent either from running away with the Democratic nomination. That, in turn, is what keeps hope alive for about a half-dozen rivals maneuvering for advantage should the leaders stumble. Of that pack, polls and early organization suggest the best-positioned is former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Today Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut officially joins the race with his announcement on the syndicated radio show "Imus in the Morning."

The three Republican front-runners -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani -- have the opposite problem of their Democratic counterparts. Each of them is considered electable. The question is whether they can get nominated in a party in which the conservative base demands that the nominee oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and taxes, but believes that each of these men is suspect.

For their part, Democratic activists and voters alike have become more pragmatic than any time in decades, which many in the party attribute to the chastening effect of recent years out of power in Washington and many statehouses. As for the liberals who make up Democrats' base, for all their passion about jobs and global trade, health care, the environment, abortion and gay rights and especially the war, these days the left cares "big time" about whether a candidate can get elected, says Robert Borosage, co-director of the union-supported advocacy group Campaign for America's Future.

Likewise, feminist leader Kate Michelman says that in her travels, "I hear people talking about 'electability' all the time, and Democrats are going to continue talking about it." Even among audiences eager to see a female president, she says, skeptics ask, "Do you think the country is really ready for a woman?" Ms. Michelman is supporting former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards -- not, she says, because she considers the front-runners unelectable but because Mr. Edwards is the best candidate for women's issues, and electable.

Last year's midterm elections, which gave Democrats a majority in Congress for the first time in 12 years, offered a preview of their party's pragmatic bent. Primary voters chose a number of moderate-to-conservative Democrats over liberal stalwarts for the party's nominations, to increase the chances of winning Republican-held suburban and Western seats.

"Primary voters vote with their heads, not their hearts," says Democratic consultant Stephanie Cutter, an adviser to John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. She and some other strategists cite that year for early evidence of Democrats' emphasis on electability, when Mr. Kerry won the nomination over Howard Dean, then the darling of antiwar liberals. "They dated Dean but married Kerry because he was the best positioned to beat President Bush with his military record and proven experience," Ms. Cutter says.

Yet Mr. Kerry wasn't elected. And that has other Democrats, in particular Clinton and Obama advocates, warning against taking the electability test too far. Neither Mrs. Clinton nor Mr. Obama has announced for president, though both are expected to create exploratory committees this month.

"I think both are electable," says Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who has ties to both -- as Mr. Obama's friend and fellow Chicagoan, and as a former top adviser to Mrs. Clinton's husband. "Bill Clinton had an electability problem until the primaries were over" in 1992, Mr. Emanuel recalls, but his strong performance in the primary campaign overrode controversies about his political stands, avoidance of the Vietnam draft and alleged philandering.

Much like her husband 15 years ago, Mrs. Clinton is often seen as too cautious and calculating, leaving many questioning what she stands for. Unlike him, she lacks a compensating charisma. Despite bipartisan praise for her Senate record on issues from education to national security, even admirers lament that she would draw Republican attacks like no other Democrat given conservative activists' loathing for both Clintons. Then there is the fact Americans have never elected a woman -- complicated in Mrs. Clinton's case by her spouse being a former president, suggesting a co-presidency of sorts.

"Anybody who has questions about her electability should look at what she's done in New York," says spokesman Howard Wolfson. He notes that she defied skeptics in 2000 by winning election to the Senate with 55% of the vote, and last year was re-elected in a landslide thanks to greater support from independents and Republicans.

Mr. Obama exudes the charisma, authenticity and optimism that many Democrats find lacking in Mrs. Clinton. Yet while he was raised in Hawaii by his white mother and grandparents from Kansas, his public identity is defined by the African skin and Muslim name inherited from his late father, Barack Hussein Obama, of Kenya. Inevitably Democrats ask: Would Americans elect an African-American, and one whose name rhymes with the terrorist they most revile?

Skeptics also cite the 45-year-old Mr. Obama's inexperience after just two years in the Senate. Days after his return last week from a holiday visit to hometown Honolulu, Hawaii's longtime Democratic Sen. Daniel Inouye was quoted in the city's paper saying Mr. Obama should wait: "He has been in the Senate for, what, two years?"

For eight years previously, Mr. Obama was an Illinois state senator. As a youth, he lived for a time in Indonesia, was the first African-American president of the Harvard Law Review, then a community organizer in Chicago and a constitutional law professor. "People measure experience in different ways," says adviser David Axelrod. "I think we're all an amalgam of all our experiences. And his are extremely varied and rich."

That is chronicled in Mr. Obama's best-selling memoir of struggling with his mixed-race, multicultural background, "Dreams from My Father." Written in 1995 before his political career, the book includes what would be another first for a presidential candidate: Mr. Obama's acknowledged use of "blow" -- cocaine -- as a young man. Strategists in both parties suggest the admission wouldn't be fatal. "I think Americans are at a moment when candor counts for more than the original sin," Democratic pollster Geoff Garin says.

For all the scrutiny of the front-runners, other aspirants face electability questions as well should they attract more attention. Steve Elmendorf, a veteran of several Democratic campaigns, says such judgments are premature a year before the first primary. By then, he says, performances on the stump and in debates will give voters a better sense of each candidate.

And ultimately, Mr. Elmendorf notes, "how electable you are depends on who you are running against."

Dodd To Enter 2008 Presidential Race (AP)

By Beth Fouhy And Holly Ramer

AP, January 11, 2007

Democratic Sen. Christopher Dodd, a veteran lawmaker who entered Congress in the post-Watergate class of 1974, will announce his bid for the presidency, Democratic officials said Wednesday.

Dodd, 62, will make the formal announcement in an interview Thursday morning on the "Imus in the Morning" radio show — a curious bit of timing since he'll be forced to compete with heavy coverage of President Bush's speech on the Iraq war.

Dodd will travel late Thursday to Iowa, which will host the first presidential nominating caucus next January. He heads to South Carolina, an early primary state, on Sunday.

Kathy Sullivan, the chairwoman of the Democratic Party in New Hampshire, said in an interview that she had spoken to Dodd and he said, "'I'm not going to do the exploratory thing, I'm going to plunge right in.'"

The 26-year Senate veteran enters a growing Democratic field overshadowed by two likely candidates — Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack has already announced his candidacy, as have former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

Throughout his decades-long career in Washington, the Connecticut senator has forged strong ties with labor unions, championed fiscal accountability for corporations and championed education and other children's issues. This month, he became chairman of the influential Senate Banking Committee and is a senior member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Sullivan said Dodd had other attributes that would make him appealing to voters.

"People really like him. He's very smart. He's also very articulate. And I think he might have the sharpest wit of anyone in the field," Sullivan said.

Dodd voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, but has become an outspoken critic of the war and now calls his vote a mistake. He has said he would oppose an escalation of U.S. forces in Iraq and has said Congress should consider withholding funding for such a troop increase.

Dodd has been politically active on behalf of other Democrats, raising money and campaigning for candidates across the country and chaired the Democratic National Committee from 1995-96.

In 1974, he was elected to the House at the age of 30, part of a Democratic tide after the Watergate scandal and President Nixon's resignation. His father, Thomas Dodd, served as a senator for two terms.

Dodd and his wife, Jackie Marie Clegg, have two daughters, ages 5 and 22 months.

Senator Dodd May Be Joining Democratic Race For President (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

HARTFORD, Jan 10 — Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, is to announce on Thursday morning that he is running for president, some of his friends say.

He plans to outline his intentions on Don Imus's nationally syndicated radio and cable television shows, followed by a series of media interviews, they say.

Mr. Dodd was set to file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission this week establishing a campaign committee, his friends said, which would allow him to raise money to compete in what is expected to be a crowded primary field.

Beneva Schulte, a spokeswoman for Mr. Dodd, would not comment on his plans Wednesday evening.

Coverage of Mr. Dodd's announcement would be competing with that of President Bush's Wednesday night speech on Iraq.

Mr. Dodd, although well-known in Washington and his home state, does not have the kind of national name recognition of some other Democrats who are strongly considering entering the race, most prominently Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina and vice-presidential nominee, has spent the last two years building support for his bid and is widely viewed as a strong candidate. And Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa have announced their candidacies. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's candidate in 2004, is also considering joining the race.

Mr. Dodd, 62, who is serving his fifth term in the Senate, is chairman of the Banking Committee and has spent much of the past several months shoring up support in states with early primaries, like New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina. From 1995 to 1997, he served as the general chairman of the Democratic party, which could prove helpful in fund-raising.

Some of the most recent presidential polls have left Mr. Dodd off the list, but his supporters say that his experience in the Senate could be a boost and that his personality would be an asset.

DOJ_NMG_0115335

Mr. Dodd, who is also a senior member of the Senate Foreign Relations committee, has become a vocal critic of the war in Iraq, saying that his vote to authorize military action in 2002 was a mistake.

He was one of the leading opponents of the appointment of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations.

Hillary's Status As Front-runner Slipping In Key States (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's popularity in Democratic presidential-preference polls has fallen in the nation's first caucus and primary states in the face of increasing support for her chief rivals for the 2008 nomination.

Pollsters said her weaknesses in Iowa and New Hampshire were the result of the growing popularity of two major opponents -- former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- and their populist economic messages, as well as a deepening antipathy toward her among Democratic-leaning independents who dislike her support for the war in Iraq and who question her electability.

"I think Hillary strikes these voters the same way Senator John Kerry did in 2004. They would really like to vote for someone they really like this time. Hillary doesn't fit that characterization right now," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, who conducted polls in both Iowa and New Hampshire.

His findings mirror more recent polling showing a similar national decline in support. "There's been erosion," said pollster John Zogby. "She's polling in the low- to mid-40s nationally."

The New York Democrat, who has been her party's clear front-runner, came in a distant fourth in an Iowa presidential poll of 600 likely voters conducted Dec. 18 to 20, drawing 10 percent in a crowded field of contenders. Mr. Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice-presidential nominee, and Mr. Obama were tied in first place with 22 percent each, followed by outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack with 12 percent.

In New Hampshire, whose first-in-the-nation primary follows the Iowa caucuses, polls showed Mrs. Clinton in a dead heat with Mr. Obama, who was greeted like a rock star in a whirlwind of standing-room-only appearances across the state last month and has since seen his political support skyrocket nationally.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama drew 22 percent and 21 percent respectively late last month, while Mr. Edwards took third place with 16 percent. One month before, Mr. Obama was trailing Mrs. Clinton by 23 points.

Mr. Ali, who interviewed 600 likely voters in New Hampshire, said its electorate was made up of "a lot of independents. These are the same people who loathe [President] Bush, loathe the Iraq war. But deep down, they don't like Hillary Clinton," he told the Concord Monitor.

In a telephone interview with The Washington Times, he said, "Her chief rivals are very much against the Iraq war and prefer that we begin withdrawal. I don't think they trust her, to be honest with you.

"Part of the reason is that among the candidates, she seems the most supportive of the war in Iraq and appears less critical of President Bush than the other candidates," he said.

Mrs. Clinton, who is reportedly planning to announce her 2008 candidacy sometime this month, has yet to campaign in New Hampshire. Democrats in the state say they expect her approval numbers to improve once she begins active campaigning.

"You cannot underestimate Senator Clinton. She has a unique attribute no one else has. She is extremely well-known, has a very good war chest, the ability to raise a lot of money and has a great spouse, Bill Clinton, who will be supporting her," said Jim Demers, a veteran party strategist in the state.

However, Mr. Demers, who intends to support Mr. Obama if he decides to run, said most of the party's activists were "uncommitted and waiting for Senator Clinton to come in before they start making up their minds."

2008 Destination Unknown (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

DENVER -- There's a reason Denver hasn't hosted the Democratic National Convention in almost 100 years: It's just not a union-friendly town.

DOJ_NMG_0115336

That much became evident after the Democratic National Committee (DNC) again postponed its decision on whether Denver or New York will be the venue for its 2008 convention, thanks to a recent labor uprising in the Mile High City.

With all the labor trouble in Denver, Democrats might be tempted to scrap the whole idea and head for New York, but there's trouble in the Big Apple, too. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg hinted that he doesn't want to host the event, saying that the city was tapped out after hosting the Republican National Convention in 2004.

"The city can't go on the hook for a convention unless they're reasonably sure they can raise the money," he told the Associated Press.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean now says the announcement will be made by the end of January, but nobody's holding his breath. The committee already has missed deadlines calling for a decision in early December, then mid-December, then early January.

It could be worse. A DNC spokesman yesterday rebutted a report on MSNBC that said a decision would be announced in February.

The delay puts Democrats months behind Republicans, who announced in September that their convention would be held in Minneapolis-St. Paul and have even sent out press kits.

It looked as if Denver had clinched the convention bid last fall, when the host committee finally persuaded a local hotel to sign a union agreement. Until then, Denver had no union hotels, a deal-breaker for the Democrats, who count organized labor as a key component of their political coalition.

Enter Jim Taylor, president of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees Local No. 7, who threatened to strike during the convention unless organizers pulled out of the Pepsi Center, the proposed site for most of the convention meetings.

Mr. Taylor says the Pepsi Center is "anti-union," noting that it doesn't contract with organized labor. The Pepsi Center, home to both the Colorado Avalanche hockey team and Denver Nuggets basketball team, is owned by Stan Kroenke, who's married to Wal-Mart heiress Anne Walton.

Although Democrats may be willing to overlook the irony of holding their convention at a facility owned by the Wal-Mart family, widely regarded as the chief scourge of the modern labor movement, it appears that Mr. Taylor isn't.

John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, reportedly has entered the negotiations in hopes of persuading Mr. Taylor to sign a no-strike agreement.

Mr. Taylor has proposed holding the convention a few blocks away at the unionized Colorado Convention Center, but tourism officials say the center is too small for the Democrats' needs. The DNC specifically requested a basketball arena as its main facility.

Raising the money won't be a problem in Denver, say organizers, who are eager to host the city's first national party convention since 1908.

"As much as New York may not want the convention is as much we do want it," said Irene Kamsler, a member of the Denver host committee. "They'll all be welcome here with open arms."

Think Big, Plan Ahead (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.) continues to give serious consideration to running for governor in 2010, as well as for the Senate, should Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) choose not to seek a fourth term.

In preparation for a statewide run, Sanchez — who has had a gubernatorial campaign account open for several months — plans to spend the next few years traveling up and down California to meet with constituent groups. Given the hefty fundraising requirements of running statewide in California, Sanchez anticipates her decision would come no later than November 2009.

In a recent interview, Sanchez said she is “absolutely serious” about running for governor in 2010, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) will be termed out of office and the seat will open.

DOJ_NMG_0115337

"I wouldn't discount that, or the Senate seat, if it should open up," Sanchez said.

The Congresswoman conceded that Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) decision to keep the House in session five days a week will crimp her in-state travel plans somewhat, particularly considering her need to pay close attention to her Orange County district, which preferred President Bush over Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), 50 percent to 49 percent in 2004.

But she is optimistic her increased Congressional workload, which includes responsibilities as the No. 2 Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, will not derail her from laying the groundwork for a statewide run. Sanchez said polling has consistently shown her with the name identification and favorability ratings necessary to launch a campaign in vast, multiple-media market California.

"We've been looking for a long time at the statewide level," Sanchez said. "Polls usually show us to be pretty high in most parts of the state."

Sanchez's gubernatorial campaign account, People for Loretta 2010, had only $1,904 on hand as of the last reporting period ending June 30, after contributions of $27,105 and $43,734 in expenditures. But California law allows any federal campaign funds she raises between now and a prospective gubernatorial run to be transferred into her state account.

Because California's fundraising limits for gubernatorial candidates are $24,100 per primary campaign and $24,100 per general election campaign — for both individual contributors and political action committees — Sanchez would not have to worry about any contribution conflicts if and when she transfers money from her federal account to her state account.

In her post-Nov. 7, 2006, Federal Election Commission report, Sanchez reported banking nearly $650,000 in her Congressional campaign account, after spending $1.86 million on her 24-point victory over stockbroker Tan Nguyen (R).

Some California Democrats have serious questions regarding Sanchez's ability to win a major statewide contest. To get the backing of major party figures — both donors and political operatives — for either a Senate or gubernatorial run, she would have to do some convincing.

But Sanchez also is seen as having some of the innate qualities that breed success, particularly the fact that she is both a woman and a Latina. Roger Salazar, a Democratic operative based in Sacramento, said women tend to do well when they run statewide, in part because not many of them do.

In last year's race for secretary of state, then- state Sen. Debra Bowen (D) beat Bruce McPherson, the moderate Republican incumbent who had been appointed to the position by Schwarzenegger, despite the fact that the governor won his re-election handily over then-state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D). Salazar said Bowen's victory was aided by the fact that she is a woman, which is good news for Sanchez.

"She's done a fantastic job as a Congresswoman. But whether that translates, I don't know," Salazar said. "One luxury we have as Democrats in California is a plethora of talent."

The Republican bench for gubernatorial and Senate candidates in the Golden State is not seen as very deep.

Steve Poizner, a wealthy moderate Republican who won his race for insurance commissioner over then-Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante (D) — he was the only Republican to win a statewide contest in California last cycle other than Schwarzenegger — has to be seen as an early favorite to run for governor.

On the Democratic side, other than Sanchez, potential candidates for governor include Bowen, state Treasurer and former state Attorney General Bill Lockyer, and Attorney General Jerry Brown, who previously occupied the governor's office from 1975 to 1983 and served as mayor of Oakland for the past eight years.

Meanwhile, in the 2010 Senate contest, Schwarzenegger himself is the only Republican being speculated about to run for Boxer's seat regardless of what she does — although most California Republicans believe it is unlikely that he will seek a job in which he would have to share the political stage with 99 other lawmakers.

In addition to being seen as potential gubernatorial candidates, Bowen, Lockyer and Brown could also run for Senate in 2010, although Boxer, who will be 69 that year, could well seek another term. Brown, a three-time presidential contender, unsuccessfully ran for a Senate seat in 1982.

As Johnson Mends, Dakota GOPers Focus On Ending 20-year Drought (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

DOJ_NMG_0115338

The Hill, January 11, 2007

There's a saying in North and South Dakota politics: The voters send Republicans to the state capitol to be conservative with their money, and they send Democrats to Washington to bring back other people's money.

Whatever their motivations, Dakota voters have indeed split their elections along those lines for many years.

The illness of Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) could open things up again in 2008 for Dakota Republicans, who have long struggled for a breakthrough in their congressional representation. If recent history is any indication, however, it will be hard-fought and expensive to make a dent in Democrats' stranglehold on the Washington delegations.

Democrats have held at least five of the states' six congressional seats for the last 20 years.

"It's a phenomenon that has been going on for years and years and years," said Max Wetz, executive director of the South Dakota Republican Party. "It seems to confound a lot of people."

Republican former state Sen. Larry Diedrich knows what it is like to be on the short end of that tradition. He lost twice in 2004 to Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), first by 3,000 votes in a special election and then in the general.

"I've always thought that perhaps people see the money that they have in the state as more their own money," Diedrich said. "Whereas, when you look at the federal level — maybe part of it's the fact that we're typically a recipient state — I think people perceive that that issue is more of other people's money. It's always a little more difficult for Republicans with a conservative message to win that argument."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) was able to convince voters of his ability to bring home the bacon in his razor-thin, multimillion-dollar victory over then-Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) in 2004, said Steve Hildebrand, who managed Daschle's campaign and Johnson's narrow win over Thune two years earlier.

Analysts are largely undecided about how true the adage is, but Hildebrand said there is "some credence to it."

State-level Republicans in South Dakota have been very successful at attaching all Democrats to the efforts of some to enact an income tax, but on the federal level it's a different frame of reference, he said.

"They believe Democrats are most successful at getting pork back to the states," Hildebrand said. "So they want Democrats in Washington fighting for their pet projects, whether it's disaster relief, farm aid, Medicaid."

Thune was also able to tie Daschle to the Democratic Party that Daschle led in the Senate — a strategy that's been tough to replicate, despite the states' overwhelmingly conservative politics.

His win gave Dakota Republicans their lone standard-bearer in Washington. While Republicans dominate both state legislatures, both governorships and presidential politics, Democrats have occupied at least five of the six congressional seats in the Dakotas since 1987.

The last time the Dakotas voted for a Democrat for president was 1964, when both states voted for Lyndon Johnson. Both gave President Bush at least 60 percent in each of the last two elections.

North Dakota has had an all-Democratic congressional delegation since 1987 and has had a Democrat represent it in the House since 1981. South Dakota last had two Republicans in its delegation in the mid-1980s. Before that, both Washington contingents were dominated by Republicans.

Republicans could have an opportunity to win back three of those seats in 2008 if Johnson is unable to run for reelection.

Herseth is widely considered the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination to replace him, and her candidacy would also create an opening in the state's at-large House seat. North Dakota Republicans are also moving to give Democratic Rep. Earl Pomeroy his first difficult race since 2002 for that state's at-large House seat.

The future of Johnson's seat is in a holding pattern as he recuperates from a brain hemorrhage in December. He was upgraded to "fair" condition this week. State Republicans are moving forward as before in seeking candidates to run for those seats, whatever situation might ultimately arise, Wetz said.

Gov. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) was reelected in November with 62 percent of the vote and is considered the top contender for the Senate seat. Other possibilities for federal office include attorney Jim Seward and Barb Everist, a former state Senate majority leader.

Herseth was just reelected with 69 percent of the vote, and unless she leaves the seat — she is also mentioned as a possible gubernatorial candidate when Rounds is term-limited in 2010 — that seat will likely prove difficult for Republicans.

Pomeroy breezed to reelection with 66 percent of the vote. But despite a longer tenure, he appears less ensconced than Herseth. He endured several difficult reelection bids in the 1990s and won by four points in 2002.

As in 2002, Pomeroy won't have North Dakota's veteran Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad or Byron Dorgan at the top of the ticket, and a Pomeroy challenger could be bolstered by the presidential race.

Nick Bauroth, a political science professor at North Dakota State University, said the inability to beat the well-liked and scandal-free senators is easier to understand than the fact the Republicans haven't been able to assemble strong challenges to Pomeroy in the last two elections.

"When you have more of a quality challenger, Pomeroy is actually pretty vulnerable," Bauroth said.

Pomeroy will also, for the first time since his first term, be in the majority party, and Republicans say efforts to tie him to national Democrats could prove more fruitful. They are already issuing press releases tying Pomeroy to the actions of the new Democratic majority.

Pomeroy spokeswoman Sandra Salstrom said voters have recognized Pomeroy's effectiveness in eight straight elections: "Through his hard work and influential committee assignments, he will continue to deliver for our state."

Possible challengers include: Attorney General Wayne Stenehjem, Public Service Commissioner Tony Clark, Tax Commissioner Cory Fong, Secretary of State Al Jaeger, and Doug Goehring, who fell to the incumbent Democratic agriculture commissioner. Pomeroy's 2006 challenger, 38-year-old Matt Mechtel, is also considered to have a bright future.

State Republican Party Chairman Ken Karls said efforts to take out Pomeroy have proven frustrating and that convincing the national party to help out in 2008 will be vital to finally cracking back into the state's congressional delegation.

"North Dakota is suffering because we do not have a Republican in Washington representing us," Karls said. "We have to get at least one Republican into Washington. It behooves us to do that as soon as possible."

How Secular Donors Move Church Agenda (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The National Council of Churches is becoming financially beholden to secular groups with liberal political leanings, according to a report by a religious watchdog organization.

The Institute on Religion and Democracy, a group formed by members of the NCC, says the group accepted the majority of its charitable donations last year from nonreligious organizations and has been pursuing an agenda that does not mesh with the majority of its church members, including support for abortion and homosexual "marriage."

"We found numerous common themes among the dozens of nonchurch entities from which the church council has recently sought or received funding," said John Lomperis, a research associate with IRD who co-wrote the group's report on the NCC.

"These groups have very little demonstrated interest in religion beyond recruiting faith communities to support their favored social and political causes."

Politically affiliated groups who donated to the NCC between 2004 and 2005 include the Sierra Club; the Ford Foundation, which advocated for "reproductive rights"; the United Nations Foundation, which is funded by billionaire media mogul and philanthropist Ted Turner; and the Connect US Network, which has ties to George Soros' Open Society Institute, Mr. Lomperis said.

Mr. Lomperis says the NCC also applied for a $100,000 grant from MoveOn.org, a liberal political-advocacy group that worked to defeat President Bush in the 2004 election, but has not yet received any grant money from the organization.

IRD Vice President Alan F.H. Wisdom says the problem lies not with the NCC accepting such money, but that the groups who are donating it do not reflect the views of the member churches.

"The religious left simply does not have 45 million people in the pews on any given Sunday," he said. "We're very clear that it's not wrong for Christian groups to accept money from foundations and non-Christian organizations."

DOJ_NMG_0115340

The NCC was formed in 1950 with its stated goal being to serve as a bridge between Christian faiths and communities. The group claims to represent 45 million American believers through its member churches, which includes 35 Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox, black and historic Christian denominations.

NCC staff member Lindsey Thune showed up at the IRD press conference yesterday to contest some of the group's claims and to question their own fundraising records.

"Not all of us on staff support abortion or gay marriage," Miss Thune said.

Mr. Wisdom acknowledged that the IRD receives about 40 percent of its funding from private foundations, including some that are considered conservative, including the Adolph Coors Foundation and the John M. Olin Foundation.

The IRD says it is less concerned with where the financial support for the NCC is coming from than in how it is influencing the organization's political agenda.

"The considerable financial support now running into the coffers of the NCC from such organizations ... is not being given merely as a form of charity," said the Rev. John M. Reeves, an Orthodox priest.

Christian Groups Trade Barbs On Their Sources Of Funding (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Two influential Christian nonprofit organizations questioned each other's finances yesterday, each suggesting that the other is beholden to big donors with partisan political motives.

The clash between the National Council of Churches and the Institute on Religion and Democracy was a rarity in Washington, where liberal and conservative advocacy groups fight fiercely over issues but seldom dig deeply into each other's funding.

Both groups call themselves nonpartisan and are incorporated as tax-exempt charitable organizations. But the council, a New York-based alliance of 35 Christian denominations, is deeply involved in liberal social causes, such as reducing poverty and making peace; it achieved a long-standing legislative goal yesterday when the House voted to increase the minimum wage.

The institute, a Washington-based think tank, is allied with conservative groups on issues such as same-sex marriage. From its founding in 1981, its primary effort has been to challenge what it calls the "leftist" political positions of mainline Protestant denominations, such as the United Methodist Church and the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). It has worked closely with conservatives in those denominations, including Episcopalians who have broken away from their church since it consecrated a gay bishop in 2003.

Yesterday, the institute released a 90-page report, titled "Strange Yokefellows: The National Council of Churches and Its Growing Non-Church Constituency." It argued that the council in recent years has faced diminishing contributions from its member churches and has made up the shortfall with grants from such "left-leaning" groups as the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, the Ford Foundation and the Sierra Club.

In the fiscal year ending June 2005, the council received $1.76 million from secular foundations and non-church groups, surpassing the $1.75 million it received from member churches and "signaling a radical new development in the council's history," the report said. Noting that the enrolled membership in mainline Protestant denominations has fallen from 17 percent of the U.S. population in 1950 to 7 percent, it said that only six of the council's top 16 funders today are church groups.

"Several of these [non-church] groups that the NCC has turned to for financial and other forms of support are so blatantly partisan that they can be accurately described as . . . the shadow Democratic Party," the report's main researcher, John Lomperis, told reporters.

His co-author, Alan Wisdom, added that the council has abandoned the goal for which it was founded in 1950 -- fostering "Christian unity" -- and does not represent the true views of the 45 million Christians in its member churches, which include several historically black denominations and Orthodox churches.

The first question at the institute's news conference on the report came from the Rev. Leslie Tune, a staff member of the council, who asked where the institute gets its own funds.

James Tonkowich, the institute's president, said that about 60 percent of its roughly $1 million in annual revenue comes from individual donors and about 40 percent from conservative foundations, such as the Scaife, Bradley, Coors and Smith Richardson family charities.

Tonkowich also acknowledged that his organization has made public less information about its funders than the NCC has.

In separate interviews, Lomperis and Wisdom said they wrote the report largely in response to earlier criticism of the institute's funding from the council's general secretary, the Rev. Bob Edgar, a former Democratic congressman from Pennsylvania who is also a Methodist minister. In his 2006 book, "Middle Church," Edgar wrote that the institute's fundraising list "reads like a Who's Who of contemporary conservatism."

Edgar's book was the latest of several articles and books by liberal Protestants accusing the institute of fomenting divisions in their churches. In an article posted last year on the Web site of the Episcopal Diocese of Washington, the diocese's spokesman, Jim Naughton, said the IRD has received at least $4.6 million from conservative foundations since 1985, allowing the institute and a "small network" of fellow conservatives "to mount a global campaign that has destabilized the Episcopal Church."

Edgar, 63, who is stepping down as head of the NCC at the end of the year, did not speak at the institute's news conference. But he stayed afterward to shake hands with the report's authors and to thank them for recognizing that he has turned around the finances of the council, which was running a $5.9 million deficit when he took over in 2000 and has now balanced its budget for five years in a row.

"I was brought in to do three things: raise money, raise money and raise money," he said. "Thank you for highlighting that secular as well as religious organizations now recognize the importance of the National Council of Churches."

Gov. Releases Austere Spending Plan (LAT)

By Jordan Rau And Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today unveiled a restrained $143-billion state spending plan that eases some of California's chronic fiscal problems in part by restricting welfare payments and denying public transit systems $1.1 billion they were anticipating.

The plan's spending from the state's general fund-where most California taxes go-would be $103 billion, an increase of less than 1% from the current fiscal year, which ends June 1.

Schwarzenegger hailed his plan that would eliminate a multibillion-dollar deficit anticipated for this year and pay off early some of the state's debt incurred during its economic crisis at the turn of the century.

"Our net operating deficit has been reduced to zero," Schwarzenegger said. "It was not easy and our hard work is by no means finished."

Much of the fiscal picture was achieved because the state projected that its revenues will increase by 7.2%, despite the slowing housing market. The plan also leans on a more recent raft of borrowing to pay for long-needed maintenance to state parks and California's levees — spending that in the past had come out of the state's yearly budget.

The budget also anticipates $506 million from five Indian gambling compacts the administration has negotiated but that so far have not passed the Legislature. Some fiscal experts doubt whether the new gambling venues would bring in that much money if they were permitted.

Republican legislators, who have been trashing Schwarzenegger's healthcare proposal and decrying his general turn to the left, were heartened by the relatively austere budget.

"The governor's budget reflects his commitment to fiscal responsibility," said Senate GOP Leader Dick Ackerman of Irvine. "No new taxes and debt reduction are welcomed by Republicans."

Schwarzenegger's budget is balanced partly with the help of gas tax revenue that now is supposed to go to local bus routes, light rail lines and other public transportation projects.

DOJ_NMG_0115342

Transportation officials had anticipated that additional money would come their way because high gas prices had helped fill the state's coffers. Instead, that money would go to pay for school transportation and to pay off some of the state's transportation bonds.

While Schwarzenegger has said he would provide schools with the $56.8 billion required under Proposition 98, teachers would once again not be able to take advantage of a $200-million tax credit intended to offset out-of-pocket expenses teachers incur for classroom supplies.

The administration also shifted into education spending $269 million in child care costs that used to come out of the state's general fund.

The credit has not been available to teachers for three years. Schwarzenegger and lawmakers have suspended it to help balance the budget. Now the governor is proposing to eliminate it.

Schwarzenegger's budget also would reduce the state's welfare budget by $465 million. The savings would come by eliminating a cost-of-living adjustment that was to take effect in July for Cal-Works recipients and by cutting off aid to children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the state illegally and have been receiving such assistance for more than five years.

Some of these proposals met strong resistance from Democrats. They have said they will oppose the welfare reduction.

"Cal-Works cuts are unacceptable at a time when our state is enjoying unprecedented prosperity," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles).

He called the budget a mix of good and bad news. "If you ride a bus or a subway, want to take your kids to a state park, or have to pay for your kid's tuition and fees, then this budget will hit you hard," he said. "But it could be worse. Much worse."

Schwarzenegger's budget presentation, with its blunt details about running the basic functions of government, comes after days of lofty inaugural rhetoric about "post-partisan" leadership and plans to fix California's healthcare morass with $43 billion in borrowing, in addition to a continuing, ambitious — and expensive — effort to rebuild the state's foundations. Voters approved $43 billion in bonds in November to pay for school, transportation, affordable housing and levee improvements and building.

The governor's second round of borrowing could be harder to pass because its key components — money for more water storage, courts and jails — were rejected by Democrats when he proposed them last year. Republican legislators support the purposes of much of the package, especially the water storage, but many of those lawmakers are deeply troubled by the notion of putting the state further into debt. Also part of the new round of borrowing would be money for school expansion, prisons and college facilities.

The plan offers a few expansions, such as $2.1 million more for public health safety programs to respond to food-borne bacteria such as E. coli. Outbreaks last year hobbled the state's spinach industry.

The governor's $12-billion healthcare plan — which would require all Californians to purchase insurance — does not directly affect the state budget, administration officials have said, but it is sure to become part of a contentious debate over the state's financial direction. The budget includes $36 million for healthcare expansions.

Schwarzenegger took a few questions from the press this afternoon, the first time he has fielded inquiries this year. Asked about his skiing accident just before Christmas, which resulted in a broken leg, Schwarzenegger said: "It was one of those very unfortunate accidents. The reason I said it was unfortunate is because it happened at a very slow speed."

He said that his ski boot did not pop off and as he fell it put pressure on his artificial hip, breaking his femur. "If I were to have that accident at 50 mph, and many times I've crashed at that speed, nothing happens," he said.

He said he had been very frustrated by the unyielding pain and is "very angry" a lot of the time.

"I don't think I can remember ever having had pain — ongoing pain, 24 hours a day — like after this operation," he said. "So it's really annoying to me, and believe me, there's nothing I hate more than having an obstacle like this. So this is very frustrating to me. It's very tough on my wife."

Schwarzenegger's Bond Sequel (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115343

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- At this rate, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger may become known as the Bond-inator.

Last year, the former "Terminator" star persuaded California voters to pass a record bond package totaling $42.7 billion to help rebuild the state's aging infrastructure. This year, he is proposing that California go back to the well for an additional $43.3 billion in bonds, to help expand the rebuilding work -- and that is making even Democratic allies of the Republican governor a tad nervous.

"I'm a little taken aback that the governor would go back to the voters before we have even spent the bonds we just got," said Don Perata, the president of the Democratic-controlled state Senate after Mr. Schwarzenegger made the surprise proposal in his State of the State speech here Tuesday night.

'We Must Be Ambitious'

The governor offered up an ambitious agenda for his second term, vowing to take on the problems of health care, climate change, crumbling roads and a host of other difficult issues.

"We must be ambitious to get California to the future," the governor told legislators gathered in the State Assembly chamber. "We are addressing needs that have been ignored for decades."

Mr. Schwarzenegger's office says more borrowing is prudent, because the state is in much better financial shape than when the governor took office in 2003.

Indeed, Mr. Schwarzenegger released a budget proposal for 2007-2008 yesterday that would enable the state to repay 14 years ahead of schedule the billions in bonds it borrowed in 2003 after the collapse of the Internet boom.

The governor's spending plan of $143.4 billion also holds general spending to a relatively tight 1% increase, although as a whole it is up 9.1% over the same time.

It isn't just the size of the proposed bond package, but also the mix of it that concerns some. The governor would ask voters to sign off on $29.4 billion of the bonds, which would be spent on such things as rebuilding and expanding schools and colleges and providing for new dams to store water in the arid state.

But the other $13.9 billion -- much of which would go toward expanding the overcrowded prison system -- would come from lease-revenue and self-liquidating revenue bonds.

State Sen. Denise Ducheny said the lease bonds are more expensive than general obligation bonds, and so wonders if they would be prudent.

Also, added the Democrat -- who Mr. Schwarzenegger will need to work with as she is the incoming Senate budget chair -- voters may become bond weary.

"We have to be a little cautious," said Ms. Ducheny, who represents a district in San Diego.

Still, the governor has regained enough political capital since clashing with Democrats on several fronts in 2005 that even his detractors say they are willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, and work to find common ground.

Conservative Republicans may prove among the toughest to get to sign off another bond deal, since they have complained in the past about excessive spending and borrowing in Sacramento.

Political strategists say that's partly why Mr. Schwarzenegger opted to include a highly controversial plan to build new dams in California that the Republicans generally support while the Democrats don't.

Five-Receiver Set

Indeed, Fabian Nuñez, the powerful speaker of the Democratic-controlled state Assembly, already calls provisions for more water storage a nonstarter, saying those supplies could fall into the hands of profiteers.

The governor probably knows he isn't going to get everything he wants, though, added Mr. Perata, who along with Mr. Nuñez was instrumental in selling the governor's bond package last year.

"His strategy here seems to be, you send five receivers down the field and you throw to one," Mr. Perata said.

Grimacing And Barely Bearing It (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 10 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Wednesday that he was in pain. A lot of pain.

DOJ_NMG_0115344

And, he conceded, he has passed on his woes to his wife, Maria Shriver.

The governor, who rolled out his annual budget to the state house press corps here, broke his right leg skiing just before Christmas. He has hobbled on crutches, meandering rather than his more accustomed strutting, through the daily business of government.

“I don’t think I can remember having this much pain,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said at a budget presentation that in contrast to his physical condition seemed strong.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, said that California, which has experienced treacherous budget shortfalls in recent years, faced a gross operating deficit of $1.8 billion this year, but that prepaying state debt and some complex fiscal maneuvers would allow it to enjoy a modest surplus in the next fiscal year.

“You heard me right,” he said, panting slightly after making his way to the lectern in the auditorium of the building housing the office of the secretary of state. The governor has proposed cuts for agencies and restructuring the welfare-to-work system, to save more than an estimated $300 million.

Mr. Schwarzenegger conceded that he chafed at his hampered mobility. He chose to present his health care address, the centerpiece of his second-term agenda, by satellite from Los Angeles on Monday rather than before a live audience here.

“There is nothing I hate more than having an obstacle,” he said.

His injury occurred at “a very slow speed,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said, meaning that his ski did not pop off. As a result, the break occurred where the femur meets the hip, which he said was an artificial one.

California Plans Major Carbon Cut In Its Gasoline (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

LOS ANGELES

Now that California is on record as mandating a 25 percent cut in the state's greenhouse-gas emissions by 2020 - a move that made headlines worldwide four months ago - leaders here are starting to lay out how they intend to hit that ambitious mark. First up: requiring transportation fuels sold in California to contain less carbon, a major greenhouse gas.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) announced Tuesday that he will issue, within weeks, an executive order that sets a new "low carbon fuel standard" in the state. Aimed at petroleum refiners and filling stations, the new standard will give them 13 years, until 2020, to cut the carbon content of the fuels they sell for passenger vehicles by 10 percent.

The intent is twofold: to stimulate investment in alternative low-carbon fuels, and to curtail actual carbon emissions from tailpipes, which the governor said account for about 40 percent of the state's total.

"This is going to stir billions in investment - inviting technology companies of all kinds to come up with innovative ideas to reduce carbon emissions," says Eric Heitz, president of the Energy Foundation, a partnership of seven foundations dedicated to advancing energy efficiency and renewable energy. "It puts market forces to work to find the lowest costs and the best methods with a clear environmental goal.... It [also] eases US vulnerability to volatile price fluctuations driven by foreign political events." The entire world community, he predicts, will be watching California's efforts to curb greenhouse-gas emissions, which many scientists say are responsible for global warming.

California is the world's ninth largest emitter of the greenhouse gases that trap heat in the atmosphere. In unveiling the new standard for fuel content, Governor Schwarzenegger said a year-in-the-making white paper showed the importance of addressing the transportation sector.

"Transportation accounts for 40 percent of California's annual greenhouse-gas emissions, and we rely on petroleum-based fuels for 96 percent of our transportation needs," he said. "This dependency contributes to climate change and leaves workers, businesses, and consumers vulnerable to price shocks from an unstable global energy market." Higher prices for consumers?

As California moves to implement the new standard, its effect on consumers and the state economy will be closely watched. Several Republican lawmakers and business leaders have expressed early concern that the state crackdown on emissions will encourage businesses to locate outside California, or will increase their overall costs. Consumers worry that new fuels or fuel additives will raise prices at the corner gas station.

Advocates of the move, though, say California businesses and consumers stand to reap the windfall of technological investment. They say the new standard is expected to replace 20 percent of the state's on-road gasoline consumption with lower-carbon fuels, lead to a tripling of the size of the in-state renewable fuels market, and place more than 7 million alternative-fuel or hybrid vehicles on California roads - a 20-fold increase.

"The impact of this policy on consumers and the economy will likely be positive," says James Winebrake, chairman of the Public Policy Program at the Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT) in New York. "Although these low-carbon fuels may cost a bit more than conventional fuels, they may have a greater domestic content.... Therefore, money spent on low-carbon fuels is less likely to end up overseas and more likely to generate greater economic activity locally. This could have significant benefits to state and regional economies."

Schwarzenegger's announcement included appearances by environmental leaders, scholars, and energy and transportation consultants - all generally supportive of his plan. Industry's view

Conspicuously absent were representatives of oil producers and carmakers. Conoco Phillips, in a written statement, said it "is supportive of and invests in technology development to produce and enable the use of low-carbon fuels and recognizes this [plan] is one component in a suite of actions necessary to reduce CO2 in the atmosphere."

BMW spokesman Andreas Klugesheid, reached at the auto show in Detroit, says his company is pushing a hydrogen car "whose emission pipe will eventually emit nothing but water vapor.

"We understand the limitation of fossil fuels is basically something that, in the long run, endangers our business.... We share the governor's approach to reduce CO2."

Some observers say oil and car companies will eventually warm to the idea of alternative fuels.

"Oil and car companies generally don't like to be told what to do, so their knee-jerk reaction is not to like it," says Dan Sperling of the Institute for Transportation at the University of California at Davis. "Once they look at this, they will think it is palatable because it gives them a lot of flexibility and comes with a market-based approach. No one of them will be at a disadvantage."

Others, such as RIT's Mr. Winebrake, say the question remains whether the action is "too little, too late."

And environmentalists worry that the state's rule on fuel content may not prevent ways of creating alternative fuels that are themselves polluting. Some ethanol plants in Texas, for instance, burn coal - a big carbon source - in the distilling process, says Sara Hessenflow Harper of the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC). Some methods of growing and harvesting corn for ethanol can be far more polluting than others, environmentalists note.

Supporters and detractors of the new standards agree that the rulemaking and implementation phases are complex - and fraught with political and economic pitfalls.

"In general, we are very excited about the prospect of simultaneously transforming the whole energy economy, lessening dependence on foreign oil, and reducing global warming all at once," says NRDC's Jennifer Witherspoon. "We just hope they don't inadvertently overlook any of the great solutions that are out there."

Former Sen. Burns Hired At Lobbying Firm (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, January 11, 2007

Former Sen. Conrad Burns, whose ties to lobbyists helped sink his re-election bid, has landed at a new workplace: a Washington lobbying firm.

Burns will work for his former chief of staff, Leo Giacometto, at the firm Gage, which has lobbied for Montana interests and several national technology companies, often making headlines for its connections to Burns and his staff.

In the Montana Senate race, Democratic challenger Jon Tester pounded Burns on his ties to Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist at the heart of an influence-peddling scandal. Burns had accepted about $150,000 in campaign contributions from Abramoff, his clients and associates. He later gave that money away, and denied any wrongdoing.

Burns won't be able to become a lobbyist just yet, as Senate rules prevent former members from lobbying their ex-colleagues for one year. The Senate is now considering ethics legislation — partly prompted by the Abramoff scandal — that would bump that period to two years.

A statement from Gage said Burns will be a senior adviser to the firm, focusing on "increasing the firm's visibility and presence domestically and internationally to provide a greater reach of opportunities for Gage clients."

Fairfax Vs. 'No Child' Standoff Heats Up (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Teenagers from Uzbekistan, Korea and Egypt huddled one recent morning in a Fairfax County classroom, studying English words on slips of paper. Dozens were familiar, but not "bitter," "nibble" or "wicked." Felobateer Hana, 13, held up another. An animated movie character came to mind: "Shrek?"

"That's a good guess, but Shrek doesn't have an 'i' in it," said teacher Karyn Niles at Liberty Middle School in Clifton. "This is 'shriek.' Shriek is kind of like yelling."

Students such as Felobateer and his eighth-grade classmates, all recent immigrants who are learning English as a second language, are at the center of an intensifying dispute between Virginia schools and the U.S. Department of Education over testing requirements under the federal No Child Left Behind law.

Fairfax County school officials are protesting a federal mandate to give most English learners reading tests that mirror those taken by their native-speaking peers. Tonight, the school system is taking a major step toward challenging that mandate and the federal law.

School board member Phillip A. Niedzielski-Eichner (Providence), backed by other members and school administrators, plans to propose a resolution that would authorize officials to refuse to give immigrant students tests that they think most would fail.

The resolution could come to a vote as soon as Jan. 25. If it passes, several Fairfax schools probably will fall short of federal academic standards.

"When it comes between doing what's educationally sound for children and doing what's best for bureaucrats, I'm siding with children every day of the week," said school board Member Stuart D. Gibson (Hunter Mill).

School officials in Arlington and Harrisonburg are considering a similar step.

As Congress prepares to debate renewal of the five-year-old federal law, controversy has emerged over how to measure the progress of children learning English. The federal government objected last year to the way Virginia and 17 other states test limited-English students. Often, federal officials indicated, the state tests for such students were not demanding enough. They said that all students in a given state must be held to the same standards.

"It's important students enrolled in our schools are properly assessed, and that includes limited-English-proficient students," Chad Colby, an Education Department spokesman, said yesterday. "With testing, we have more data. So policymakers and educators at every level will have more information to make sure students who need more help get it."

One of the 17 states that drew a federal objection was Texas, home state of President Bush. Another was New York, which has asked federal officials to waive test scores for certain students who are recent immigrants.

Testing programs for English learners in Maryland and the District have withstood federal scrutiny.

Fairfax is well positioned to challenge the law because of its record of high academic achievement, said Wayne E. Wright, professor of bicultural and bilingual studies at the University of Texas in San Antonio.

"The feds are saying, 'If you say an English language learner cannot meet state standards, you have low expectations,' " Wright said. "The classroom teachers are saying, 'The federal government has completely unrealistic expectations.' "

Until now, Virginia has given English learners a specialized proficiency test to measure progress in reading. Many Virginia educators say that children who lack mastery of the language aren't prepared for grade-level exams that may include questions about similes, metaphors or analogies. They say it can take three or more years of school to reach that level.

Federal law requires testing every year in reading and math in grades 3 through 8 and once in high school. The government exempts students who have been in a U.S. school for less than a year from taking standard grade-level reading tests.

But after one year, the students are supposed to enter the testing mainstream. Federal officials say that students with limited English skills may be given special assistance, such as a bilingual dictionary or more time on a test.

But many local educators say the federal standard is too lofty for students just beginning to understand the nuances of English. The Virginia Board of Education has asked federal officials for permission to use the old, specialized test this spring, giving the state a year to design new tests aligned with state standards. Virginia's congressional delegation is lobbying Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to grant the request. Colby said Spellings has not made a decision. Fairfax officials support the one-year deferral, saying that it would be the best solution.

About 10,200 Virginia students are affected by the testing dispute, state officials said. About 4,000 are in Fairfax, which has the largest school system in the state and the Washington region.

At Liberty Middle School, Niles said her class shows why grade-level tests would stump many recent immigrants. She said that her students are making rapid progress but are still learning to decipher sounds and rules of English.

This week, the class was reading "The Enormous Crocodile," learning about character, plot and theme through a fourth-grade text. Other eighth-graders who are native English speakers were studying John Steinbeck's "The Pearl." Niles predicted that many of her students would be overwhelmed by passages in the standard state reading test.

"They'd shut down," she said. "They'll just put their heads down."

Under the resolution, English learners will continue to take proficiency tests, and the Fairfax district will report the results. Fairfax Superintendent Jack D. Dale is urging principals and teachers to focus on Virginia standards and county goals and not worry about the threat of federal sanctions.

"It's time for us to describe what are the quality parts about the law and what needs to be altered to make sense," Dale said.

Ethiopia 'holding Suspects' After US Air Strike (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, said on Wednesday that a US air strike in southern Somalia on Monday had killed eight suspected militants and wounded five others, who had been captured by Ethiopian forces.

Ethiopia, a key US ally, led an offensive against a Somali Islamist movement and has thousands of troops deployed in its Horn of Africa neighbour, backing Somalia's transitional government. But reports of fresh air strikes in the south of Somalia on , where Islamist forces are holed up, were denied by US and Ethiopian officials, who said their aircraft had not launched new attacks.

Both Washington and Addis Ababa accuse the Islamic Courts Union, the coalition of Islamist groups that took control of Mogadishu, the Somali capital, last June, of sheltering alleged al-Qaeda members, including three suspects wanted in connection with the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as 2002 attacks in Kenya. The ICU denies any links with al-Qaeda.

On Tuesday the Pentagon confirmed that an AC130 aircraft was used to target "the principal al-Qaeda leadership in the region". The attack in southern Somalia marked the first overt US military intervention in the lawless nation since its doomed invasion in the 1990s.

The Arab League criticised the US military action, claiming it had killed "many innocent victims" and demanding that Washington refrain from further attacks.

Mr Meles disputed reports that civilians were killed in the US strikes and said he was waiting for DNA tests to confirm the identities of the suspects. It was not clear whether the Ethiopian leader was referring to ICU fighters or to suspected al-Qaeda members.

Abdirahman Dinari, a Somali government spokesman, said the area targeted was heavily wooded and that Somali security personnel were searching the area. The region is remote, communications are poor and the weak government is not an effective entity.

DOJ_NMG_0115348

The ICU was forced to flee towards the Kenyan border by the Ethiopian offensive, which began on December 24. Diplomats say the US strikes could fuel a potential insurgency and increase the unpopularity of the government and the thousands of Ethiopian troops deployed in Somalia.

Some diplomats are more optimistic than others, suggesting that recent events had created a “window of opportunity” to establish a genuinely representative government. Others remain wary.

U.S. Reportedly Targeted 20 In Somalia (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, January 11, 2007

Ethiopia's prime minister said Wednesday the U.S. military targeted 20 high-level members of an Islamic movement linked to al-Qaida in an airstrike this week in southern Somalia, attacking quickly before the Islamists could escape.

The chief of staff for the Somali president claimed that a senior al-Qaida figure was killed in Monday's airstrike, although U.S. officials did not confirm it.

The air assault has been criticized internationally, with the African Union, European Union and United Nations among those expressing concern. But British Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers it was right to stand up to extremists who were using violence to "get their way" in Somalia.

Somali lawmaker Abdulrashid Hidig said the U.S. launched a new airstrike Wednesday around Ras Kamboni, a rugged coastal area a few miles from the Kenyan border where Monday's attack took place. He cited the Somali military as the source of the information.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi told reporters in his country's capital, Addis Ababa, that eight suspected terrorists were killed in Monday's airstrike, five were wounded and taken into custody by Ethiopian forces, and seven escaped.

Meles said most of the victims were Somali, but the identities would not be confirmed until DNA testing is completed.

He said Ethiopia and the U.S. have been cooperating on intelligence, and that most of the information has come from the Americans. He also said the Ethiopians did not provide any intelligence that led to Monday's airstrike.

"I do not know how the Americans got the information, but they appeared to have some credible information," he said. "Apparently they felt if they did not strike quickly, the target would be missed."

However, a U.S. military official based in the region said the Ethiopian military had provided the intelligence that led to the strike. "We acted on time-sensitive intelligence and made the strike in cooperation with the Ethiopians," said the U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity surrounding U.S. special operations missions.

In Washington, an intelligence official said the U.S. killed five to 10 people Monday in the attack on an al-Qaida target in southern Somalia. A Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians died Tuesday when helicopter gunships attacked suspected al-Qaida fighters in the south.

The U.S. military official said Tuesday's strike was probably carried out by Ethiopia since the aircraft were identified as Russian-made Hind helicopter gunships like those used by the Ethiopian military.

Abdirizak Hassan, the Somali president's chief of staff, said at least three U.S. airstrikes have been launched since Monday and that more were likely.

The al-Qaida suspect believed to have been killed Monday was Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who allegedly planned the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, Hassan said. He cited a U.S. intelligence report that was given to Somali authorities.

If confirmed, it would mean the end of an eight-year hunt for one of the FBI's most-wanted terrorists. Fazul was believed to have been harbored by the Somali Islamic movement that had challenged the country's Ethiopian-backed government for power.

In Washington, U.S. government officials said they had no reason to believe that Fazul had been killed. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the information's sensitivity.

Fazul, 32, joined al-Qaida in Afghanistan and trained with Osama bin Laden, according to FBI documents. The U.S. put a $5 million bounty on his head for allegedly planning the embassy bombings, which killed 225 people.

DOJ_NMG_0115349

This week's air attacks were the first U.S. offensive in Somalia since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993. The military's aim is to capture al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing advancing Ethiopian-backed Somali troops.

Somalia's Deputy Prime Minister Hussein Aided said Wednesday that U.S. special forces were needed on the ground to help Somali and Ethiopian troops capture Muslim extremists. "They have the know-how and the right equipment to capture these people," said Aided, a former U.S. Marine.

A senior Somali government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said a small U.S. operations team already was on the ground, providing military advice to Ethiopian and government forces.

In Washington, two senior Pentagon officials said Wednesday they had heard of no plans to put any sizable contingent of American ground troops in Somalia. Small teams of liaison officers — such as special forces advisers or trainers — were another matter, they said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak on the subject.

U.S. troops based in Djibouti have been training Ethiopian soldiers for years, mostly in small-unit tactics and border security. Ethiopia has the largest military and is America's closest ally in the region.

Meles said the success of the Ethiopian military intervention may have paved the way for the American airstrikes.

"No one expected the terrorists would be running around in groups of five or six without any protection," Meles said.

In the Somali capital, Mogadishu, some said the U.S. air attacks would increase anti-American sentiment in the largely Muslim country, where people are already upset by the presence of troops from Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

Weapons Raids In Somalia After Violent Night (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 10 — Mogadishu exploded in violence on Wednesday morning after unknown insurgents attacked a transitional government barracks during the night and soldiers responded by sealing off large swaths of the city, searching house to house for guns.

The weapons raids immediately provoked stiff resistance, and squads of Ethiopian soldiers and troops loyal to the transitional government poured into the streets, where they battled outraged residents and a handful of masked insurgents.

From dawn to afternoon, the pop of gunfire and the boom of explosives reverberated across Mogadishu, Somalia's reliably chaotic capital.

But it is difficult to tell how many people here actually support the growing insurgency against Somalia's transitional government and the Ethiopian troops backing it. On Wednesday, a group of masked men stood on the steps of a Mogadishu mosque and proclaimed themselves to be Somalia's new freedom fighters. They were met by jeers.

"Why can't you hit anything, then?" shouted one woman, referring to a botched grenade attack that missed the Ethiopians and demolished a house. "Were you scared? Were your fingers trembling?"

Regardless of the insurgents' popularity, or lack thereof, violence is increasing. And the transitional government, which entered the capital two weeks ago for the first time since it formed in 2004, now faces a critical test: how quickly, if at all, can it pacify a notoriously dangerous city, bristling with military-grade weaponry and split by deep clan divisions?

Most of the violence on Wednesday was concentrated in strongholds of the Ayr, a powerful clan-based group closely connected to the Islamist movement that had controlled much of the country until the Ethiopian military entered the fray last month. On the other hand, neighborhoods of the Darod clan, the clan of Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, the transitional president, were quiet. Many Darod members said they were happy about the weapons raids, especially the ones in Ayr neighborhoods.

Clan rivalries have been the curse of Somalia ever since there was a Somalia. They are the cause of its civil wars, its famines and its state of suspended decay. It seems that this new chapter is no different.

The insurgents are still a mysterious bunch, but they are widely suspected to be members of the ousted Islamist movement. After being routed, the Islamists vowed to fight on as an underground army. As each night passes, more government troops are attacked. On Tuesday, insurgents launched one of their boldest strikes, firing rocket-propelled grenades at an army barracks downtown. Witnesses said at least two soldiers died, and the insurgents got away. But on Wednesday, residents said that Ethiopian soldiers were able to confiscate some guns and arrest several people suspected of being insurgents.

Doctors at Medina Hospital said Wednesday that in the past 24 hours 15 people had been admitted for gunshot wounds, including 3 government soldiers. The violence this past week has filled all of the hospital's 65 beds, leaving bleeding men and women curled up on the floor and under acacia trees in the courtyard.

"This is not something that is going to stop," said Dahir Muhammad, a hospital official. "Until the Ethiopians leave, people will be determined to kill them."

The Islamist leaders, meanwhile, have fled to southern Somalia along the Kenyan border where they are being hunted by Ethiopian troops, with the help of American forces.

Somali officials said Wednesday that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, a main suspect in the bombings against American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, had been killed in a recent American airstrike in southern Somalia.

But American officials quickly distanced themselves from that claim, saying they were not even sure Mr. Fazul was among the terrorism suspects hiding in the jungle with the Islamists. They did say Abu Taha al-Sudani, a top aide to Mr. Fazul, and Aden Hashi Ayrow, a Somali terrorism suspect, might have been killed.

An American AC-130 gunship pounded the area Sunday night, the first time American forces have been publicly deployed in Somalia since 1994. Since June, when the Islamist movement rose to power, American officials have complained that Islamist leaders were sheltering terrorists connected to the embassy bombings, which together killed more than 200 people.

On Wednesday, residents in southern Somalia said warplanes returned, though those reports could not be independently verified. The Ethiopian Air Force has also been pummeling the area.

Pentagon officials said Wednesday that small numbers of American special operations ground troops were in Somalia working with Ethiopian forces and gathering evidence from the site of the United States airstrike.

"One would assume that a U.S. ground presence would be required at the least to do the DNA confirmation," said Roger W. Cressey, a former National Security Council official. "It's not something you would leave to the Ethiopians, and certainly not the Somalis."

Thousands of Ethiopian troops are essentially occupying Somalia, and many Somalis are beginning to resent it. Barwaqho Muhammad Osman, a mother of two, stood in a downtown Mogadishu street Wednesday morning with bags of groceries in her hands and no way to get home.

Ethiopian soldiers told her that her neighborhood had been sealed off because of the raids. When Ms. Osman tried to plead with them, witnesses said, the soldiers clicked the safeties off their guns and told her to go.

"Why did our president bring in these people?" she fumed. "They are occupiers, and if they keep this up, they will fail at every step."

Somali Capital Awash In Anger At Ethiopia, U.S., Interim Leaders (WP)

By Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 10 -- A messy, low-level battle for control of the battered streets of Mogadishu continued Wednesday, as a fighter shot a rocket-propelled grenade at a convoy of Ethiopian trucks passing through the combustible Somali capital.

The situation is so confused and the city so fractured and armed that the attacks, recounted by witnesses, could have come from any number of groups frustrated with the presence of Ethiopian troops, who last month swept a popular Islamic movement from power on behalf of the weak, U.S.-backed transitional government that is now struggling to assert control.

Former fighters loyal to the ousted Islamic Courts movement are hiding in the city's byzantine tin-patch neighborhoods. Sub-clans and sub-sub-clans are angry with Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi, who they say is favoring his own people as he doles out power and who has announced intentions to forcibly disarm an insecure city fortified with guns.

And many Somalis are enraged over the U.S. airstrike in the southern tip of the country early Monday, which was aimed at suspects in the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania who are thought to be among the ousted Islamic leaders on the run along the marshy coast near the Kenyan border.

"We are afraid of a long war," said businessman Abdulahi Mohamed Mohamud, 31, speaking by telephone from Mogadishu. "And people are angry at the Ethiopian troops."

DOJ_NMG_0115351

The current spate of violence began Saturday, as hundreds of Somalis flooded the streets, shouting at Ethiopian troops to leave the city, smashing cars, burning tires and throwing stones in protests that were sparked in part by rumors that the Ethiopians were about to go door-to-door confiscating weapons.

After skirmishes between militias and Ethiopian troops Sunday and Monday, a full-fledged gun battle raged for several hours Tuesday amid battered buildings and shops in a busy part of the city called Kilometer Four.

A body, reportedly of a man who launched a rocket-propelled grenade at Ethiopian troops Tuesday, lay in the road all night and into Wednesday morning, when a Somali police officer dragged it off. Three Somali police officers were reported killed in Tuesday's fighting, and a dozen people were injured, though accounts of casualties differ.

Wednesday afternoon, another grenade was launched at a convoy of Ethiopian trucks, wounding one civilian and, according to a local news agency, killing at least one government soldier. It was unclear whether Ethiopians were hit.

Since the Islamic fighters were pushed out, the city has been slowly returning to the hands of militias and thieves. Most attacks since Sunday have occurred in areas considered strongholds of the Ayr, a powerful and well-armed sub-sub-clan and a former backer of the Islamic Courts.

The transitional government, with the help and handicap of the Ethiopians, is racing to establish its authority on the streets. On Wednesday, Somali police dismantled two roadblocks by force and arrested 11 militiamen, government officials said. And Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf, who only recently returned to Mogadishu after a 40-year exile, met with a key leader of the Ayr, Abdi Qasim, a move that some analysts said could pacify a portion of the city.

The meeting "will help if they understood each other," said Mohamed Haji, 38, a columnist for a local newspaper, speaking by phone from Mogadishu. "Qasim was an opponent of the Ethiopian intervention, and his clan was supporting the [Islamic Courts movement]. So it's very important to negotiate with him."

Haji and others remained concerned, however, that new U.S. airstrikes would further agitate the city.

The Pentagon and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi denied Wednesday that U.S. warplanes had conducted additional attacks after the one Monday. But a Somali government official said airstrikes -- whether American or Ethiopian -- were "ongoing." An air attack is "going on today, and probably it may go on tomorrow," Abdirizak Hassan, chief of staff to the Somali premier, said Wednesday.

Two witnesses in Kismaayo, a port city about 60 miles from the area hit Monday, said they saw two military aircraft overhead about 1:45 p.m. Wednesday.

On Tuesday, Hassan told The Washington Post that U.S. military officials had reported to him that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, considered the chief organizer of the embassy bombings, was killed in the airstrike Monday. U.S. officials have cautioned against reports that Fazul was among the targets or was killed and said the main target was another al-Qaeda figure, Abu Talha al-Sudani.

In New York on Wednesday, the U.N. Security Council began debating the conflict. In a closed session, Ibrahim Gambari, the United Nations' undersecretary for political affairs, urged the interim government to begin talks with clan leaders, clerics and moderate elements of the Islamic Courts movement, saying the deployment of a peacekeeping force would be "problematic" without a political settlement in place, according to a copy of his statement.

He noted a pledge by Uganda to provide 1,000 troops for an East African peacekeeping mission and said Malawi, Nigeria and South Africa are considering participation.

Several envoys expressed concern that U.S. airstrikes could undercut international efforts to calm Somalia. But diplomats from China, Qatar and other countries suggested the United States may have a legal basis for intervention: a request for help from Somalia's interim leadership.

Away from the United Nations, diplomats from France, Italy, Egypt, the Arab League and African Union have criticized the U.S. air operation, saying it will destabilize Somalia further.

The Mess At State (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115352

Members of the Senate intelligence committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, were alarmed last week that John Negroponte was leaving as director of national intelligence after less than two years to become deputy secretary of state. By way of explanation, he informed one Republican senator that he did not want to make the switch but that the White House had prevailed on him to do so.

Just how career diplomat Negroponte came to be the new intelligence czar in the first place is puzzling. But to pull him out just as his on-the-job training was completed reflects a panicky desire to fill the deputy secretary post, which had been unfilled for an unprecedented six months. Five other key State Department positions are either vacant or are soon to be vacant.

Republicans in Congress who do not want to be quoted tell me that the State Department under Condoleezza Rice is a mess. This comes at a time when the U.S. global position is precarious. While attention is focused on Iraq, American diplomacy is being tested worldwide -- in Afghanistan, Iran, Israel, Korea and Sudan. The judgment by thoughtful Republicans is that Rice has failed to manage that endeavor.

Rice's previous government duties had been as an analyst and staffer rather than as a manager. That made it important for her to name a strong deputy secretary to run the building. John Bolton, an undersecretary in President Bush's first term and an experienced bureaucratic manager, volunteered. Rice instead picked him to be ambassador to the United Nations. The conservative Bolton ran afoul of a liberal Senate vendetta that blocked his confirmation for any post.

The deputy's post went to Robert Zoellick, one of the most talented national security administrators of the past generation who during Bush's first term was U.S. trade representative. He wanted to become president of the World Bank, but that job was filled by the embattled Paul Wolfowitz, who left the Defense Department as deputy secretary. Zoellick took a bullet for the team, dropping down a step to No. 2 at State.

Foreign Service officers saw in Zoellick a dominant deputy in the mold of Richard Armitage, who effectively managed the department during the first term. But Rice and Zoellick were not a marriage made in heaven. Nicholas Burns, No. 3 at State as undersecretary for political affairs, dominated the building. Burns surely would have been in the same post if John Kerry had been elected in 2004 and seemingly would be more at home in a Democratic administration.

Estranged from Zoellick, Rice relied on Burns and State Department Counselor Philip Zelikow for advice. A former Foreign Service officer and brilliant University of Virginia professor, Zelikow was near the top of the arrogance scale in a building where arrogance is the norm, uniting such disparate figures as Bolton and Burns. Zoellick busied himself by specializing in China and Sudan, unusual for a deputy secretary, but he finally had enough after 18 months and left in July.

That began a furtive, sporadic search for a deputy. Several prospects (including Marine Gen. James Jones, who just retired as NATO's supreme allied commander) said no, perhaps warned off by Zoellick's experience. Negroponte, named national intelligence director despite his lack of intelligence experience, was implored by fellow Foreign Service officers to bring order out of chaos. Retired Adm. Mike McConnell, though he had been out of the intelligence game for 10 years, was tapped to replace Negroponte.

Negroponte will find other empty offices at State. Zelikow, Counterterrorism Coordinator Hank Crumpton and John Hillen, assistant secretary for political-military affairs, have all resigned and have not been replaced. Robert Joseph, undersecretary for arms control, is reported to be going, and Josette Sheeran Shiner, undersecretary for economic affairs, is leaving to head the World Food Program.

With the State Department permanent bureaucracy traditionally hostile to Republican administrations, it is remarkable to see two Foreign Service officers, Negroponte and Burns, in the department's No. 2 and No. 3 slots. Insiders relish their confrontation. When Negroponte was flying high as Ronald Reagan's Communist-fighting ambassador to Honduras, Burns was a rookie staff assistant to the U.S. envoy in Cairo. That may turn out to be a good show, but it is not reassuring for a country facing myriad challenges worldwide.

China, Russia Hit Sanctions As 'Wrong' (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The governments of China and Russia have denounced sanctions imposed on their state-run companies by the Bush administration over missile and weapons of mass destruction sales to Iran and Syria.

"It is unreasonable for the American government to invoke its domestic law to sanction on Chinese companies without providing any evidence," Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said this week in Beijing.

"We express resolute opposition and strongly urge the U.S. to correct its wrong practice," he said.

The State Department last week imposed sanctions on 23 foreign companies and one Russian national under a U.S. law aimed at preventing the arming of Iran and Syria.

The companies included three Chinese state-run firms that have been the target of U.S. sanctions in the past over arms and missile sales, and three Russian firms, including the state-run arms exporter Rosoboronexport, whose subsidiaries will be barred under the sanctions from supplying material to U.S. aircraft manufacturers.

Sanctions against Rosoboronexport, along with the Kolomna Design Bureau of Machine-Building, and Tula Design Bureau of Instrument Building are "illegal," according to Russia's foreign ministry.

"Russian companies have regularly been accused of alleged assistance to missile and WMD programs or alleged deliveries banned by the international export control regime to Syria and Iran on the basis of the U.S. Iran and Syria Non-proliferation Act," the statement said.

"The U.S. has tried to extrapolate its domestic laws to foreign companies, to make them work under U.S. rules," it said.

The ministry said sanctions imposed in August on Rosoboronexport and the Sukhoi aircraft company were altered based on Russian responses. Sanctions on Sukhoi were lifted, but those on Rosoboronexport remain in place.

"As a result of politicized actions, the U.S. deprives itself and U.S. companies of cooperation with Russia's most advanced companies," the statement said. "This is called the loss of opportunities in business."

The State Department declined to provide details on what triggered the sanctions last week. But Bush administration officials said they resulted from Russian anti-tank missile sales to Syria that ended up in the hands of Hezbollah terrorists and were used against Israel, as well as goods sent from China sold to Iran that were linked to Tehran's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and missile systems.

In addition to the three Chinese firms and three Russian companies and one Russian national, the sanctions bar other international companies from doing business with the U.S. government or purchasing export-controlled goods from the United States.

The companies sanctioned include four Iranian state-run companies: Defense Industries Organization, Iran Electronics Industries, NAB Export Co. and Sanam Industrial Group, which has been linked in the past to illegal purchases of nuclear-related goods.

An Iraqi company, Abu Hamadi and Iraqi national Kal Al-Zuhiry also were sanctioned.

Russia Backs Syria In Probe Request (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

A rift has developed between Russia and the Western members of the U.N. Security Council over the probe into the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri nearly two years after he died in a car blast.

In an attempt to help its ally Syria, which so far has been singled out as refusing to cooperate with the U.N. investigation, Russia has asked that all countries not fully cooperating be publicly named.

"Let us face it," Moscow's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, told the Security Council on Tuesday. "If we focus so hard on one country, why should we disregard completely or even not want to know what those countries are?"

Serge Brammertz, head of the U.N. probe into Mr. Hariri's 2005 assassination and 15 other apparently politically motivated attacks, said last month he had sent more than 60 requests to a "significant number of countries" and more than 20 of them had not been answered, which impedes the work of his commission.

Mr. Brammertz did not name the countries, but Mr. Churkin said the council should ask him "to be more specific next time he reports to the council in March."

DOJ_NMG_0115354

The United States and France rejected the idea, saying it would distract from more important issues.

"Syria quite clearly falls into a category of its own, so I wouldn't try to lump them all together" with other countries, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters yesterday. "The fact that Syria has been cited as not being fully cooperative in the past with the investigation was important because, let's be frank, the signs pointed to some Syrian involvement [in the Hariri assassination] in some fashion."

Alejandro Wolff, the acting U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said of the Russian initiative: "We don't think that this is the right way to go."

Still, Mr. McCormack said it should be Mr. Brammertz's decision whether to disclose the names of the countries in question.

"If he thinks it's useful, then we would support his decision to do so," Mr. McCormack said. "If he decides that it is not in the interest of the investigation to make this information public, then we support his decision not to release those names."

Damascus has denied involvement in the assassination, which took place soon after Mr. Hariri accused Syria of meddling in Lebanon's affairs. Syrian troops left Lebanon later in 2005 after nearly three decades of de facto occupation. Syria still refuses to open an embassy in Beirut.

According to wire service reports, Security Council diplomats said in New York that supporters of the Russian proposal, such as Qatar, South Africa and Indonesia, pointed out that the council would not be seen as fair if it just cited Syria as failing to cooperate with the investigation.

Syrian Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari named France, which joined the United States in getting the council to approve the Hariri probe, as blocking a letter to Mr. Brammertz asking him to disclose all countries that are not cooperating.

"The Russian initiative is against singling out a country for political purposes," Mr. Ja'afari said. "It goes toward knowing precisely those countries that have cooperated and those that have not."

Bombs Kill 6 In Philippines As Summit Talks Near (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MANILA, Jan. 10 — Three bombs within hours of each other rocked the southern Philippines on Wednesday, killing at least six people and wounding 27 others, officials said, amid warnings that Muslim militants may try to disrupt this weekend's Asian regional summit meetings.

Officials insisted that security was tight, with the police and troops on the highest alert.

The chief of the national police, Oscar C. Calderon, had warned that militants might try to embarrass the government, a staunch American ally in the effort to curb international terrorism, by staging attacks during the meetings.

Chief Calderon spoke to reporters in central Cebu City, where he was overseeing security for summit meetings of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and East Asian leaders.

The first explosion ripped apart a stand selling lottery tickets across the street from a market in General Santos City, 620 miles southeast of Manila and about 310 miles south of the meeting site, said Senior Superintendent Alfredo Toroctocon, the city police chief.

Three people died instantly and two others later died from their injuries. Staff members at St. Elizabeth Hospital reported that another person had died on arrival, bringing the death toll to six. Among the dead were two boys, ages 8 and 12, the hospital staff said.

Chief Superintendent German Doria, the regional police chief, said the police had no suspects immediately, but he said the regional militant network of Jemaah Islamiyah and its ally, the local Abu Sayyaf group, "usually are the ones doing all these explosions in the region."

But he said the police were also looking into the possibility that the blast stemmed from the failure of the kiosk operator to pay winners of a lottery draw.

DOJ_NMG_0115355

An army spokesman, Maj. Ernesto Torres, said the authorities were also looking at the possible involvement of people trying to sabotage peace negotiations between the Philippine government and the main Muslim separatist group, the Moro Islamic Liberation Front, which has waged a decades-old struggle for a homeland in the south.

He said the bombing occurred at the culmination of a two-day meeting between rebel and government representatives in General Santos City.

The second explosion occurred about two and a half hours later in Kidapawan, a city about 65 miles north of General Santos City. An improvised bomb placed near the fence of a police outpost along the national highway exploded just after officers on duty left to go on patrol, said a senior police official, Pascual Peroy. Two male passers-by were wounded.

The third blast, at a dump site along a major street in the city of Cotabato, appeared to be from an improvised bomb, although it could also have been from a grenade, said a city police spokesman, Senior Inspector Samson Obatay.

At least three garbage collectors were wounded.

Philippine Summit To Go Ahead Despite Fatal Bombs Blasts (AFP)

By Frederic Peugeot And Verna Yu

AFP, January 11, 2007

The Philippines insisted a closely-watched regional summit would go ahead later this week, despite three bomb explosions that left seven people dead.

"I have been told by my security people that everything is safe and secure here ... Therefore the show will go on," Foreign Minister Alberto Romulo said, referring to the resort isle of Cebu, where leaders from ASEAN and regional allies including Australia and China are due to meet.

Officials were quick to try and calm nerves, frayed after the abrupt cancellation of the summits in December in the wake of terror alerts for Cebu from Australia, Britain, the United States and other nations.

"I want to say categorically the incident must be treated as an isolated case," Cebu governor Gwendolyn Garcia said after the first blast, which happened in the city of General Santos almost 500 kilometers (200 miles) away.

"I am calling on all the people who are visiting to stay calm," she told AFP. "We are hundreds of miles away."

Military officials had previously warned that terror groups might stage attacks in other parts of the country to embarrass the government.

All three blasts occurred on Mindanao island, which has been menaced by Muslim extremists in the past.

The third blast, which killed one and wounded six, exploded just hours after a bomb went off near a police station in Kidapawan city, injuring two.

An earlier explosion in General Santos city left six dead and 10 wounded.

Romulo said the attacks were payback for the Philippines success in clamping down on militants.

"This, they tell me, is part of the retaliation for the reversals they have experience," he added.

General Santos Mayor Pedro Acheron said after the first blast the likely suspects were Muslim groups that might have been seeking to disrupt the peace talks between the government and a leading Islamic militant group that ended Wednesday.

The head of the Philippine national police said earlier that Cebu was safe and that there were no specific threats against the summits, which will gather presidents, prime ministers and other top officials from 16 nations.

But he said they were on red alert across the country.

Marciano Paynor, of the summit organising committee, said: "It is not directed at ASEAN. Our assessment is that this is a reaction to the pressure brought upon them (the militants)."

Well before the bombing, Philippine President Gloria Arroyo began the day with a call for regional countries to join forces to fight terrorism as well as poverty. ASEAN is set to adopt an anti-terror convention during the summit.

"Great stakes are involved in the continuing integration of the entire East Asia," Arroyo said in a statement, urging the region to "close ranks for a safer and more secure community."

The anti-terrorism convention would improve intelligence sharing, provide for a regional extradition treaty and set out plans for the rehabilitation of convicted terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0115356

Leaders will also spell out proposals to prepare the bloc's first charter -- a mini-constitution to make ASEAN a legal entity along the lines of the European Union -- and pave the way for a single market by 2015.

Security during the first attempt at the summit in December was widely criticised in the press. Rain poured through the roof of the purpose-built convention centre, and soaked the only X-ray machine to check bags and parcels.

This time, a 6,000-strong summit security task force is in place and officials have been closing down Cebu to conduct regular test runs of transport and travel procedures across the city.

"The incident is not -- and I repeat -- not related to ASEAN," said Chief Superintendent Silverio Alarsio, head of police operations in Cebu, after the first blast.

Earlier, a military spokesman said soldiers had killed a bomb expert from a group linked to Al-Qaeda in a jungle clash elsewhere in the south of the country on Tuesday evening.

Postponing last December's meeting, the Philippines blamed an approaching typhoon rather than terror threats, even though weather officials said the storm should not be a disruption.

U.S. Governor Brokers Truce For Darfur (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

DAKAR, Senegal, Jan. 10 — President Omar Hassan al-Bashir of Sudan and leaders of several rebel factions in Darfur, the western Sudanese region, agreed Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in separate meetings with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, a former American ambassador to the United Nations, according to a statement by Mr. Richardson and Mr. Bashir.

Mr. Richardson went to Sudan on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition of groups trying to stem the violence in Darfur, to try to break the deadlock over who will police the region.

A peace agreement signed last May between the government and one rebel faction has foundered, and the government has repeatedly rejected a United Nations peacekeeping force.

Mr. Bashir reiterated his opposition to such a force on Wednesday, telling The Associated Press that non-African peacekeepers would be seen as “colonialists.” But the Bashir-Richardson statement said he had agreed to halt military operations to allow time for a political settlement to the crisis to emerge.

“What is lacking is a political process that leads to a U.N. force,” Mr. Richardson said by telephone from Khartoum, the capital. “I think this 60-day cease-fire is at least a step.”

He said the leaders of two rebel factions that did not sign the May agreement, the Justice and Equality Movement and a splinter group of the Sudan Liberation Army, had also agreed to the new cease-fire. But it is not clear if they represent all dissident factions, because the rebel groups have fractured and realigned several times in the past year.

The Darfur crisis, a conflict over land, identity and self-determination that has killed at least 200,000 people and driven 2.5 million from their homes, has deepened in the past year despite the peace agreement. Recently, escalating violence in Sudan has forced aid agencies to curtail operations and has destabilized Chad and the Central African Republic.

Mr. Richardson, who last year helped negotiate the release of an American journalist charged with espionage in Sudan, has known Mr. Bashir for a decade and has international contacts made as ambassador in the Clinton administration. He is expected to seek the Democratic nomination for president next year.

Sudan's Leader Agrees To 60-Day Cease-Fire In Darfur (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Jan. 10 -- Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir agreed on Wednesday to a 60-day cease-fire in his nation's troubled Darfur region but again rejected calls for a U.N. force to help end one of Africa's bloodiest conflicts.

Bashir issued a joint statement with New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D) agreeing to the temporary halt of military action while also expanding access for journalists and aid workers. Richardson, who had traveled to Sudan on behalf of the Save Darfur Coalition, a Washington-based advocacy group, said several rebel leaders had orally agreed to the cease-fire.

DOJ_NMG_0115357

Successive cease-fires, including a May 2006 peace deal negotiated in Nigeria, have been broken both by Bashir and by the various rebel groups fighting for control of Darfur. But Richardson, who has negotiated with the Sudanese president on other occasions, said Bashir appeared sincere in seeking a diplomatic solution.

"He realizes he's isolated and has got to change," Richardson said by telephone from Khartoum, Sudan's capital. "He's boxed in."

Bashir, however, showed little evidence of relenting on his refusal to allow thousands of U.N. peacekeeping troops into Darfur, as the United States and international leaders have demanded. An underfunded and ineffective force fielded by the 53-country African Union has long operated in Darfur, but it has had little success in controlling a conflict that has killed hundreds of thousands of people, mostly civilians, and displaced millions of others.

"Our experience with U.N. operations in the world is not encouraging," Bashir told an Associated Press reporter Wednesday. "There are sufficient forces in the Sudan from African countries to maintain order, and they can provide order. All we need is funding for the African troops."

Bashir has agreed to allow a small number of U.N. advisers to assist with the African Union mission.

In the joint statement with Richardson, Bashir agreed to paint his white warplanes another color so they no longer resemble the aircraft of international aid groups. He also agreed on the importance of disarming the Janjaweed militias, echoing declarations made but not fulfilled in the past. These groups have carried out repeated armed attacks on civilians.

Analyst John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group held out little hope of the 60-day cease-fire being respected, but he said Richardson's diplomatic activity highlighted how little the Bush administration has achieved despite labeling the Darfur conflict genocide and repeatedly threatening tough action.

"Where is the administration on this stuff?" said Prendergast, speaking from Washington.

Amjad Atallah, an adviser to the Save Darfur Coalition who was traveling with Richardson's delegation, expressed skepticism that Bashir would end the violence in Darfur. "At the end of the day, President Bashir may not honor these terms," said Atallah, speaking from Khartoum. "We are not naive about it."

Unwitting Party To Genocide (WP)

By Stephen Rademaker

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Over the past three years, more than 400,000 people have perished in the Darfur genocide. Fighting has intensified in recent months as diplomatic efforts to end the conflict have faltered. The government in Khartoum bears principal responsibility for the continued killing, but recently an unexpected obstacle to ending the bloodshed has emerged: the International Criminal Court (ICC).

Critics of the ICC predicted early on that it would be more a hindrance than a help to ending most conflicts. The threat of prosecution would rarely motivate both parties to stop fighting, they argued, but in many cases it would be powerful enough to convince at least one side that it was better off continuing to fight. Yet even the ICC's critics have been surprised by the degree to which this is being borne out in Darfur.

Much of the world agrees that to end the genocide a highly capable U.N. peacekeeping force must immediately be deployed to Darfur. The only footnote to this consensus is China, which, eager for access to Sudan's oil and armed with a veto at the U.N. Security Council, forced the United Nations to accept a precondition to action in August: that the government in Khartoum must consent to the deployment of any U.N. force.

The Sudanese government has no history of objecting to U.N. peacekeeping forces on its territory. It agreed as recently as January 2005 to the deployment of a 10,000-member U.N. peacekeeping force in southern Sudan to monitor implementation of a peace agreement with rebels there, and that force remains in Sudan. So what has led Khartoum to reject today what it was willing to accept just two years ago? According to Sudanese government spokesmen, it's the involvement of the ICC.

Sudan is not a party to the treaty establishing the ICC, so the only way the court could obtain jurisdiction over crimes in Darfur was to be granted such jurisdiction by the Security Council. The council took that step in March 2005.

The Bush administration supported bringing in the ICC, not least because the perpetrators of the Darfur genocide are so richly deserving of prosecution. More fundamentally, the administration went along because this was the strongest action that other members of the Security Council were prepared to take at the time. The political situation mirrored that surrounding the Security Council's decision to create a war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in 1993. In both cases, the United States was pressing for resolute steps to end genocide, but other countries, particularly in Europe, were unwilling to agree to steps that might entail significant military, economic or political costs. The idea of deploying eager prosecutors rather than effective peacekeepers emerged as a low-risk compromise.

But war crimes prosecutors didn't stop genocide in Yugoslavia, and they haven't stopped it in Darfur either. To the contrary, the example of the Balkans, where U.N. peacekeepers in Bosnia and Kosovo have tracked down and arrested war crimes indictees, appears to have hardened the opposition of Sudanese officials to a U.N. force. Quite predictably, those officials are saying they're not interested in a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur if, as in the Balkans, it would offer them a one-way trip in handcuffs to The Hague.

Those seeking to end the genocide have naturally been seeking new ways to pressure Khartoum. Realistic options for tightening economic sanctions are few. So, having failed to recognize that it was a mistake to call in the ICC, many critics of the regime have compounded the error by trying to ratchet up the threat of ICC prosecution. This, of course, reinforces the regime's impulse to say no. Indeed, it would be hard to devise a policy better calculated to perpetuate Sudan's refusal to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force in Darfur.

If the Sudanese government ever begins to seriously consider agreeing to a U.N. force in Darfur, the first thing it is likely to seek is guarantees against the arrest and prosecution of Sudanese officials by the ICC. But it is not clear that the Security Council would be able to grant the government those guarantees should the international community be prepared to consider such a bargain. In an effort to insulate the ICC from political pressure, the treaty establishing the court seeks to make it impossible for the Security Council to permanently end ICC proceedings once they have commenced.

Should efforts to deploy a U.N. force fail and the genocide continue, options for ending the bloodshed may narrow to some sort of coalition military action. Given China's opposition, such action almost certainly would have to be carried out without Security Council authorization and would be vastly inferior to the deployment of an effective U.N. peacekeeping force.

In the analogous cases of Bosnia and Kosovo, coalition military action was in large measure U.S. military action, and the same would be true in Darfur. No matter how noble our objectives, U.S. military action without U.N. authorization against another Arab government would prove deeply unpopular in many parts of the world, and America would pay a steep political price. If this is where we end up in Darfur -- or if the genocide continues unabated because peacekeepers cannot be deployed -- there will be three culprits to blame: the bloodthirsty regime in Khartoum, the oil-thirsty government in Beijing and the U.N. Security Council's shortsighted decision to bring in the ICC.

EU Energy Strategy Aims To Curb Carbon Emissions (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby and William Echikson

Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

BRUSSELS -- The European Union unveiled an ambitious blueprint for combating global warming and boosting energy efficiency, but key elements of the plan face strong opposition from business interests and could require major battles to get them implemented.

The European Commission yesterday published a long-awaited proposal for the bloc's first common energy strategy, a version of which will be discussed at a summit of the EU's 27 national leaders in March. "Europe must lead the world into a new -- or maybe one should say post-industrial -- revolution: the development of a low-carbon economy," said commission President José Manuel Barroso.

Parts of the draft face high hurdles, however. Business groups expressed alarm at the commission's proposals to cut emissions of carbon dioxide, which is believed to contribute to global warming, 20% from 1990 levels by 2020. The Continent's top business lobby, Unice, warned against any binding targets that would force European industries to pay more for energy than their U.S. and Asian rivals. At the same time, environmentalists said the 20% target is too low.

Meanwhile, France and Germany are likely to block a proposal to boost competition by breaking up European energy companies that control both the supply and distribution networks for oil, gas or electricity -- such as Electricité de France and Germany's E.ON AG. Acknowledging that threat, the commission's proposals also suggest a less drastic option that would submit such vertically integrated companies to greater regulation.

Still, commission officials insisted any opposition won't derail efforts to shake up European energy markets. Energy security, and the need to reduce demand for fossil fuels, has risen to the top of the EU agenda in response to continuing concerns about its predominant supplier of gas and oil, Russia.

If governments don't accept the proposals for separating companies' energy supply and distribution arms, the commission has another weapon available to break up some incumbents: antitrust law. Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes yesterday published the results of a long-running investigation into the energy sector. She accused the Continent's energy giants of raising consumer prices and undermining competition by restricting third-party energy companies' access to their pipelines, storage facilities and networks.

"New players need access to energy suppliers, the energy networks and customers," she said, adding that investigations she has already opened into energy companies in several European countries could lead to "far-reaching structural remedies."

Also under the commission's proposals, 10% of EU vehicles would be powered by biofuels by 2020, up from an existing 5.8% target for 2010. It envisions all new coal-fired power stations having facilities to capture and store the carbon dioxide they emit. In addition, renewable energy sources such as water, wind and solar power are expected by 2020 to provide 20% of the energy.

If the proposals are accepted by national leaders in March, Mr. Barroso said the commission would act quickly to make the targets legally binding.

The EU accounts for 14% of the world's emissions of carbon dioxide, the commission said. Mr. Barroso called on other developed nations to set their own carbon-cutting goals.

"We are not speaking about European warming, we are speaking about global warming," said Mr. Barroso, who this week discussed his plans with President Bush and leaders of Congress. "We need the United States with us; they are, after all, the biggest polluter in the world."

Belarus Yields To Moscow Over Oil Transit (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Belarus backed down in its trade conflict with Russia on Wednesday by abolishing an export duty on oil pipeline transits. The move allows Moscow to resume supplies to Europe via its neighbour.

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus's leader, appears to have climbed down after a telephone conversation with President Vladimir Putin of Russia. Within hours the Belarus government said that a duty imposed on Russian oil shipments at the start of January had "lost its validity". Belarus gave in to Russia's key demand to drop the $45 (€35, £23) per tonne export duty before the countries could start negotiations on their trade relationship.

Transneft, the Russian oil pipeline monopoly, said on Wednesay night that it was about to resume supplies to Europe.

On Monday Russia halted oil supplies through the Druzhba (Friendship) pipeline, which crosses Belarus, claiming that Minsk was siphoning off oil destined for countries such as Germany and Poland as payment in kind for export duty. Moscow said the duty was illegal and refused to pay it.

While Wednesday's move bolstered Mr Putin's prestige at home and strengthened Moscow's hand in its stand-off with its neighbour, the dispute has dented Russia's reputation and its claim to be a reliable energy supplier.

Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, led European Union leaders in condemning the cut in supplies, calling it "unacceptable". Wednesday's deal is the latest step in a protracted stand-off. Russia has doubled gas prices for Belarus and made it agree to sell half its pipeline network to Gazprom, the Russian gas group.

Mr Putin told Russian oil companies this week to be prepared to cut their oil production and threatened to impose barriers to Belarus's exports of other goods to Russia. Russia accounts for half of all Belarus's exports, which are duty free. Any trade blockade or imposition of export duties would have hit Belarus hard.

Andrei Sharonov, the deputy head of Russia's ministry for trade and economic development, said entire sectors of the Belarusan economy, such as meat and milk production as well as electronics and furniture, are more than 90 per cent dependent on the Russian market. Belarus's oil reserves would not have lasted more than six weeks.

Mr Sharonov said Minsk's decision opened the way for negotiations between the two countries on a wide range of trade issues, including Russia's duty on oil exports to Belarus. In addition to doubling gas prices from January 1, Russia hit Belarus with a $180 per tonne export duty on the crude oil it sells to the country.

Until then Belarus had obtained Russian crude oil duty free, refined it and sold petroleum products to western Europe, keeping the profit. Under a mid-1990s agreement, Belarus was supposed to give 85 per cent of that profit to Russia but stopped doing so several years ago.

Russia's export duty and the doubling of gas prices cuts down the subsidy that the Kremlin was, in effect, giving Mr Lukashenko.

A compromise solution could see Russia reducing or removing its export duty on crude oil if Belarus resumed payment to Russia of part of the profit gained on petroleum products.

Belarus, Russia Settle Oil Dispute (AP)

By Yuras Karmanau

AP, January 11, 2007

MINSK, Belarus -- Russian oil began flowing again through a Belarusian pipeline late Wednesday, a top Belarusian oil official said, resolving a dispute between the countries that had disrupted supplies to Eastern Europe as well to the former Soviet Republic.

Alexei Kostuchenko, general director of pipeline concern Gomeltransneft-Druzhba, said Russian oil entered the Belarusian system around 10:30 p.m. local time (2030GMT) Wednesday, and was being pumped to Poland, Germany, Ukraine, Slovakia, the Czech Republic and Hungary. He did not give any details about the volume being moved.

The spat between the two formerly close, ex-Soviet republics showcased the Belarus regime's reliance on cheap Russian energy imports, and stoked doubts in European capitals about Russia and its dependability as an energy supplier.

"The disruptions in oil supplies have yet again undermined Russia's efforts to establish itself as a reliable source of fuel supplies to Europe," Deutsche UFG analysts wrote in a note to investors.

The dispute, which had entered its third day, centered on Russia's decision last month to impose a hefty duty on oil exports to Belarus, with Moscow complaining that the previous duty-free regime cost the Russian budget up to $4 billion a year in lost revenues. Belarus reaped billions in revenues by refining cheap Russia oil products and selling them at hefty profit to European markets.

Minsk _ whose centrally controlled economy is heavily reliant on cheap Russian energy and duty-free trade with Russia _ responded last week by slapping a $45 per ton tax on Russian oil pumped across Belarus to Europe.

On Monday, Russia stopped pumping oil to Europe via the Druzhba pipeline _ whose name translates as "friendship" _ and accused its neighbor of siphoning off oil. By Tuesday, the stoppage had affected supplies to Ukraine, Germany, Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and Slovakia.

With the European Union voicing alarm and criticism and Russia threatening an all-out trade war against its former ally, the two countries' presidents _ Vladimir Putin and Alexander Lukashenko _ held talks by telephone Wednesday.

Soon after, Belarus' government announced the cancellation of the $45-per-ton duty, and Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky announced he would fly to Moscow on Thursday for meetings with his Russian counterpart.

"I hope that within two days we will be able to overcome all disagreements _ on oil, oil products and other sensitive groups of commodities on the Russian and Belarusian markets," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115361

Putin's top economic adviser, meanwhile, reasserted that Russia was a dependable energy supplier. "We act as a reliable partner, and we would like to do so in the future," Igor Shuvalov said.

"We need to understand that that kind of behavior very close to blackmailing can't be accepted by the Russians. If we do accept it this time, than the future can't be secured," he said. "Now we need to act together, the Europeans and the Russians, to avoid this kind of situation in the future."

European Union leaders have strongly criticized the disruptions, which came one year after a price dispute between Russia and Ukraine led to a brief interruption of EU natural gas imports from Russia.

Putin took a harsh stance at a Cabinet meeting Tuesday, and told ministers to consider a possible reduction in oil output. Russia has a limited capacity for refining oil and would have to cut crude output if its exports decrease suddenly.

Analysts say that Putin has grown tired of supporting the Belarusian leader, who has been dubbed "Europe's last dictator" in the West for his authoritarian rule and crackdown on dissent. But the disruption of Russian oil to Europe one year after the Ukraine gas cutoff alarmed European officials and led to renewed calls for energy diversification.

Russia currently supplies a quarter of the EU's oil and over two-fifths of its natural gas.

Belarus Signals Resolution In Oil Dispute (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, January 11, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 — Belarus announced Wednesday that it had reached a compromise with Russia to end a dispute that had shut a Russian oil pipeline to Europe since Monday, but the Kremlin did not confirm any agreement.

The announcement, by President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's office, was the first sign that the dispute might be ending after two days of increasingly hostile remarks and threats.

The Belarussian prime minister, Sergei S. Sidorsky, said later in televised remarks that his country would revoke a transit fee of $45 a ton on Russian oil that it imposed last week, provoking a dispute with swift repercussions in Europe.

Russia had declared the transit fee illegal and refused to pay it. When Belarus began siphoning oil headed to Europe as payment, Russia's pipeline monopoly, Transneft, shut the pipeline. As a result, Poland, Germany, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Hungary had to tap into oil reserves this week.

The conflict with Belarus unfolded only days after Russia's giant energy company, Gazprom, negotiated a significantly higher price for supplies of natural gas to Belarus, Russia's smaller neighbor and one of its closest allies. The new price, $100 per thousand cubic meters, compared with $46 last year, infuriated Mr. Lukashenko, but a separate decision by Russia to impose a customs duty of $180 per metric ton on Russian oil prompted the Belarussian transit fee.

Mr. Sidorsky said he would fly to Moscow for more talks on Wednesday, an indication that a final resolution had not been found. "We hope to solve all other questions in the coming days," he said.

Russia had said that it would hold no talks until the transit fee was lifted. The statement by Mr. Lukashenko's office said the two governments would settle the dispute by Friday.

By Wednesday night, Semyon M. Vainshtok, the president of Transneft, said the company had reached an agreement to ship 79,000 tons of oil that Belarus had siphoned into its own storage facilities. He said the company could resume full operations by Thursday, though he suggested that outstanding issues remained.

The Kremlin announced only that President Vladimir V. Putin had discussed the issue by telephone with Mr. Lukashenko. Mr. Putin was steadfast on Tuesday, warning that Russia would divert oil intended for European markets around Belarus, though that could take time.

In the meantime, the pipeline, called Druzhba, or Friendship, remained closed for a third day, despite statements in Slovakia that some oil was set to resume flowing.

Druzhba stretches 2,500 miles and pumps 1.8 million barrels of oil a day in two trunks. It accounts for considerable amounts of the oil consumed in Germany, the Czech Republic and Poland, and almost all oil used by Hungary and Slovakia.

DOJ_NMG_0115362

A swift resolution would ease jitters over the reliability of oil supplies in Europe. Russia has forced Belarus, for years a close ally, to back off. But the episode has done further damage to Russia's international image, already battered by a shut-off of natural gas to Ukraine last January and a threat to do so to Belarus this year.

"We consider it unacceptable, this kind of event," the European Commission president, José Manuel Barroso, said in Brussels, where the European Union announced a sweeping energy policy meant to address concerns like those Russia had raised.

Echoing remarks by Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany on Tuesday, he criticized Russia for stopping the flow of oil without first notifying the customers paying for it farther along the pipeline.

The dispute grew from Russia's new strategy to increase energy prices for the other former republics of the Soviet Union. Now independent, but still tied into the Soviet-era network of gas and oil pipelines, those countries had long enjoyed subsidized prices.

Russia has recently negotiated higher prices for natural gas with Ukraine, Georgia, Azerbaijan and Moldova. Those deals have sometimes followed threats and cutoffs as deadlines, typically on New Year's Day, approached.

"For Russia, a small, victorious energy war is becoming a New Year's tradition," the newspaper Trud, or Labor, wrote Wednesday.

Stefan Czucz, the general director of Transpetrol, Slovakia's pipeline operator, said in a telephone interview that a resumption of oil shipments was scheduled for Wednesday, but officials in Russia said late Wednesday that the pipeline had not resumed operation.

William C. Ramsay, deputy executive director of the International Energy Agency in Paris, which maintains and improves systems for coping with oil supply disruptions, said that refineries and other companies dependent on Russian oil generally had 10 to 15 days worth of commercial stocks.

Once those reserves run out, the refineries would have to turn to strategic stocks built by governments. Those could last at least 90 days. "They have learned the need to take care, especially since they are dependent on Russia and have had some problems in the past," he said in a telephone interview.

The duty Russia imposed on the oil exports to Belarus, the same Russia charges for exports to other countries, could cost the Belarussian government $3.5 billion, more than 10 percent of the country's gross domestic product. Belarus had long profited by refining the oil and exporting the products.

"It simply puts Belarus on the same footing as all the other countries of the world," Andrei V. Sharonov, a deputy economic development minister, said of the new charge in an interview published in the official state newspaper, Rossiskaya Gazeta.

Russia-Belarus Standoff Over Oil Ends, Clearing Way For Accord (WP)

By Peter Finn

Washington Post, January 11, 2007

MOSCOW, Jan. 10 -- A standoff between Russia and Belarus that led to the shutdown of a pipeline that delivers crude oil to European Union countries ended Wednesday, after Belarus backed down and lifted a duty it had imposed on Russian fuel transiting the country.

The breakthrough came after Russian President Vladimir Putin spoke by phone Wednesday afternoon to his Belarusan counterpart, Alexander Lukashenko. The Belarusan presidential press service said that the countries' prime ministers had been told "to propose ways of settling all problems and to submit them to the presidents by Friday."

Belarus's imposition of the duty led Russia to switch off the flow of oil, a move greeted with dismay in Western Europe. Leaders there wondered aloud about Russia's reliability as an energy supplier.

Oil began flowing again late Wednesday, the Associated Press reported from Minsk, the Belarusan capital, citing a senior pipeline official.

In Brussels, European Union officials on Wednesday unveiled a long-term energy plan to reduce the continent's dependence on oil and gas and limit the greenhouse gas emissions blamed for global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0115363

"Europe must lead the world into a new . . . post-industrial revolution, the development of a low-carbon economy," said Jos? Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission, the E.U.'s executive arm. "We need new policies to face a new reality."

The E.U. plan, which will be discussed by the 27 member states in February, calls for greenhouse gas emissions to be cut by at least 20 percent below 1990 levels by 2020. That goes beyond the Kyoto Protocol of 1997, which called for the E.U. overall to cut to 8 percent below 1990 levels by 2012.

The United States has refused to sign the accord, arguing that it would damage the American economy and, to be fair, should require countries such as China and India to meet similar goals.

"We are not speaking about European warming, we are speaking about global warming," Barroso said. "We need the United States with us -- they are, after all, the biggest polluter in the world."

It is uncertain if the E.U. plan will be accepted by the member governments and, if so, whether the targets can be met. A number of European countries, including Italy and Spain, are already having trouble meeting the Kyoto requirements. Environmentalists would like to see even more ambitious goals to reduce emissions.

The plan emphasizes the development of renewable energy, such as biofuels, and new low-pollution technologies, as well as the reduction of emissions from existing energy sources. It does not call for increased reliance on nuclear energy, which emits no carbon dioxide, the most significant of the gases that trap heat in Earth's atmosphere.

Barroso said nuclear energy would be a matter for individual states to decide.

He also said Europe should "actively develop a common external energy policy and speak with one voice to third countries" -- a clear reference to Russia.

The union has been divided in its approach to Russia, with Poland, for instance, objecting to a pipeline under the Baltic Sea that will directly connect Russia to Germany.

Belarus, which is heavily dependent on Russian energy subsidies, has been smarting from increases in the prices it pays for Russian natural gas and the crude oil that it profitably reprocessed before selling it to Western Europe. It imposed the duties on Russian oil transshipments in response; Russia asserts Belarus was also siphoning off oil for its own use.

Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said he planned to fly to Moscow on Thursday for talks. "I hope that we will settle all mutual differences and claims relating to Russian oil deliveries in two days," Sidorsky told reporters in Minsk.

Russia had earlier insisted that lifting the oil duty, which it said was illegal, was a nonnegotiable precondition for any talks. It was unclear if Putin promised Belarus anything in return. The Kremlin issued a terse statement saying that Putin and Lukashenko had discussed "energy relations," among other issues.

Chávez Begins New Term Vowing Socialism (NYT)

By Simon Romero

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela, Jan. 10 — President Hugo Chávez was sworn in to a new six-year term at a ceremony here on Wednesday in which he described Jesus as “the greatest socialist in history” and pledged to speed Venezuela’s metamorphosis into a Socialist country.

“Fatherland! Socialism or death, I swear it!” Mr. Chávez yelled as he was sworn in and given the presidential sash and a golden key to the tomb where the remains of Simón Bolívar, the South American liberator, are interred.

In his speech, the president defended his decision this week to nationalize companies in the telecommunications and electricity industries and promised to seek greater control over natural gas projects. He also renewed his request to Congress for decree powers, saying a “revolutionary law of laws” would allow him to hasten the construction of Socialism.

Since his re-election last month, Mr. Chávez has moved swiftly to group his varied supporters into a single Socialist party. In addition to his nationalization campaign, he has called for the end of the central bank’s independence from politics and the rewriting of the commercial code.

Headlines in the afternoon newspapers here reflected continuing polarization over his ideas. “Socialism Has Arrived,” proclaimed El Mundo, which, like most Venezuelan newspapers is friendly to Mr. Chávez’s government. Tal Cual, a small opposition paper, titled its main editorial “The Monarch.”

Teodoro Petkoff, editor of Tal Cual, said Mr. Chávez's "21st-century Socialism" had exhibited the same autocratic characteristics of Socialist movements of the 20th century.

Others pointed to the president's political instincts as an explanation for his sharp ideological turn.

Fernando Coronil, an authority on Venezuelan history at the University of Michigan, said Mr. Chávez was acutely aware of his supporters' high expectations of change. His effort to redefine the ideological and organization basis of his government, from the creation of a single party to the concentration of power in the presidency, are a response to that reading of popular sentiment, Mr. Coronil said.

"People voted for Chávez but didn't give him a blank check," he said. "Now he has to pay back."

In his speech on Wednesday, Mr. Chávez, who hinted at the possibility of seeking another term once this one ends in 2012, seemed to evoke Fidel Castro's leftward ideological evolution in the years after taking power in Cuba in 1959. Mr. Chávez, who has forged a tight economic alliance with Cuba, peppered his speech with references to the works of two Italian Marxist theorists, Antonio Gramsci and Antonio Negri.

He weaved in quotations from Napoleon and Trotsky, saying Trotsky had the right idea when he said, "The revolution never ends." He also quoted liberally from the writings of Bolívar and the Bible.

He railed against his domestic political opponents and dissidents in the Roman Catholic Church, singling out Archbishop Roberto Luckert of Coro, who recently criticized the president's decision not to renew the broadcast license of RCTV, one of Venezuela's oldest television stations.

"Monsignor Luckert is going to wait for me in hell," he said.

After his speech, Mr. Chávez traveled to Managua to attend a similar ceremony for Daniel Ortega, the former Sandinista guerrilla leader elected president of Nicaragua. Venezuela is preparing to sign a farreaching economic assistance agreement with Nicaragua.

Fidel Chavez? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

VENEZUELA'S presidential election last month might have been free and fair, but it's increasingly unlikely that its next one will be. President Hugo Chavez has apparently taken his landslide victory as a mandate to impose an authoritarian socialism on his nation that looks frighteningly like the model created by his idol, Cuba's Fidel Castro. If his drive to consolidate power over the media, the telecommunications industry and other sectors succeeds, by the time his term expires six years from now it may no longer be possible to hold a free election in Venezuela.

Chavez's plan to nationalize the country's biggest telecommunications and electricity companies, announced Monday and reiterated during his inauguration Wednesday, will exact a heavy toll in the coming years. Aside from the immediate damage from foreign investors fleeing the country, these enterprises almost certainly will be diminished and bled dry by government bureaucrats eager to dole out money and patronage. This is already happening in Venezuela's oil industry.

Chavez also seems intent on destroying Venezuela's civil society. He already controls all three branches of government, with all 167 seats of Congress held by lawmakers allied to Chavez and with the Supreme Court stacked with loyalists. After his reelection, he announced plans to merge his coalition of allied parties — effectively creating a one-party state — and to pursue a constitutional amendment ending presidential term limits, meaning he could run indefinitely.

Now he's setting his sights on a critical barrier to totalitarianism: the independent media. Last month, Chavez announced that he wouldn't renew the license of Radio Caracas Television (RCTV), which has been highly critical of his regime. His justification was a law passed in 2004 that allows for non-renewal of a broadcast license if its holder is guilty of such things as promoting disruption of public order or endangering national security. RCTV's crime, apparently, was to celebrate the botched coup attempt against Chavez in 2002.

Any criticism of Chavez or his henchmen can now be interpreted as disrupting public order, and Venezuela also has passed harsh libel laws aimed at curbing "disrespect" of government officials. Though RCTV is just one of many opposition media outlets, Chavez has sent a chilling message to the rest that he can shut them down at any time.

A country without an independent media, judiciary or legislature is by nobody's definition a democracy. Venezuela's people may just have succeeded in voting themselves out of power.

U.N. Agency Chief Denies Getting Staff Complaints (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK -- Jose Antonio Ocampo, the head of the U.N. Department of Economic and Social Affairs (DESA), yesterday defended his management of the scandal-laden "good governance" division, saying that he personally had initiated internal investigations and shut down a foundering office within his department.

In his first public remarks on DESA's scandal-plagued Division of Public Administration and Development Management unit, or DPADM, since the opening of a U.N. investigation prompted by a Washington Times article last month, Mr. Ocampo also denied having received complaints from staff about concerns that range from mismanagement of government funds to favoritism and intimidation in the hiring and disciplining of employees.

"We have a clear policy, anyone can come to me, or go to the ombudswoman and share their observations, and their privacy will be respected," Mr. Ocampo said in response to questions. "But nobody has so far."

That claim flies in the face of documents and accounts given to The Times showing that several staff members complained to Mr. Ocampo, both in person and in writing, about purported mismanagement, intimidation and favoritism in DPADM between 2003 and 2006. There are at least three cases pending before the U.N. Joint Appeals Board, which adjudicates personnel matters.

Several former DESA staffers said they had reported through official channels what they saw as the fraudulent use of contractors, favoritism toward Italians and management decisions that were redundant and senseless. Between 2003 and 2006, these staffers and their lawyer said, they clashed directly with their supervisor, DPADM Director Guido Bertucci, while others went to Mr. Ocampo with evidence.

In mid-December, the U.S. Mission to the United Nations wrote to the U.N. Office of Internal Oversight Services advising it of "reports alleging that the DPADM has threatened to retaliate against staff members who have brought this matter to light" and warning that evidence might be destroyed.

Additionally, correspondence obtained by The Times over the course of a two-month investigation shows that the Greek government requested an investigation into potential misuse of about $5 million.

Athens had contributed the money in 1999 to build a center in Thessaloniki that promoted "public service professionalism" among Mediterranean nations. But just three years later DPADM opened a duplicative center in Naples.

The findings of that investigation were to have been released in December, but the report was delayed while DPADM compiled a lengthy response to its contents. U.N. officials said yesterday it could be released within two weeks.

The second investigation was opened on Dec. 17 after a report in The Times uncovered evidence of favoritism and intimidation within DPADM, which is responsible for promoting transparency and accountability among member governments.

The article noted that tens of millions of dollars have been contributed by the government of Italy and spent on consultants and projects that directly benefited Italian nationals and the government itself.

The Department of Economic and Social Affairs is a sprawling U.N. office with more than 570 employees and an annual budget of $267 million, nearly half of that voluntarily contributed by governments. Its divisions gather statistics or promote policy on sustainable development, women's empowerment, good governance, accessibility and related issues.

"In the United Nations we have an internal control system," Mr. Ocampo said of the U.N. investigation. "What we're doing is to let the internal control system work."

He defended his decision not to remove Mr. Bertucci from his post as DPADM director, as is customary in other U.N. departments when there is a comprehensive investigation under way.

"If [the investigation] indicates that there were improprieties, we will take a measure," Mr. Ocampo said. "But any justice system, including the U.N. justice system, is based on the principle of presumption of innocence."

DOJ_NMG_0115366

Asked several times whether he trusted Mr. Bertucci, the undersecretary-general said only, "He is under investigation, and I will take into account whatever the investigation says."

Limited Menu Japan's 'Cancer Refugees' Demand More Options (WSJ)

By Peter Landers

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

TOKYO -- With the prime minister looking on, a legislator named Takashi Yamamoto stood before Japan's parliament last May and told his colleagues that he had cancer. Then he denounced the nation's standard of cancer care. "Even when there are treatments, people are being told they will never get better," he said. "These abandoned cancer refugees are roaming the Japanese archipelago."

The speech galvanized the parliament, which had been dawdling over a bill that called for more cancer specialists and a permanent role for patients in policy making. Within four weeks, the bill became law. (Read translated excerpts of Mr. Yamamoto's speech.1)

"Even when there are treatments, people are being told they will never get better. These abandoned cancer refugees are roaming the Japanese archipelago."

-- Read excerpts3 of the May 22, 2006, speech by Takashi Yamamoto

It was a signal victory for a spreading movement in Japan among patients who want American-style care and drugs for cancer. But the idea of becoming more like the U.S. raises alarms among policy makers. In Japan, the government guarantees that everyone has health-insurance coverage and it pays most of the bills.

Masaharu Nakajima, until recently director general of the Health Bureau at the Ministry of Health, Labor and Welfare, says Japan already offers excellent cancer care. With a huge national debt and corporations worried about higher taxes, Japan can't afford to throw money into treatments and training that offer little hope of significantly extending lifespans, he says.

"If we keep going like this, Japan is going to be crushed under medical expenses," says Dr. Nakajima, a surgeon who used to treat cancer patients before joining the ministry. Referring to the demand for more specialists, he says: "America did too much of this and that's why their medical costs have grown."

The debate in Japan raises the question of where nations should draw the line when modern medicine offers almost unlimited ways to spend money. In the U.S., both private insurers and public programs such as Medicare take a relatively generous view, usually paying for treatments that offer some hope of helping the patient. Japan is far more tightfisted. Spending on health in Japan each year is roughly half the level of U.S. spending, adjusting for the size of each country's economy.

Health spending in Japan is even lower than in most Western European countries and Canada. Yet if that's hurting people, it's hard to find evidence in the statistics. Japan has the world's highest life expectancy for women (men are No. 4) and one of the world's lowest infant-mortality rates.

Many countries are grappling with how to improve care while containing costs. In Japan, debate about the system has focused on cancer, by far the nation's leading killer. The Internet has helped break down patients' isolation from information about their disease and supplied data on foreign treatments. Cancer activists believe inadequate treatment on occasion cuts short the lives of Japanese. Some focus their ire on the very notion that mortality numbers can measure the value a health-care system delivers.

Hidesuke Hashimoto, who has been treated for lung cancer and leads a patients' group, says Japanese bureaucrats, unlike Americans, fail to recognize the value of pursuing all possible avenues of treatment when a person is seriously ill. "Our rights as individuals aren't being recognized," says Mr. Hashimoto, a 68-year-old retired math teacher. "We have the right to live." More government spending on health care, he suggests, would be a small price to pay for promoting democracy and the rights enshrined in Japan's U.S.-written constitution. Article 25 says all people are entitled to a minimum standard of "wholesome and cultured living."

Cancer accounted for 326,000 deaths among Japanese in 2005, or 30% of the total -- more than heart attacks and strokes combined. The rate of cancer deaths per 100,000 population continues to rise slightly, in contrast to a slight decline in the U.S. Whether poor care has something to do with that is a matter of debate. Demographics and lifestyles also may play a role: Japan is a rapidly aging nation where nearly half of men smoke, while obesity and heart disease are relatively uncommon. Those factors tend to increase the proportion of deaths caused by cancer.

Since Japan introduced universal health-insurance coverage in the late 1950s and early 1960s, its policy has focused on ensuring a minimum standard of care for all. People are required to pay a monthly health-insurance fee. Large companies must also pay health-insurance fees, but the rules of the game -- what is covered, how much doctors get paid -- are mainly set by the central government in Tokyo.

After World War II, Japan achieved an improvement in life expectancy just as spectacular as its rise to become the world's second-largest economy. Japanese women have been the longest-lived in the world since 1985, according to the health ministry.

Meanwhile, the government's frugality has helped keep medical costs at a minimum. The restrictions aren't like those in England, where the government employs most of the doctors. Japan is the largest example of a "third way" medical system, also common in continental Europe, that combines universal health insurance with private doctors.

Japan saves by requiring less training of doctors and paying them less. Aspiring doctors typically go to medical school straight out of high school and become M.D.'s in just six years, compared with eight years of post-high-school education in the U.S. Until 2004, Japanese doctors could go straight into practice without any internship. (Now they must serve as interns for at least two years.) The average doctor's annual income is just over $100,000, compared with about $200,000 in the U.S.

Doctors say they have little time for patients. Because people in Japan are generally free to visit any doctor they like, the experience of going to a doctor who's popular is often summed up as "a three-hour wait for a three-minute visit." Health spending in Japan is about 9% of gross domestic product, versus 16% in the U.S.

The frugality has extended to cancer care. More than in the U.S., surgeons take a major role, including deciding on drug treatment -- typically the province of a specialized cancer doctor in the U.S. Through the late 1990s, the concept of a second opinion was virtually unknown. Today, Japanese people borrow the English words and talk about getting a "sekando opinion."

Until recently, cancer patients often did little to buck the system for a simple reason: Many weren't told they had the disease. It was common for patients to place complete trust in their doctor and refrain from asking why they were receiving an operation or medicine. Family members usually heard the true diagnosis, but they often felt it was cruel to burden the patient with that information.

Shintaro Abe, a politician and father of Japan's prime minister, Shinzo Abe, was widely known to have cancer for two years before his death in 1991. But the elder Mr. Abe was kept in the dark about his pancreatic tumor until his final two months, when he suspected the truth, according to his widow's memoirs.

Mr. Hashimoto, the former math teacher, says he was first diagnosed with liver cancer in 1990 and underwent surgery to remove a tumor, but his family kept the diagnosis from him. He says he was shocked when his son told him in 1999 that he had cancer and it had spread to his lungs. The son wanted Mr. Hashimoto, who lives near Kobe, to travel to Tokyo to get chemotherapy at the National Cancer Center and realized it was no longer possible to hide the diagnosis.

Unlike most Japanese patients, Mr. Hashimoto dived into studying his disease, scouring books and the Internet. "I was told twice that there were no more treatments for me," he says, but each time, he moved to a new hospital for experimental treatment, sometimes paying out of pocket for procedures not covered by the state. He joined and eventually led a patients' group.

With his activism, Mr. Hashimoto was joining a growing movement. Around the turn of the century, new chemotherapy drugs and the spread of the Internet spawned a class of activist cancer patients. The government was quick to approve a handful of drugs that clearly could extend lives -- in particular Novartis AG's Gleevec, which was approved in Japan the same year as the U.S. But other drugs with more marginal benefits languished for years. Sometimes foreign drug makers were slow to seek approval in Japan, fearing the government-set price would be too low to make it worth their while.

HOW MUCH FOR HEALTH?

The Issue: At a time when medicine offers countless ways to spend money, where should a nation draw the line?

The News: In Japan, which spends far less than the U.S. does on health care, some cancer patients demand access to more drugs and survival options.

What's at Stake: Patient choices and spending levels in Japan, as well as drug companies' market penetration.

DOJ_NMG_0115368

To desperate patients, it was infuriating that the government didn't rush every potential life-saver to market, however slim its benefits might be. One example is Eloxatin, a drug that has been shown to extend lives by a few months, on average, in patients with recurring colorectal tumors. After patients held street rallies passing out fliers and repeatedly visited parliament, Japan approved the drug in 2005, nearly three years after the U.S.

Other drugs have yet to make it to Japan. The government is reviewing Avastin, approved in the U.S. in February 2004. The Genentech Inc. drug also can extend lives by several months on average but costs tens of thousands of dollars a year.

A movement for more drugs and better care culminated in May 2005 when 2,000 patients and family members packed a hall in Osaka for the first national convention of cancer patients. One of the organizers, Shoichi Miura, was a doctor and himself a cancer patient. In his speech, he summoned up a common image here: the "gan nanmin," or cancer refugee. "While Japan has become economically prosperous, cancer patients are in the same position as refugees who wander in search of food, water and someone who can help," said Dr. Miura, who died seven months later.

THE HEALTH OF NATIONS

See data from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development comparing health spending and outcomes4 in the U.S., Western Europe, Japan and selected other countries. (Or read a Kaiser Family Foundation summary5.)

Also, the World Health Organization's World Health Report6 holds health data on the 192 U.N. member nations.

Japan's public-television network, NHK, added to the chorus with a two-night prime-time documentary that portrayed Japan as far behind the U.S. in cancer care. NHK introduced the nationwide audience to a hospital in Texarkana, Texas, and showed a meeting in which 25 doctors, nurses and other specialists discussed cancer patients' care. It contrasted that with Japan, where a single doctor, with minimal consultation, might make a diagnosis, decide treatment and carry it out.

The public pressure has had an impact. Last April, for the first time a medical society designated 47 doctors who had passed rigorous tests as certified oncologists, cancer specialists qualified to administer chemotherapy drugs. The U.S. has had a similar process since 1973, overseen by the American Board of Internal Medicine, and today thousands of oncologists are certified by the board.

The law passed by parliament last June doesn't call for immediate new spending, but it creates targets and committees that will force the health ministry to do more, says Mr. Yamamoto, the legislator whose speech spurred the law's passage. "Cancer patients are becoming informed and beginning to act. It is late compared to America," he says.

Mr. Yamamoto says Japan should be ready to raise taxes to finance more generous care for cancer patients and others. He himself has gone to a maverick doctor who charges patients $420 out of pocket for a consultation and believes in aggressive treatment.

But government leaders show little willingness to fund a big expansion in health care. The government is grappling with a huge budget deficit left over from the 1990s.

The health ministry has slashed doctor reimbursements and raised co-payments for patients. Many people must pay 30% of their doctor bills, in addition to their regular health-insurance fees, and the maximum monthly out-of-pocket cost went up on Oct. 1 to 80,100 yen ($670) from 72,300 yen. Meanwhile, the government cut doctors' average reimbursement by 1.36% last year following a similar cut in 2002.

That infuriates doctors. "It's been one cutback after another," says Toshio Nakagawa, a neurosurgeon who serves on the board of the Japan Medical Association. "This time I think they've gone too far."

Dr. Nakajima, the recently retired health ministry official, says policy makers must also worry about the competitiveness of Japanese companies. "Executives want to keep costs down," he says.

Dr. Nakajima says a diligent surgeon who bones up on the latest literature can do just as good a job as a licensed oncologist. He says cancer patients may feel reassured if they see a certificate on their doctor's wall, but that feeling alone isn't worth blowing the government's budget. Says Dr. Nakajima, "It's simply not the case that the survival rate goes up just because somebody got a certification."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Hamas Suspects Defended (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Azam Ahmed

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

Muhammad Salah was trying to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people when he became a pawn of Israeli officials seeking to influence U.S. policy, his lawyer argued Wednesday.

Firing back after two days of prosecution arguments, Salah's lawyer, Michael Deutsch, attacked the case against his client, a Bridgeview businessman accused of being a leading member of the radical Palestinian group Hamas.

An attorney for Salah's co-defendant, Abdelhaleem Ashqar, also gave his final argument, telling jurors that Ashqar resisted Israel's occupation of Palestinian territories but insisted on following the law.

Deutsch's argument focused on the heart of the government's case: a handwritten confession and statements that Salah allegedly provided while in Israeli custody in 1993.

To accept Salah's guilt, jurors must accept a confession extracted through torture, Deutsch said.

"You can say we're not going to have a case in an American courtroom that's based on a foreign government's systematic use of torture," Deutsch said.

Prosecutors charge Salah, a U.S. citizen, and Ashqar, a longtime resident, with using the safe haven of this country to transfer funds, coordinate operations and provide other aid to Hamas, an organization responsible for many terrorist attacks.

Arrested by Israeli police in Gaza in January 1993, Salah confessed to being a Hamas military commander during 54 days of interrogation that included physical and psychological torments, Deutsch said.

Jurors should reject the testimony of two Israeli interrogators, "Nadav" and "Benny," that Salah confessed voluntarily, Deutsch said.

The interrogators, who testified under official aliases, lied constantly on the stand, Deutsch said.

Prosecutors acknowledged in court that Israeli interrogators were permitted to use coercive tactics such as hooding prisoners and forcing them to sit handcuffed in a small chair. Nadav and Benny denied Salah was subjected to such treatment.

"They want you to believe he was a military commander who cooperated without any coercion or torture," Deutsch said.

He told jurors that it was the other way around—Salah had no militant background but was tortured into saying he did.

The purpose of his arrest, torture and confession was an intrigue developed at the highest levels of the Israeli government to convince the FBI that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S., Deutsch said.

While access to Israeli interrogation facilities is extremely limited, a New York Times reporter, through the intervention of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, was permitted to view an interrogation session of Salah.

The reporter, Judith Miller, testified that as a result she wrote a front-page story stating that Hamas was developing cells in the U.S.

"No one in the U.S. government really believed the U.S. was an important haven for Hamas," Deutsch said. Miller testified that her article began to change that skepticism.

Wednesday's arguments by the defense attorneys were steeped in the history of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and the hardships they say the Palestinians have endured.

Palestinians often lack access to basic services such as medical care, fresh water, sewage systems and schools, both defense attorneys said.

Humanitarian issues became a major focus in the trial, as Deutsch argued that Salah carried funds to the territories to ease the suffering of his people, not for militant operations.

Salah was captured in 1993 with $100,000 in cash. Bank records show Hamas leader Mousa Abu Marzook had transferred him nearly $1 million, which prosecutors said was intended to fund violence.

But the money transfers were completely transparent, and they went through Salah's personal bank account, Deutsch said. That is not the practice of someone funding illicit operations, he said.

Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt, compared the struggle of Palestinians to historic fights against repression, from the American Revolution to the civil rights movement. He showed jurors a mock "wanted" poster charging George Washington with terrorism.

Ashqar is accused of coordinating communication for Hamas and archiving key documents.

Moffitt argued that creating a historical archive was Ashqar's right as a Palestinian.

"They have every right to be the first authors of their history," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115373

Moffitt briefly addressed a series of secretly recorded conversations in which Ashqar discussed violent operations by Hamas. He said that despite the disturbing nature of the calls, Ashqar is never heard planning any militant attacks or recruiting anyone to perform such acts.

Moffitt pointed to a secretly recorded statement by Ashqar in which he told alleged fellow Hamas members, "Anything we undertake must be a studied legal work."

Both defense lawyers questioned the timeliness of the government's 2004 indictment, pointing out that nearly all of the charges in the case stem from events that occurred in the early 1990s.

After Salah was released from Israeli custody in 1997, he returned home to Bridgeview under strict government scrutiny. Yet prosecutors produced no evidence that Salah did anything on behalf of Hamas from the time of his return to the U.S. to the present, Deutsch said.

"This is not a case about terrorism but about fairness and justice," he said.

Terror Trial Defendants Described As Humanitarians (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

The Belleville News Democrat, January 11, 2007

CHICAGO - Hoarse from hours of talking, defense attorneys said Wednesday that two men accused of bankrolling Hamas terrorists sought to ease the plight of downtrodden Palestinians but never violated the law.

"He's a Palestinian patriot but that doesn't mean he's a killer," William Moffitt said in his closing argument on behalf of Abdelhaleem Ashqar, a former assistant professor of business at Howard University.

Ashqar, 48, of Springfield, Va., and former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, are accused by the federal government of serving as major suppliers of funds and fresh recruits for Hamas terrorist operations.

Salah's attorney, Michael E. Deutsch, said in his closing argument earlier Wednesday, that when his client was arrested in Israel in January 1993 the $97,400 found in his hotel room was for charitable contributions.

He urged jurors not to believe admissions Salah made while being questioned by Israel's Shin Bet security agents at a prison in Ramallah. He said Salah was tortured and said anything the agents wanted to hear.

"In the mind of the interrogators anything is justified if it will secure the State of Israel - they will lie, they will torture people," he said. He said Israel used Salah to get publicity and pressure the U.S. government to crack down on the Hamas fundraising network in this country.

At the trial, two Shin Bet agents, testifying under the aliases Nadav and Benny lest they become targets for reprisals, denied they tortured Salah and said that after much coaxing he willingly told how he delivered cash to leaders in the military underground operated by Hamas.

But the U.S. government was forced to concede that at the time Salah was captured those under interrogation were sometimes hooded, forced to sit handcuffed in a tiny chair and deprived of sleep. Interrogators were authorized to slap detainees at times, the government acknowledged.

The admissions on the part of the U.S. State Department were read into evidence in lieu of classified material the defense could not present.

Both Deutsch, a longtime Chicago civil liberties lawyer, and the Washington-based Moffitt focused hard on the grim living conditions under the Israeli army's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza strip.

Deutsch likened those who fight to reverse the fortunes of the downtrodden Palestinian people to Nat Turner and other leaders of the slave rebellions in the American past. But he insisted that Salah never participated in any Mideast violence.

Moffitt pointed out that those uprooted at the birth of Israel and still living in squalid, poverty-wracked camps on the West Bank resemble victims of Hurricane Katrina.

"They are refugees in their own country," Moffitt said. He cited the writings of Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and told jurors that "in order to be free, you must struggle against oppression."

Moffitt scored a major victory in a similar trial in Florida a year ago, securing the acquittal of professor Sami al-Arian on a number of charges that helped to the the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group.

The Florida jury deadlocked on other federal charges against al-Arian.

Ashqar signed Moffitt as his attorney after the Florida trial.

Moffitt brushed off testimony that Ashqar had convened a convention of Hamas-related groups in Philadelphia in 1993, saying the former professor was merely exercizing his freedom of speech and never proposed violence.

He also scoffed at claims Ashqar funneled money to Hamas, saying doing so was perfectly legal until 1995 as long as the purpose didn't violate the law. Prosecutors say the money bankrolled terrorist attacks.

Moffitt began by recalling how proud he felt that his father had thrown rocks at hooded Ku Klux Klan members in the streets of Atlanta. He quoted from the Declaration of Independence and told jurors that the British had denounced its author, Thomas Jefferson, as a terrorist.

"Its really easy to call someone a terrorist when you haven't walked in his shoes," Moffitt said. He flashed a wanted poster on the screen on the courtroom wall. The picture on the poster was of George Washington.

Prosecutors delivered two days of arguments earlier this week, and assistant U.S. Attorney Reid J. Schar on Thursday is due to deliver the government's rebuttal to defense attorneys' arguments.

CIA Defends Document Secrecy At Trial (AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK — The CIA cannot reveal "alternative interrogation methods" used on terrorists because doing so would cause exceptionally grave damage to national security by telling enemies how the agency gathers intelligence, the government has told a judge.

In a document dated Friday and filed in U.S. District Court in New York, the CIA said it cannot reveal more than what President Bush said last summer about the detention and questioning of terrorism suspects.

The American Civil Liberties Union had asked the court to require the CIA to turn over two Justice Department memos discussing interrogation methods and a presidential order concerning the CIA's authorization to set up detention facilities outside the United States.

On Wednesday, ACLU attorney Amrit Singh said in a statement that the CIA court document "uses national security as a pretext for withholding evidence that high-level government officials in all likelihood authorized abusive techniques that amount to torture."

He added: "This declaration is especially disturbing because it suggests that unlawful interrogation techniques cleared by the Justice Department for use by the CIA still remain in effect. The American public has a right to know how the government is treating its prisoners."

On Sept. 6, Bush acknowledged the existence of a CIA terrorist detention and interrogation program and said the agency used an alternative set of interrogation procedures to question some suspects. He said 14 suspected terrorists in CIA custody had been transferred to the U.S. Naval Base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The president said he could not describe the interrogation techniques because doing so would help terrorists determine how to resist questioning.

"Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaida and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland," Bush said.

The CIA also told the court that it knows al-Qaida trains operatives in interrogation resistance and would make its resistance techniques more effective if it knew how the CIA operated.

The deputy director of the ACLU's National Security Program, Jameel Jaffer, said the president and his legal advisers used the secret memos to create a legal framework so the CIA could violate U.S. and international law.

"While national security sometimes requires secrecy, it is increasingly clear that these documents are being kept secret not for national security reasons, but for political ones," he said.

3 Relatives Of Plotter Are Held By Officials (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, January 10, 2007

The parents and sister of a man convicted of conspiring to bomb the Herald Square subway station were detained yesterday by federal immigration authorities, who have been seeking to deport them to Pakistan.

The arrests came a day after the convicted man, Shahawar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced in United States District Court in Brooklyn to 30 years in prison.

The family, who came to the United States in 1999, had been seeking asylum since 2003, citing religious persecution in their home country.

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement said that Mr. Siraj's father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54, was arrested because a final deportation order had been filed against him. But a lawyer for the family said his case was still under appeal.

The agency spokesman, Mark Thorn, said that the man's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, were arrested and detained on immigration violations.

Mr. Thorn said that the mother and daughter would be given due process and that their cases would be heard by an immigration judge. He said he could provide no more information, because it was the agency's policy not to discuss case details. Mr. Thorn could not explain why the action was taken yesterday, other than to say that the detention was part of an administrative process and that criminal cases take priority over administrative ones. It was unclear why the criminal case against Mr. Siraj would have delayed the detentions.

The lawyer for the family, Mona Shah, disputed that a final order of removal had been entered against Mr. Rehman. She said he still has an appeal pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

"It's absolutely disgusting that they've picked him up under the guise of a deportation order," Ms. Shah said yesterday. "Fine, punish the son. But why punish them like this?"

She could not offer an explanation for the timing of the move, but suggested that it might stem from pressure on the authorities because the family's immigration status was cited in news reports about Mr. Siraj's case.

The immigration status of Mr. Rehman's wife and daughter hinge on his asylum case, Ms. Shah said. All three were picked up at their home in Jackson Heights, Queens, early yesterday morning. Mr. Thorn said they will be held at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Mr. Siraj, who was convicted on May 24 of conspiring to place an explosive device in the Herald Square subway station in 2004, had also filed for asylum on the same grounds as his father, religious persecution.

Ms. Shah said that all members of the family are Ismaili Muslims, a sect that she said has been mistreated in Pakistan. She said family members had been robbed and attacked several times. "They would be subject to torture and harassment if they returned," she said.

But prosecutors during Mr. Siraj's trial in the bomb plot suggested that he had lied to immigration authorities in his asylum request. They cited his own testimony in an earlier hearing, when he had first told immigration authorities that he did not fear harm if he returned to his native Pakistan. But later, in Mr. Siraj's asylum application, prosecutors pointed out that he said he was afraid.

Also, on tapes secretly recorded by a police informer and played at his trial, he said he had no fear of returning to Pakistan and spoke about influential family members who served as judges and magistrates. He also said he had rich and influential friends and friends on the police force.

He was recorded telling the informer that he planned to conduct surveillance of the subway station tied to his bomb plot immediately after attending an immigration hearing in Lower Manhattan. Testimony also showed that he had discussed entering into a marriage only to get citizenship.

Ms. Shah acknowledged that immigration authorities have some discretion about how to proceed and whether to detain people whose cases are pending, but she was bothered by yesterday's arrests.

"They're not supposed to detain halfway through a case," she said, calling the action "an absolute uneven use" of the discretion.

"You do not give someone the freedom of being not detained and then suddenly pick them up," she said.

Terrorism Convict's Family Held For Deportation (WP)

By Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK, Jan. 10 -- A day after a man was sentenced to 30 years in prison for conspiring to bomb Manhattan's Herald Square, his parents and sister were detained by federal immigration officials seeking to deport them.

Shahwar Matin Siraj, 24, was sentenced Monday afternoon for plotting to blow up a subway station in the Midtown shopping district known for its Macy's store. Early Tuesday morning, his family was arrested at its home in Jackson Heights, Queens.

Police officials hailed the sentencing of Siraj, a Pakistani immigrant, as a victory against homegrown terrorism.

But Siraj contended that he was entrapped by a police informant, who he said inflamed his anger at the United States by showing him photographs of American acts of abuse against Muslims, including incidents at the Abu Ghraib prison, and prodded him to consider violence. The informant, Osama Eldawoody, was recruited by the New York City Police Department after Sept. 11, 2001, to monitor radical Muslims in the city.

Siraj never obtained explosives, nor made a timetable for an attack. He has no known connection to any terrorist organization.

His family has lived in the United States since 1999 and has been seeking asylum since 2003, said their attorney, Mona Shah.

DOJ_NMG_0115376

A spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the agency that detained the family, said that a final order of removal has been issued against the father, Siraj Abdul Rehman, 54. But Shah said that case is pending in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit.

The immigration cases of Siraj's mother, Shahina Parveen, 50, and his sister, Sanya Siraj, 19, are dependent on the father's case, Shah said.

Mark Thorn, the Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman, could not say why the family was detained the day after the sentencing.

"The administrative arrests were timed so they would not conflict with the criminal prosecution or sentencing," he said.

But Shah charged that the arrests effectively muted the family's protest after the sentencing of the son.

"It's not American, to punish one person and the next day arrest the entire family," Shah said. "This is basically silencing them."

The family is being held at a detention facility in Elizabeth, N.J.

Guantanamo Inmates "Driven Insane" (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Prisoners held at the Guantánamo Bay detention camp in Cuba are being driven insane by a tightening of conditions and the situation of their indefinite detention without trial, according to lawyers and rights activists involved with the US camp.

The lawyers and activists also doubt whether the Bush administration intends to carry out its stated desire to close the facility.

Protesters around the world plan to mark Thursday's fifth anniversary of the first delivery of detainees to Guantánamo with demonstrations calling for its closure. American anti-war activists and at least one former British prisoner intend to march to the perimeter of the US-held enclave in eastern Cuba.

Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, says the isolation regime at Guantánamo has tightened in recent months, piling the mental pressure on inmates who have "no fair procedure" that would lead to possible release.

Mr Roth told the Financial Times he had proposed to Angela Merkel, the German chancellor and chairman of the European Union presidency, that EU member states offered to take some of the detainees who cannot return to their home countries for fear of torture. In exchange the US would offer a concrete closure plan that would lead to trials, preferably before a court martial, of remaining prisoners.

Ms Merkel was "intrigued but non-committal", Mr Roth said. But he does not believe the US is looking to close the camp – despite comments by President George W. Bush last year that he would "very much" like to shut it down.

Mr Roth is also sceptical of Mr Bush's claim in September to have closed CIA-run secret prisons when 14 terrorist suspects were transferred to Guantánamo. Human Rights Watch has documented 15 cases of prisoners who "disappeared" into the CIA prison system before September and have not been accounted for since.

Brent Mickum, a defence lawyer, says one of his two clients, Bisher al-Rawi, an Iraqi-born UK resident, "is slowly but surely slipping into madness" because of "prolonged isolation coupled with environmental manipulation that includes constant exposure to temperature extremes and constant sleep deprivation". He says his ration of toilet paper was removed because he used it for shielding his eyes from the light and his prayer rug was taken away because he used it for warmth.

Attorneys representing other prisoners say their clients kept in isolation are going insane.

Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney for the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, says the five years of the Bush administration's detention policy and related practices may have "done more to reverse 200 years of democracy than any other government act in US history".

The answer, he said, was not simply to close Guantánamo but to reflect on how far off constitutional course our practices – and the warped policies on which they are based – had veered and to establish a rights-respecting national security policy for the future.

The US has released more than 300 inmates from Guantánamo and still holds nearly 400 there.

An official told the FT that charges would probably be laid against 60 to 80. Others will be released, but lawyers and activists are concerned that the remaining 200 to 300 will be held indefinitely.

The Pentagon said the detention of enemy combatants was in general "not criminal in nature, but to prevent them from continuing to fight against the US in the war on terror".

Guantanamo Remains Source Of Outrage (AP)

By Ben Fox

DOJ_NMG_0115377

AP, January 10, 2007

A black hood covered his eyes, shackles secured his wrists and legs. He felt lightheaded from two days without food and medication that made him sleep during the long flight. Startled by barking guard dogs, he was shouted at by troops in a language he didn't understand.

"We didn't know where we were or what was going to happen to us," Adil al-Zamil, a former Kuwaiti government clerk who was one of the first to arrive at Guantanamo Bay after the base began receiving terror suspects on Jan. 11, 2002. "We were very, very afraid."

In the early days, dogs were used to intimidate prisoners. Detainees were subjected to sleep deprivation and earsplitting rock and rap music. Some, including al-Zamil, said they were shackled in uncomfortable positions for hours.

Today, five years after the first prisoners arrived at the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba, the detention camp commander says those aggressive interrogation tactics are gone.

But world outrage over the detention center has grown. Protests around the world will mark the fifth anniversary Thursday of the arrival of the first 20 prisoners at Guantanamo, including a demonstration on the Cuban side of Guantanamo's gate.

Critics say the camp, where hundreds of men face indefinite incarceration, has damaged U.S. credibility and should close.

"It has become iconic in the Muslim world and the wider world ... for everything that the United States has done wrong in the war on terror," said Michael Ratner, president of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights.

The military says the detention center is vital as ever. Nearly 400 detainees suspected of links to al-Qaida and the Taliban are still held there.

"What we are doing is an important and integral part of the global war on terror," Navy Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris, commander of the detention center, told The Associated Press by telephone on Tuesday. "We're keeping enemies of our nation — enemy combatants, terrorists if you will — off the battlefield."

Al-Zamil, 44, insisted Tuesday that he had no links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. He says he had traveled to Afghanistan to work for a charity before being taken into custody in Pakistan and turned over to U.S. forces. He was held in Afghanistan before being transferred to Guantanamo in what he believes was February or March of 2002.

He and another Kuwaiti, Saad al-Azmi, were forced onto the tarmac in Guantanamo together.

"We were totally cut off from the world. We didn't know what was going on," al-Zamil said by telephone from Kuwait.

Al-Zamil and al-Azmi later appeared before a military panel that designated them enemy combatants, despite their claims of innocence. The panels considered the cases of 558 detainees and found that all but 38 were enemy combatants and should be held.

Al-Zamil said he was roughed up by guards and interrogators and kept shackled for long periods in cold rooms during his more than three years at the prison.

"Guantanamo is a part of hell," he said.

Al-Azmi, 27, described similar experiences, adding that a female interrogator named "Megan" or "Maggie" danced around him partially undressed, then threatened to have a male guard rape him if he did not confess to terrorist links.

The alleged incidents took place before Harris took command.

"We don't do anything today that's coercive in nature," he said. "I believe we are doing things correctly here."

The detention camp itself has undergone a transformation since the early days when prisoners were kept in metal open-air cages and used buckets for toilets.

Harris said conditions for prisoners are better because of the construction of Camp Five and, just last year, Camp Six — steel-and-concrete buildings modeled after U.S. prisons.

Human rights groups argue that the buildings, which have solid-wall one-person cells, leave the prisoners more isolated.

The military plans to charge 60 to 80 of the detainees and expects military trials to start next summer, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, the chief prosecutor. "It certainly looks like we're much closer to getting these guys their day in court," he said.

Most of the remaining detainees, however, may never be tried by a military court, and the Military Commissions Act, which President Bush signed in October, deprives them of the right to contest their imprisonment in a civilian court.

Their best hope is that the military's Annual Review Board will determine they no longer pose a threat to the U.S. or possess intelligence value.

So far, the military has released or transferred about 380 detainees. The AP determined that more than half were later released or cleared of charges by their home countries despite former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's description of the detainees as "among the most dangerous, best-trained, vicious killers on the face of the earth."

The two Kuwaitis were sent home in November 2005 and cleared by a court in their home country of all terrorism charges.

"I'm still trying to regain my life, trying to become a normal citizen," al-Azmi said.

Al-Zamil said he worries about the detainees he left behind.

"They are living in hell as we did," he said. "I pray to God to give them patience. If I was still there I'd be a crazy person."

A Voice From Gitmo's Darkness (LAT)

By Jumah Al-Dossari

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Guantanamo Bay Naval Base, Cuba — I AM WRITING from the darkness of the U.S. detention camp at Guantanamo in the hope that I can make our voices heard by the world. My hand quivers as I hold the pen.

In January 2002, I was picked up in Pakistan, blindfolded, shackled, drugged and loaded onto a plane flown to Cuba. When we got off the plane in Guantanamo, we did not know where we were. They took us to Camp X-Ray and locked us in cages with two buckets — one empty and one filled with water. We were to urinate in one and wash in the other.

At Guantanamo, soldiers have assaulted me, placed me in solitary confinement, threatened to kill me, threatened to kill my daughter and told me I will stay in Cuba for the rest of my life. They have deprived me of sleep, forced me to listen to extremely loud music and shined intense lights in my face. They have placed me in cold rooms for hours without food, drink or the ability to go to the bathroom or wash for prayers. They have wrapped me in the Israeli flag and told me there is a holy war between the Cross and the Star of David on one hand and the Crescent on the other. They have beaten me unconscious.

What I write here is not what my imagination fancies or my insanity dictates. These are verifiable facts witnessed by other detainees, representatives of the Red Cross, interrogators and translators.

During the first few years at Guantanamo, I was interrogated many times. My interrogators told me that they wanted me to admit that I am from Al Qaeda and that I was involved in the terrorist attacks on the United States. I told them that I have no connection to what they described. I am not a member of Al Qaeda. I did not encourage anyone to go fight for Al Qaeda. Al Qaeda and Osama bin Laden have done nothing but kill and denigrate a religion. I never fought, and I never carried a weapon. I like the United States, and I am not an enemy. I have lived in the United States, and I wanted to become a citizen.

I know that the soldiers who did bad things to me represent themselves, not the United States. And I have to say that not all American soldiers stationed in Cuba tortured us or mistreated us. There were soldiers who treated us very humanely. Some even cried when they witnessed our dire conditions. Once, in Camp Delta, a soldier apologized to me and offered me hot chocolate and cookies. When I thanked him, he said, "I do not need you to thank me." I include this because I do not want readers to think that I fault all Americans.

But, why, after five years, is there no conclusion to the situation at Guantanamo? For how long will fathers, mothers, wives, siblings and children cry for their imprisoned loved ones? For how long will my daughter have to ask about my return? The answers can only be found with the fair-minded people of America.

I would rather die than stay here forever, and I have tried to commit suicide many times. The purpose of Guantanamo is to destroy people, and I have been destroyed. I am hopeless because our voices are not heard from the depths of the detention center.

If I die, please remember that there was a human being named Jumah at Guantanamo whose beliefs, dignity and humanity were abused. Please remember that there are hundreds of detainees at Guantanamo suffering the same misfortune. They have not been charged with any crimes. They have not been accused of taking any action against the United States.

Show the world the letters I gave you. Let the world read them. Let the world know the agony of the detainees in Cuba.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Daylight Sought For Data Mining (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Alec Klein

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Key senators introduced legislation yesterday that would require the government to disclose data-mining programs to Congress in an effort to protect Americans' privacy and prevent misuse of personal information.

The bill, introduced by Sens. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) and John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) requires federal agencies to report the development and use of data-analysis technologies to "discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity."

Lawmakers introduced similar bills twice in recent years, but they languished in a Republican-controlled Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0115379

The new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), vowed that Congress would take a much more active role in the oversight of government surveillance and data-collection programs.

"The American people have neither the assurance that these massive data banks will make us safer, nor the confidence that their privacy rights will be protected," Leahy said at the first in a series of hearings on the subject. He is a co-sponsor of the bill.

Leahy said at least 52 federal agencies use data-mining technologies and at least 199 data-mining programs are operating or planned throughout the government, including 14 within the departments of Defense, Homeland Security, Justice, and Health and Human Services. Those do not include programs run by the National Security Agency. According to Leahy's staff, the NSA has not disclosed to the committee what, if any, data-mining programs it is conducting. An NSA spokesman declined to comment.

Leahy said that the government's terrorist watch list includes names of more than 300,000 people -- including infants and members of Congress. "We also need to understand that a mistake in a government database could cost a person his or her job, sacrifice their liberty and wreak havoc on their life and reputation," he said.

Yesterday's hearing underscored the sensitivity of the debate about privacy and security. Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute, said one of the more aggressive technologies gaining currency is predictive data-mining, which looks for patterns of behavior in data based on a template.

Predictive data mining, he said, "cannot catch terrorists" because there are too few "terrorist patterns" to base a model on. Few terrorists would be caught, he said, and "a lot of" innocent people would be targeted.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, a privacy advocacy group, said the administration was "bewitched with this technology" although there was "very little evidence" that predictive data mining works.

But Kim Taipale, executive director of the Center for Advanced Studies in Science and Technology Policy, called data mining "a productivity tool . . . to make better use of limited resources" in fighting terrorism.

"Some innocent people will be burdened in any preemptive approach to terrorism, and unfortunately some bad guys will get through," he said. But if implemented correctly with oversight, "we can correct errors."

Robert L. Barr Jr., a former Republican member of the House from Georgia and also a former federal prosecutor, said the issue is not errors but an administration that he believes is thumbing "its nose at the Congress" and using data mining in a way that potentially "everybody is a suspect."

Citizens Said To Lack Legal Protection From Government Data Mining (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — The government's ability to use computers to gather personal information about citizens and act on it has far outstripped the federal laws designed to protect them from secret federal dossiers, a privacy advocate told Congress on Wednesday.

Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy and Technology, asked the Senate Judiciary Committee to update the Privacy Act and other laws to keep pace with the Digital Age.

She was among a handful of think-tank scholars and privacy advocates who testified Wednesday about government data-mining — the computerized searching of large banks of information for clues to the identity of terrorists or criminals. Their broadest area of agreement was that Congress needs to know much more about what the government is doing in data-mining.

Judiciary Chairman Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said this hearing, the first since Democrats retook control of the Senate, was the beginning of a series on privacy-related issues.

Noting that congressional auditors in 2004 found 199 data-mining programs operating or planned in federal agencies, Leahy said, "Congress is overdue in taking stock of the proliferation of these databases."

To that end, panel member Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., introduced a bill Wednesday co-sponsored by Leahy and endorsed by several witnesses.

Feingold told the hearing that his proposed Federal Data Mining Reporting Act would require federal agencies to regularly inform Congress about their use of data mining "to discover predictive or anomalous patterns indicating criminal or terrorist activity — the types of data analysis that raise the most serious privacy concerns."

While acknowledging terrorism is a threat, Harris told the committee: "Especially in the counterterrorism context, a major shift in the data collection and use landscape is taking place without a suitable privacy and due process framework."

"The government is accessing entire buckets of data without a warrant" and without specific suspicion of particular individuals, Harris said.

An individual mistakenly designated as a possible terrorist or associate of terrorists can face "arrest, deportation, loss of a job, more intrusive investigation, discrimination, damage to reputation and a lifetime of suspicion, with little or no opportunity for redress or correction of errors," Harris said.

She said the impact of technological innovations combined with new government powers enacted after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and outdated legal protections was illustrated by the Customs and Border Protection agency's "Automated Targeting System."

The Associated Press disclosed last month that the system had been developing risk assessments of millions of Americans over the last four years without their knowledge. The AP also reported those assessments of people who traveled aboard were to be kept for 40 years and could be shared with state, local and foreign governments and even some private contractors.

Under existing law, "a risk score developed for border screening purposes could easily migrate to other uses (years after the citizen was determined not to be a threat)," Harris said.

Customs officials say the program is legal and essential to keeping terrorists out of the country. Leahy said last month on C-Span's "Newsmakers" program he thought it violated a congressional ban using on data-mining tools to assign risk to passengers not on watch lists.

Both Parties Push Oversight Of Government Data Mining (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Democrats and Republicans found one issue they can agree on during the first 100 hours of the new session -- congressional oversight of government data mining, which both sides say is an unwarranted invasion into the lives of hundreds of thousands of Americans.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, held a hearing Wednesday morning on the privacy and security implications of nearly 200 data-mining programs used by more than 50 federal agencies.

Afterward, he and Sen. John E. Sununu, New Hampshire Republican, introduced legislation that administrations would report such programs and activities to Congress.

"Advances in technologies make data banks and data mining more powerful and more useful than at any other time in our history," Mr. Leahy said. "These can be useful tools in our national security arsenal, but we should use them appropriately so that they can be most effective."

Mr. Leahy warned that the potential for abuse requires oversight. "A mistake can cost Americans their jobs and wreak havoc in their lives and reputations that can take years to repair," he said.

The data mining involves taking information collected by data brokers to detect patterns of behavior or track an individual. The data can include credit-card purchase details, airline-ticket and frequent-flier information, bank and medical records, even magazine subscriptions and phone information.

Data mining is often used to track those who default on student loans or launder money. Homeland Security Department officials hope to use the technology to screen airline passengers and at border crossings.

Mr. Sununu said data mining can be an essential tool to detect patterns that point to terrorist activity.

"However, it is imperative that we understand the impact of such technology on Americans' personal privacy. In order to do this, Congress must be fully informed of the current data-mining technologies, new ones that are being developed, the effectiveness of those technologies, and the privacy protections in place," Mr. Sununu said.

Sen. Russ Feingold, Wisconsin Democrat and co-sponsor of the bill, said: "The possibility of unchecked, secret use of data-mining technology threatens one of the most important values that we are fighting for in the war against terrorism -- freedom."

Former Rep. Bob Barr, a Georgia Republican who recently became an activist for the Libertarian Party, told the panel that data mining poses a "serious threat" to the First, Second, Fourth and Fifth amendments to the Constitution.

"That is nearly half of the Bill of Rights," he said.

"Adding insult to injury, there is no scientific proof that data mining to identify terrorists even works. No scientist has ever demonstrated that the government can predict who will commit an act of terror at some future time. Yet the government spends tens of billions of taxpayers' dollars on data-mining programs each year -- collecting, manipulating, retaining and disseminating the most personal and private information on unknowing American citizens and others," Mr. Barr said.

James Jay Carafano, a senior research fellow with the Heritage Foundation, defended the practice of data mining but agreed oversight is needed.

DOJ_NMG_0115381

"The federal government's use of data-mining technology should be strictly limited to national security-related investigations," Mr. Carafano said. "Congress should also require agencies to report on their intent to establish data-mining programs and require annual reports on their implementation, as well as their compliance with federal guidelines."

Hospitals Want Better Coordination During Emergencies (WT)

By Alicia Borgess

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Representatives of area hospitals will meet today and tomorrow to discuss how they can improve communication during mass-casualty events.

Organizers say hospitals rarely have privileged access to information during a large-scale emergency and often must rely on the press for updates. Therefore, hospital workers often have difficulty gauging the extent of a crisis and preparing themselves for a surge of patients.

Washington Hospital Center's ER One Institute is sponsoring the fourth annual conference, to be held at the Leavy Conference Center at Georgetown University.

According to a report by Trust for America's Health, a nonprofit organization, improved communication is one of the major concerns regarding U.S. hospitals involved in emergency preparedness.

Emergency situations such as the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and Hurricane Katrina in 2005 highlighted the need for improvement in disaster response, officials said.

Beverly A. Pritchett, senior deputy director of the D.C. Department of Health, Emergency Health and Medical Services Administration, said the tragic events have resulted in more community support.

The District "now has an emergency health-reserve corps in which anyone can volunteer to help their community," she said.

At the conference, Mrs. Pritchett will talk about how a community can develop disaster-prevention practices.

Information from health officials would help prevent the spread of a pandemic by "connecting with the community to educate them about proper hygiene procedures so that they become a habit now," she said.

The conference also will include discussions on relief efforts and collaboration in combat and foreign disaster zones.

The keynote speaker will be Dr. B. Tilman Jolly, the Department of Homeland Security's associate medical officer.

Other speakers will include Dr. James Aiken, the medical director for Emergency Preparedness at the Medical Center of Louisiana, and Dr. Daniel Laor, the director of the Disaster and Emergency Division of the Israeli Ministry of Health in Jerusalem.

"This conference brings not only Homeland Security, but also representatives from the District, New Orleans, New York and many others, especially from metropolitan areas with high potential terrorist activity," said LeRoy Tillman a Washington Hospital Center spokesman.

Revisiting Parental Leave (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Many companies offer paid parental leave to their employees after the birth of a child, but not Uncle Sam.

Naturally, young federal employees would like the government to offer such family leave, but personnel officials have balked, saying that the government already provides a generous package of vacation and sick leave and that more paid time off would not improve recruitment and retention of employees.

If Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) has his way, however, that debate will be reopened this year. He has introduced a bill that would provide eight weeks of paid leave to federally employed women after childbirth and five days of paid leave for new fathers. The bill also would provide five days of paid leave to federal employees who adopt children.

Federal parents would also receive eight hours of paid leave to take their children to the doctor or dentist and for parent-teacher meetings at schools.

Stevens, a longtime advocate for federal employees, has his eye on the legislative branch, too. An aide said Stevens wants to require senators to offer paid maternity leave to their staffers. (He gives 12 weeks of paid maternity leave to employees in his office.) And while he is at it, Stevens is working on another bill to require companies with more than 50 employees to provide paid maternity leave.

Stevens played a key role in the creation of the Thrift Savings Plan, a 401(k)-type retirement savings program. He also was one of the original sponsors of the 1993 Family Medical Leave Act, which provides 12 weeks of unpaid leave.

The senator has named his federal employee bill the Family Leave Act. In a written statement, Stevens said: "It will provide time for mothers to recover after childbirth without having to worry about the financial burdens that come with unpaid leave. Thousands of Alaska women work for the federal government and could benefit under this new program."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) will join Stevens as a co-sponsor of bill. Other senators also will be invited to co-sponsor the leave bill, the aide to Stevens said.

In recent years, House members usually have taken the lead in sponsoring bills to provide federal employees with six weeks of paid parental leave for the birth of a child or an adoption. Last year, Reps. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), Steny H . Hoyer (D-Md.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) co-sponsored a parental leave bill.

The Bush administration has looked at the issue as part of its budget planning for fiscal 2008. Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, has expressed interest in exploring whether a program could be created to offer short-term disability insurance to federal employees. Such a program might be a way to provide maternity benefits, easing complaints from younger federal employees who often say they run short of vacation and sick leave when caring for a newborn or an adopted child.

Any proposals to expand federal benefits may run up against efforts to erase some of the federal budget's red ink. Congressional leaders hope to hold down government spending as part of an effort to reduce the federal deficit.Bush to Oppose Screeners Union

A House plan to give collective bargaining rights to about 43,000 airport screeners at the Transportation Security Administration will be opposed by the White House.

The proposal to roll back a Bush administration ban on unions at the TSA was included in a bill to implement many of the remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The bill was approved 299 to 128 late Tuesday and was sent to the Senate.

"This measure seeks to reverse the flexibility given to TSA to perform its critical aviation security mission," the Office of Management and Budget said in a statement. "The administration vigorously disagrees with these provisions of the bill."

The American Federation of Government Employees, which has sought to represent screeners since 2001, contends that the TSA workers should have the same union rights as other Department of Homeland Security employees.Business.gov

Federal forms used by companies, such as wage and tax statements, are only a click away, at http://www.business.gov.

The Web site has a search engine that can find forms, by their identifying number or by keywords, in a database of 5,400 documents. Launched in 2004, Business.gov is managed by the Small Business Administration in partnership with 21 other federal agencies.

Judge Orders More Mediation In Katrina Lawsuits (FINDLAW/AP)

By Garry Mitchell, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - GULFPORT, Mississippi-A federal judge on Wednesday ordered into mediation dozens of lawsuits policyholders filed against insurance companies after Hurricane Katrina.

Several of the cases sent to mediation, which accuse the insurance companies of denying their claims, are involved in recent settlement talks between State Farm Fire & Casualty Co., Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers.

People with direct knowledge of the settlement talks told The Associated Press this week that State Farm, Mississippi's largest home insurer, is considering paying hundreds of millions of dollars to settle more than 600 lawsuits and resolve thousands of other disputed claims.

A mass settlement would be the first of its kind to follow the wave of litigation spawned by Katrina.

Hundreds of Mississippi homeowners have sued State Farm and other insurers for refusing to cover billions of dollars in damage from Katrina's storm surge.

The 83 lawsuits ordered into mediation Wednesday include ones filed on behalf of U.S. Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, whose Gulf region homes were destroyed by the 2005 hurricane. Each sued State Farm for denying their claims.

Of 55 Katrina cases that have been heard by a mediator, 28 have resulted in settlements, according to the office of U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr.

Insurers say their homeowner policies cover damage from wind but not from water, and that the policies exclude damage that could have been caused by a combination of both, even if hurricane-force winds preceded a storm's rising water.

DOJ_NMG_0115383

State Farm, Hood and plaintiffs' lawyers are nearing an agreement that calls for the insurer to pay at least $50 million (â,¬38.5 million) - but possibly hundreds of millions more - to about 35,000 policyholders who have not sued the company for denying their claim, people with knowledge of the talks said.

A settlement would not involve claims filed by State Farm policyholders in other states.

Meanwhile on Wednesday, State Farm's expert witnesses told a jury that no evidence supports the claim of policyholders Norman and Genevieve Broussard that a tornado during the hurricane destroyed their home. The trial, only the second such case to be tried in Mississippi, is not part of the settlement talks.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Adds Troops In Bid To Secure Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — President Bush announced Wednesday evening that he was sending more than 20,000 American troops to Iraq to quell the sectarian violence there and conceded for the first time that there were not enough American or Iraqi troops in Baghdad to halt the capital's descent over the past year into chaos.

In a speech to the nation, Mr. Bush dropped his insistence that the United States was making progress toward building a workable Iraqi democracy. But he rekindled his argument that "failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States," saying that it would touch off chaos throughout the Middle East, provide a launching pad for attacks in the United States, and embolden Iran to develop nuclear weapons. (Transcript of the Address)

In documents released just before the speech, the White House acknowledged that his previous strategy was based on fundamentally flawed assumptions about the power of the shaky Iraqi government. He described his new strategy as an effort to "change America's course in Iraq," and gave no indication that the troop increase would be short-lived. He said that "we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties" in the course of more intensive around-the-clock patrols in some of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods.

Mr. Bush rejected all calls to begin a withdrawal from Iraq, arguing that the strategies advocated by newly empowered Democrats, restive Republicans and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group were a formula for deepening disaster.

"To step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government," Mr. Bush said from the White House library, a room officials said was chosen to create more of a sense of a conversation with an anxious American public, rather than the formal surroundings of the Oval Office. "Such a scenario would result in our troops being forced to stay in Iraq even longer, and confront an enemy that is even more lethal. If we increase our support at this crucial moment, and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

Mr. Bush also offered his most direct acknowledgment of error in an American-led war that has lasted nearly four years and claimed more than 3,000 American lives. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility lies with me," he said.

Yet for the first time, Mr. Bush faces what could become considerable political opposition to pursuing a war in which 132,000 Americans are already committed, even before the increases announced Wednesday night. Democrats in Congress are drawing up plans for what, at a minimum, could be a nonbinding resolution expressing opposition to the commitment of more forces to what many of them say they now believe is a losing fight. They will be joined by some Republicans, and may attempt other steps to block Mr. Bush from deepening the American commitment. Not since Richard M. Nixon ordered American troops in Vietnam to invade Cambodia in 1970 has a president taken such a risk with an increasingly unpopular war.

"For the safety of our people, America must succeed in Iraq," Mr. Bush said in repeating an argument that he has used for nearly four years — that a retreat from the country before a decisive victory is won would provide terrorists a launching pad for new attacks on the United States and American targets.

In the 20-minute address, Mr. Bush said that for the first time Iraq would take command-and-control authority over all of its own forces, and he said that while more Americans ground troops were being put into the field, they would take more of a background role. He said that the Iraqi government had committed to a series of "benchmarks" — which included another 8,000 Iraqi troops and police in Baghdad, passage of long-delayed legislation to share oil revenues among Iraq's sects and ethnic groups, and a $10 billion jobs and reconstruction program, financed by the Iraqis. In a running series of large and small briefings for reporters that opened a major campaign to market the new strategy, Mr. Bush's aides insisted that the plan was largely created by the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

Yet Mr. Bush sounded less than certain of his support for the prime minister, who many in the White House and the military fear may be intending to extend Shiite power over the Sunnis, or could prove incapable of making good on his promises. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush declared.

The president put it far more bluntly when leaders of Congress came to visit Mr. Bush at the White House earlier on Wednesday. "I said to Maliki this has to work or you're out," the president told the Congressional leaders, according to two officials who were in the room. Pressed on why he thought this strategy would succeed where previous efforts had failed, Mr. Bush shot back: "Because it has to."

Until the summer, Mr. Bush had used the phrase "stay the course" to describe his approach in Iraq, and his decision to describe his new strategy as an effort to "change America's course" appeared intended to distance himself from that old approach. An earlier plan unveiled in November 2005 had been entitled a "Strategy for Victory in Iraq," but Mr. Bush used the word "victory" sparingly on Wednesday night, and then only to diminish expectations.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success," he said. "I believe that it will," saying that if it is successful it would result in a "functioning democracy" that "fights terrorists instead of harboring them."

In some of his sharpest words of warning to Iran, Mr. Bush accused the Iranian government of "providing material support for attacks on American troops" and vowed to "seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies." He left deliberately vague the question of whether those operations would be limited to Iraq or conducted elsewhere, and said he had ordered the previously reported deployment of a new aircraft carrier strike group to the region, where it is in easy reach of Iranian territory.

Mr. Bush also announced that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would leave Friday for the region to build diplomatic support for the American effort in Iraq.

A new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, who replaced Donald H. Rumsfeld, is among the new members of the Iraq team whom Mr. Bush has brought in to execute the strategy announced Wednesday night. In the past week, Mr. Bush has sped the removal of the American commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is to become the Army chief of staff, and replaced him with a counterinsurgency specialist, Gen. Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus , who has embraced the new plan. A new American ambassador has been nominated to Baghdad as well, to replace Zalmay Khalilzad, a Sunni of Afghan heritage, who will represent the United States in the United Nations.

The five-brigade increase in American forces will be accomplished by speeding up the deployment of four units already scheduled to go to Iraq, and by sending one additional brigade that was not scheduled to go. The total increase of American troops in Iraq amounts to roughly 21,000, including 4,000 marines who will be stationed in Anbar Province, the stronghold of elements of Al Qaeda in Iraq and the Sunni insurgency. The increase in Iraqi troops and police amounts, officials said, to about 8,000.

The units heading into Iraq begin with a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division, now in Kuwait, expected in Iraq before the end of the month, followed by a brigade of the First Infantry Division, based at Fort Riley, Kan., probably next month. The Army is also planning to announce that the Second Infantry Division, Fourth Brigade, based in Fort Lewis, Wash., and the Third Infantry Division's Second Brigade, based at Fort Stewart, Ga., and the Third Brigade, based at Fort Benning, Ga., should begin preparing to go to Iraq earlier than scheduled. Officials said that the total increase in troops could take three or four months.

The Bush plan also calls for delaying the departure from Iraq of a Minnesota National Guard brigade by four months, an official said. The unit had been planning to depart in the spring and had not been notified that it would be staying longer, Lt. Col. Kevin Olson, a spokesman for the Minnesota Guard, said Wednesday.

While Democrats and some Republicans who have attacked Mr. Bush's plan in advance of the speech have questioned sending more troops, others question whether the Bush plan is too small — and falls short of the numbers needed to make a difference in a violent capital of six million. Nonetheless, one of Mr. Bush's top advisers said at the White House on Wednesday that he expected that Senator John McCain, who has championed a significant, long-term increase in troops, would embrace the president's plan.

The adviser cited a section of the Iraq Study Group's report that said the bipartisan commission could "support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad, or to speed up the training and equipping mission."

But on the same page, the report warns that "adding more American troops could conceivably worsen those aspects of the security problem that are fed by the view that the United States presence is intended to be a long-term "occupation." Similarly, the group urged direct engagement with Iran and Syria; Mr. Bush rejected that approach.

Mr. Bush, one of his top aides said in an interview on Wednesday, simply concluded that "the Iraqi government was running out of time" and would collapse without additional help. Yet at the core of Mr. Bush's new strategy, his own aides said, lies a tension between two objectives: Mr. Bush's commitment to staying in Iraq until the country is a stable, self-sustaining democracy, and his vague threat to Mr. Maliki that the American presence in the country would be cut short if Americans believed that the effort was failing.

His aides hinted that the administration had already come up with a “Plan B” in case the latest strategy failed, with one saying “there are other ways to achieve our objective” that departed from the strategy Mr. Bush outlined. But he would not describe that strategy, or say if it involved withdrawal, containment, or the breakup of the country into sectarian entities.

Mr. Bush said nothing on Wednesday evening about the cost of his plan in money, though he spoke of its cost in blood. The new aid and job-creation plans, his aides said, would likely cost around $1.1 billion.

Admitting Failures, Bush Orders Troop Surge (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Acknowledging that his current strategy had failed, President Bush tonight announced a new approach that called for sending some 21,000 more U.S. troops to Iraqi but also warned its government that "America's commitment is not open-ended."

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people — and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said, acknowledging diminished public support for the war and an increasingly assertive opposition in the new, Democratic-controlled Congress.

"It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq," the president said.

The new plan calls for assigning top priority to ending the sectarian violence in key areas of Baghdad, assigning primary responsibility for security to the Iraqi army and police, and shifting U.S. troops into a supporting role — including embedding more American personnel with Iraqi units.

"Many listening tonight will ask why this effort will succeed when previous operations to secure Baghdad did not," Bush acknowledged. The answer, he said, was that the new effort would have more resources and that Iraqi officials have given the U.S. "a green light" to take action in all neighborhoods of the capital. In the past, powerful members of the Iraqi government have shielded some areas from security crackdowns, often to protect sectarian supporters.

Bush repeatedly warned members of the current Iraqi government that they must step up to the challenge of providing security despite the sectarian tensions and divisions that hamper it.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended. If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people," Bush said.

Baghdad must also meet a series of benchmarks — previously imposed but never met — including an equitable division of oil revenues and measures designed to create a broad government of reconciliation, he said.

At the same time, the president again insisted that the United States must not fail in its efforts to stabilize Iraq.

Delivering a nationally televised speech to the nation reflecting the product of a reassessment conducted over several months, Bush, in a far less muscular tone than is his custom, delivered what was in effect half an ultimatum: He warned Iraqi leaders that time was running out but put no time limit on the U.S. role there.

The increased deployment will bring an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, on top of the 140,000 there now. The president is expected to seek $5.6 billion in a supplemental spending request he will send to Congress apart from the 2008 budget he will submit Feb. 5.

According to a Defense Department official, the 21,500-troop increase in Iraq will be achieved by sending one new Army brigade to Baghdad — a unit of the 82nd Airborne Division, which is already en route to Kuwait — and speeding up the deployment of other Army units that were to go to Iraq this spring.

One of these units, the 1st Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division, has already begun its early deployment, the official said.

Two Marine battalions in Iraq that were scheduled to depart next month will also have their rotation extended to provide the 4,000 additional troops in western Anbar province, the official said.

Administration officials said they were bolstering forces in the province because it has been an Al Qaeda stronghold but local tribes had begun to turn against it — creating an opportunity for U.S. and Iraqi forces to attack the terrorist organization with the cooperation of local leaders.

Some Marine commanders in Anbar have expressed unhappiness that the Iraqi forces they're working with may be shifted to Baghdad as part of the new strategy of focusing on security in the capital.

The Iraqi army battalions in Anbar were already undermanned and replacement units are of unknown capabilities.

"I'm very disappointed," said Col. Larry Nicholson, commanding officer of the 5th Marine Regiment. "I hope it's only for 60 to 90 days."

DOJ_NMG_0115386

Marine Commandant Gen. James Conway said Nicholson and other commanders have to remember "the big picture" and its new priorities.

Among the other Army units that will have their deployments sped up are the 4th Brigade of the 1st Infantry Division and the 3rd Brigade of the 3rd Infantry Division.

In addition, the White House announced it will remobilize units of the Army National Guard to help sustain the buildup, a potentially controversial move that will force some Guard brigades into second tours in Iraq. Until now, Pentagon policy has required such units to deploy overseas only once every six years; the remobilization will reverse that policy.

The only Army unit that could be extended is a Minnesota National Guard brigade that was originally due to return to the U.S. in March.

Also, the administration will request legislation asking for the Army and Marines to be increased.

Although the troop numbers are slightly lower than some advocates of a buildup have advocated, they were cautiously optimistic, noting that the number of individual Army brigades and Marine regiments being sent were largely in line with their recommendations.

Bush will be sending five Army brigades to Baghdad and the equivalent of one Marine regiment to Anbar, only slightly less than the five brigades and two Marine regiments recommended by retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, an influential backer of the buildup.

"We were very careful to focus on the number of brigades, and that's what to look for," said Frederick Kagan, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute and co-author with Keane of a build-up strategy that was largely embraced by the White House.

At its heart, the president's plan puts new reliance on the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to meet the overwhelming security challenges posed by sectarian militia violence and insurgents, and field effective security forces in some of the most strife-torn districts of Baghdad and surrounding communities.

The new plan also calls for stimulating economic recovery as part of an effort to clear, hold and revitalize key areas in the Iraqi capital.

The new strategy, Bush said, "will change America's course in Iraq."

"Only the Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people. And their government has put forward an aggressive plan to do it," Bush said.

The president, who until recent weeks brooked no suggestion in public that the United States was not succeeding in Iraq, changed his tone tonight.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have.'"

At this time a year ago, the president had delivered a series of speeches outlining his strategy for "victory," only to run head-on, as he acknowledged tonight, to a year of sectarian violence that began in February with the attack on the Golden Mosque, one of the most important Shiite shrines, in Samarra.

In documents supporting Bush's argument, the White House detailed shifting assumptions about conditions in Iraq, conceding that "sectarianism is spiking," that security must precede economic and political gains — rather than insisting that political progress demonstrated by the election of the Maliki government would bring security — and recognizing that Iraqis are "increasingly disillusioned" by the efforts of the U.S.-led coalition.

The reliance Bush is placing on Maliki reflects the public support he has given the Iraqi prime minister for months — but runs contrary to the private opinion expressed in a classified memorandum written by the White House national security advisor, Stephen Hadley, and leaked in November just before Bush and Maliki met in Amman, Jordan. The memo questioned Maliki's competence and intentions.

Bush delivered the speech in the White House Library, long ago a basement laundry room but since 1935 the repository of the mansion's literary collection and numerous antiques, which presents a less formal aura.

The president faces a tough sell: Democratic leaders in the House and Senate are planning to put forward nonbinding resolutions on the plan to send additional troops to Iraq, and some Senate Republican have indicated they might support them.

A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last week found that 12% of those surveyed supported sending additional troops; 85% favored withdrawing — either immediately (15%), within 12 months (39%) or over as many years as needed (31%).

Bush and his advisors are loath to call the new plan a last chance for the United States in Iraq, even as their language suggests that it is. At the same time, they are emphasizing the importance that the American goals be met there — and none is suggesting directly that the United States would begin to pull out of Iraq if Iraqis fail again to secure the country, where the American death toll has passed 3,000 as the war nears the end of its fourth year.

The Iraqi toll is so uncertain that estimates have ranged over hundreds of thousands, with the uncertainly itself a sign of the chaos there.

The president's speech was short on specifics, but Bush said Iraq had committed itself to moving three brigades now deployed in relatively quiet areas to Baghdad — one by Feb. 1 and two by Feb. 15.

U.S. officials say that 80% of the violence in Iraq is occurring within 30 miles of the capital. They did not say how they would respond if those responsible for the roadside bombs, assassinations and other attacks move their operations to other quarters of the country that have been relatively peaceful. Bush said that his military commanders reviewed the Iraqi government's security plan and said that it corrected earlier mistakes and that "this plan can work."

He also said that Maliki "has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated," a clear suggestion that the prime minister will stand up to the powerful radical cleric, Muqtada Sadr, who controls the sectarian Shiite Muslim militia known as the Mahdi army.

In the past, Iraqi officials have made commitments to step up and take charge of their country's security, only to fall short of quelling sectarian militias and insurgent violence.

"America," Bush said, "will hold the Iraqi government to the benchmarks it has announced."

With pressure mounting to bring troops home, Bush said that to "step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government," which would mean an even longer deployment of U.S. forces there and creation of a more lethal enemy. But an increase in U.S. support, he said, would "help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence" and speed the return of U.S. forces to the United States.

While Bush presented his plan as a sharp shift in the United States' approach in Iraq, his portrayal of the importance of the war was unchanged. The struggle there, he said, "will determine the direction of the global war on terror and our safety here at home.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will," he said.

While U.S. officials addressed the new reliance on Iraq to meet its security needs, they did not say that Iraq's failure would bring a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Bush's plan has "benchmarks," one official said, but the president "hasn't got a timeline" after which he will pull out the U.S. forces.

On Thursday, Bush plans a reprise of the speech during a lunchtime visit to Ft. Benning, Ga., where nearly all but the newest recruits have served at least one tour in Iraq.

"This is not, give one speech, dust your hands off and walk away. This is the beginning of an important process for the American people and for the political community to think seriously about it," White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Several hours before Bush spoke, the president called leaders in South Korea, Poland and Japan to thank them for their support in Iraq and to give them a preview of the speech, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council. Each has combat troops serving there.

Johndroe said Bush also spoke with key Iraqi leaders, representing Kurds, Shiite Muslims and Sunni Muslims, raising the Iraqi government's commitment "to bringing security" to the country.

Bush To Add 20,000 Troops In An Effort To Stabilize Iraq (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Robin Wright

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush appealed directly to the American people last night to support a renewed campaign to pacify Iraq, saying it is necessary to add new troops so that the beleaguered Iraqi government can regain control of the streets of Baghdad and revive the process of political reconciliation and economic rebuilding.

In a nationally televised address, Bush acknowledged for the first time that he had not sent enough troops to provide security in Iraq last year. Standing in the library of the White House, he described the situation in Iraq as "unacceptable" to the American people and to himself. "Our troops in Iraq have fought bravely. They have done everything we have asked them to do," he said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

Bush said he will order more than 20,000 soldiers and Marines to help the Iraqi government provide security in Baghdad and fight the Sunni insurgency in Anbar province. But he emphasized that Iraqi soldiers will take the lead in the new fighting, and he said that the focus of American troops will be to advise and support Iraqi forces, with the additional U.S. troops embedded in Iraqi units.

In some of his sharpest language to date, the president placed the responsibility of improving conditions squarely on the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has not delivered on an array of promised reforms and security measures.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said last night. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act."

Even before the president began speaking, Democrats in Congress were mobilizing against his new plan. Just two months after Republicans lost their majorities in the Senate and the House in an election widely seen as a repudiation of his policies in Iraq, Bush's speech signaled that he is essentially choosing to deepen U.S. involvement, gambling that more focused operations and improved tactics will result in success that has so far eluded the United States.

Bush's new plan acknowledges that security must be the priority of the mission -- not political reform, as many in the U.S. military have argued. "The most urgent priority for success in Iraq is security, especially in Baghdad," Bush said last night.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons," Bush said. "There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have. Our military commanders reviewed the new Iraqi plan to ensure that it addressed these mistakes. They report that it does."

Bush made it clear that his revised strategy involves more than military measures. A central element will focus on expanded economic assistance to complement the new security plan for Baghdad.

"A successful strategy for Iraq goes beyond military operations," the president said. "Ordinary Iraqi citizens must see that military operations are accompanied by visible improvements in their neighborhoods and communities."

The United States will allocate more than $1 billion for three programs to create jobs and help reconstruction in neighborhoods secured by Iraqi and U.S. forces. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have been particularly concerned that any new deployment not happen in an economic and political vacuum.

U.S. officials concede that the previous "clear, hold and build" program managed to clear areas of militants but did not hold or secure them afterward, allowing neighborhoods to fall back under the control of militants.

The United States will also add nine new provincial reconstruction teams, which are joint Pentagon and State Department programs to help rebuild the country from the bottom up, including schools, local government and political interest groups.

Reflecting the revised strategy's heavy focus on only two areas of the country, six of the reconstruction teams will be in Baghdad and three will be in volatile Anbar province, home to the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda extremists, the State Department said. Washington will add about 150 new personnel to the 250 already staffing the reconstruction teams.

The United States will also provide $400 million in quick-response funding to address urgent civilian problems, and add $350 million to the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which allows local field commanders to have discretionary money to help improve the lives of Iraqis.

The U.S. effort is designed to supplement a $10 billion reconstruction and infrastructure program, finally channeling an oil-revenue surplus into rebuilding areas. The administration has long pressed Baghdad to use its own resources, particularly in Sunni areas to prove that the Shiite-dominated government is sincere in wanting to take care of the country's Sunni minority. Offering the Sunnis hope and inclusion is considered critical to helping defuse the insurgency and winning over loyalists to Saddam Hussein.

Bush and his top advisers said they expect their new approach to succeed where previous ones failed because of a new commitment from Maliki to provide resources and crack down on violent sectarian militias, even Shiite ones. But they are placing great faith in an untested Iraqi government that has not yet demonstrated a capacity to bridge the sectarian divisions that have caused an upsurge in violence over the past year.

Bush set no timetable for the removal of the added American troops, nor did he make any U.S. assistance for the Iraqis conditional on meeting political goals such as a new law for the equitable distribution of oil revenue and holding provincial elections, both seen as critical to winning political support for the Shiite-led government from disaffected Sunnis.

He did not embrace the idea of high dialogue with Iran and Syria to stabilize Iraq, a key recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which had been hoping to restore bipartisan consensus around a new Iraq policy.

Even with the increase in troops, moreover, the resulting U.S. total of about 153,000 forces in Iraq will amount to less than the roughly 165,000 deployed in December 2005, the high-water mark for U.S. troop strength in Iraq. His economic proposals last night, including the more than $1 billion in additional funding for economic reconstruction and jobs, are largely expanded versions of current programs.

U.S. and Iraqi troops began a plan to rid Baghdad of illegal militias and death squads that were fomenting sectarian violence just last summer, but the U.S.-designed effort faltered when Iraq failed to produce two-thirds of the troops Maliki had pledged. The difference now, U.S. officials say, is that Maliki put forward the plan himself and wants Iraq to take the lead, with a goal of assuming military command of the entire country in November. Iraq now has control over only three of its 18 provinces.

Bush had tough words for Iran and Syria. In stark contrast to the Iraqi Study Group's recommendations last month, the Bush administration intends to increase its operations against both countries, Bush said. He vowed to "interrupt the flow of support" from Iraq's two key neighbors and to "seek out and destroy" networks providing weapons and training to U.S. enemies in Iraq.

"Succeeding in Iraq also requires defending its territorial integrity, and stabilizing the region in the face of the extremist challenge. This begins with addressing Iran and Syria," he said.

In a clear warning to the hard-line government of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Bush also announced that the United States will deploy Patriot air defense systems and expand intelligence sharing "to reassure our friends and allies."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will depart for the region tomorrow to rally support for Iraq, particularly among the new "six plus two" bloc of conservative states that includes Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and five sheikdoms in the Persian Gulf region, he said.

The White House hopes the president's speech will trigger new support for his Iraq policy, and Bush said he will convene a bipartisan working group of lawmakers to work on anti-terrorism policies, including increasing the size of the military. But on Capitol Hill yesterday, sentiment seemed to harden against the president on Iraq in the opposition party, even among the most hawkish Democrats.

Both Senate and House Democrats moved toward introducing resolutions of disapproval, with House Democrats contemplating simply introducing the president's speech and asking members to vote for or against it. Democratic leaders made clear that such nonbinding resolutions would be only a first step. If sentiment against the president continues to grow, senior Democrats said they will try to use their power of the purse to quell what they call an escalation.

Meanwhile, divisions continued to emerge among Republicans. While GOP leadership was backing the president, backbenchers continued to revolt. "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer," Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who is considering a run for the White House, said in a written statement issued from Baghdad, where he is visiting. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Bush Pledges 21,500 More Troops For Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

George W. Bush on Wednesday night unveiled what many see as his last chance to salvage the deteriorating situation in Iraq with the pledge of 21,500 new US troops and an admission the current strategy was failing.

“Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me,” Mr Bush said in a live prime-time broadcast.

“It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq…In our discussions we all agreed that there is no magic formula for success in Iraq. One message came through loud and clear: Failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States.”

Mr Bush told Americans that previous efforts to stabilise Baghdad had failed for two reasons: “There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighbourhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents. And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have.”

In his 20-minute broadcast, the US president also warned that a withdrawal of US forces would lead to killings in Iraq on an “unimaginable scale”. “If we increase our support at this crucial moment, and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home,” he said.

However, leading Democrats and some Republicans on Wednesday night were swift to condemn Mr Bush’s “new way forward” saying it would only worsen the situation on the ground. Republican critics included Sam Brownback, the social conservative senator, who last month declared his candidacy for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

In a statement immediately following Mr Bush’s broadcast, Democratic leaders reiterated calls for a phased withdrawal of US forces over the next six months as a way of pressuring the Iraqi government to take responsibility for the country’s future. They said the much-anticipated troop “surge” went against the verdict of congressional elections last November and would be challenged by resolutions that could be tabled as early as Friday.

“This proposal endangers our national security by placing additional burdens on our already over-extended military thereby making it even more difficult to respond to other crises,” Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House, said a statement.

The new approach that Mr Bush laid out in his broadcast is built on a plan drawn up by Nouri al-Maliki, Iraq’s prime minister, that is aimed at stabilising the level of sectarian violence in Baghdad, which is the epicentre of Iraq’s emerging civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0115390

Mr Bush said that Mr Maliki has promised to follow a series of performance "benchmarks" that were drawn up in Baghdad. Mr Bush on Wednesday declined to offer a timeline for Iraq to meet its self-imposed benchmarks. But he said America's commitment to Iraq would not be "open-ended".

"The president is trying to put a good face on the reality," said Jack Reed, a Democratic senator. "So far the Iraqis have not responded to our request to perform. I'm very sceptical these benchmarks will be anything more than they've been in the past - just platitudes that are ignored."

A senior US administration official said there would be new rules of engagement for Iraqi and US commanders that would enable them to succeed where previous efforts to pacify Iraq's capital had failed - most recently last summer.

Iraq's government would send three new brigades into Baghdad within the next month in addition to the six already there. The US would add five brigades to its Baghdad presence. The US would also send an additional 4,000 troops to Anbar province, which is the seat of al-Qaeda in Iraq.

The overall level of US forces in Iraq will rise from 132,000 to more than 150,000 – although officials did not say by when.

"This will be an Iraqi plan that will be Iraqi-led and we believe will fix the problem," said the official "If our previous strategy was "clear, hold and build" – we cleared, did not hold and the build never arrived."

Senior US officials also on Wednesday ruled out following the regional "diplomatic offensive" that had been recommended in the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report last month. The report, which was led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, the former Democratic lawmaker, recommended that Mr Bush open talks with Iran and Syria in particular.

On Wednesday a US official said that a large proportion of the 79 ISG recommendations had been accepted by Mr Bush including the advice that more US army trainers were embedded "deep down at the company level" of the Iraqi military. Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, will testify on Capitol Hill on Thursday about Mr Bush's new way forward in Iraq.

Tactical Shift In Iraq Combat (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, justifying his decision to send 21,500 more troops and more than $1 billion in aid to Iraq amid sweeping public opposition to the war, said in a prime-time TV address Wednesday night that the new push would speed the day when U.S. forces could come home.

With the Democratic Congress poised to cast no-confidence votes on his policy as early as next week, a somber Bush acknowledged that the public's patience with the war is wearing thin and took responsibility for mistakes.

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

But he said that stepping up the U.S. military presence and financial commitment was vital to averting disaster in Iraq, warning of greater dangers should the mission fail.

Bush put no timetable on the new troops -- the first of which arrived in Baghdad hours before his 9 p.m. speech -- even as he said Iraqis would have to do their part and that the American commitment is "not open-ended."

The president, who has repeatedly laid out revised goals and strategies for Iraq only to see them crumble amid sectarian violence and a mounting death toll, argued that his plan would "change America's course in Iraq."

Even Bush's posture and backdrop seemed calculated to signal a change in course; he delivered the roughly 20-minute speech standing in the White House Library, not from his customary seat at his Oval Office desk.

The plan came after a monthlong buildup in which Bush promised a new approach to address previous mistakes. Nevertheless, critics said it bore striking resemblance to past moves that were billed as course-corrections, including the promise of more robust U.S. military support and more effective Iraqi cooperation.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat and one of the most vocal critics, said Bush is "not only going to stay the course, he's going to escalate the course."

Bush said Iraqis understand they must step up by providing more troops, taking the lead role in securing Baghdad and barring militias from interfering in security efforts. They have committed to meeting benchmarks, including key reconciliation measures, Bush said.

Entering the final two years of his term, Bush faces a newly hostile environment on Capitol Hill, where Democrats vehemently oppose his Iraq policy and Republicans are increasingly skeptical.

Thursday, he is to continue his campaign to sell the plan to a war-weary public with an appearance at Fort Benning, Ga. Meanwhile, a coalition of liberal groups -- the same band that hammered at Bush's Social Security overhaul plan before it collapsed -- announced a full-scale "anti-escalation" push, promising a public-relations showdown between the White House and Democratic activists over the war.

DOJ_NMG_0115391

Under the latest plan, the U.S. will send five additional Army combat brigades, or about 17,500 troops, to Baghdad. An additional 4,000 Marines will go to Anbar province, an al-Qaida stronghold and the base of the Sunni insurgency. The increase would cost an additional $5.6 billion, a senior administration official said.

Iraqis will, in turn, send three more brigades into Baghdad, Bush added.

As part of the plan, the United States will spend $1.2 billion for enhanced reconstruction and civil affairs projects, including job creation.

The plan relies heavily on the ability and will of Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister who has failed to stabilize his fledgling government and calm Sunni-Shiite violence. Bush still believes that al-Maliki is capable of doing so, White House officials said, but many lawmakers and analysts have substantial doubts.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people, and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act," Bush said, adding that al-Maliki "understands this."

White House officials were quick to reject the idea that the president's latest ideas for Iraq were a last-ditch effort to turn things around in the shattered war zone, but it seemed clear that some of Bush's closest allies saw it that way.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, after a meeting with Bush hours before the speech, said, "many members of Congress are skeptical about, 'Will this plan work?'" given the failure of previous approaches. But he said the president's latest iteration is "a good plan" that represents "our best shot at victory in Iraq."

Democrats, including those from Maryland, roundly criticized Bush's proposal, which they said ignores the anti-war message of the 2006 elections and will amplify a failed mission.

Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Maryland Democrat, called Bush's plan "reckless."

"We are in a hole in Iraq, and the president says that the way out is to dig deeper," she said in a statement.

Democratic leaders said they would press for a swift vote opposing Bush's plans, and some support a Kennedy measure requiring that Bush get congressional approval for the troop increase.

"We in the Congress are very frustrated," said Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, a Baltimore Democrat, adding that Bush had not answered the fundamental question of how to get U.S. forces out of Iraq.

"It's the American people who are paying for this war, and it's the American people who have been very patient with this president. It's the American people who have given the benefit of the doubt to this president, and now, I think, the American people have run out of patience," Cummings said.

Most leading Republicans said they support Bush's plan, applauding him for adjusting tactics in the face of a chaotic situation.

Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said the plan is "not without risk" but is "the best chance" for Iraq.

Republican Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a likely presidential contender, and Democratic Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut were among those who cheered the bulked-up U.S. troop presence.

But other Republicans cast a skeptical eye, voicing doubts about the Iraqi government's ability to quell factional tensions and crack down on violence.

Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, a likely Republican presidential candidate who is traveling in the Middle East, said the United States should not send more troops "until Sunnis and Shia are more willing to cooperate with each other instead of shooting at each other."

Some conservatives suggested Bush was sending too few troops to solve Iraq's problems.

"This undertaking will require a sustained, not a temporary, surge, in order to secure the country and enable the Iraqi government to take control and determine its own future," Rep. John Shadegg, an Arizona Republican, said in a statement. "It will require the commitment of not a minimal, but a substantial number of additional troops, perhaps as many as 50,000."

Bush nodded to congressional criticism of his plan, saying he would consider "improvements," but he pointedly signaled that the White House will challenge opponents to step forward with their own proposals.

"It is fair to hold our views up to scrutiny. And all involved have a responsibility to explain how the path they propose would be more likely to succeed," Bush said.

The president proposed no new diplomatic push to enhance outreach to Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, a key recommendation of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's December report. Bush said only that he would "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria" to armed groups attacking American forces in Iraq.

Bush Asks For More While He Has Less (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115392

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has been in this position many times—speaking solemnly to Americans from the White House about war and terror—but he has never been in this place.

He finds himself asking for more—of the military, of Congress, of the Iraqi government and of the American people—but possessing so much less. Now, he lacks the safety net of a Republican-run Congress, the political capital of which he famously boasted, and most decidedly, the support of the public weary of the war's grim narrative.

Many in the military opposed his call Wednesday night for a sharp increase in troops, though they will carry it out as ordered. Democrats were blunt in decrying the president's plan, and an escalating number of Republicans on Capitol Hill share that view. Fewer than two in 10 Americans support the idea, and it is certainly not welcome in many precincts in Iraq.

To be sure, the president conceded some mistakes, for the first time admitting that there were not enough troops and resources in Iraq and in the process disavowing the war doctrine of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. But the admissions were framed as failures in tactics rather than in strategy. He tried to proffer his address as a new direction that "will change America's course in Iraq," though much of what he suggested has been tried before.

So has this stated rationale: "The challenge playing out across the broader Middle East is more than a military conflict," Bush said. "It is the decisive ideological struggle of our time."

Bush hitched winning that struggle to two rather shaky propositions: American soldiers performing more of a policing function in Baghdad and the Iraqi government's ability to bring an end to seemingly intractable sectarian violence and establish a functioning democracy.

The burden of persuasion on waging war rests with the president, but Bush has, since the conflict began, essentially confined his arguments to Republican ears. He seems to be paying a price for that approach, with some newly empowered Democrats not only rejecting the idea of what the administration calls a "surge" in troops, but also suggesting that funding won't be automatic either.

Or, they asked, if he wanted to adopt this approach, why did he not do it some three years ago? The appeals of Gen. Eric Shinseki, who in 2003 said that the U.S. needed several hundred thousand troops to prevail in the war, and of Lawrence Lindsey, the former top economic adviser who left his post after having the temerity to say that the war could cost $200 billion, now seem prophetic.

And there were the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, chaired by one of the Bush family's trusted counselors, James Baker. The president seemed to disregard nearly all of its advice, save the proposal to increase the embedding of American advisers in Iraqi Army units.

"It's not only not an adoption, it seems to be moving in almost the opposite direction," said former Rep. Tim Roemer (D-Ind.), a member of the Sept. 11 commission. "Many of these people on the Iraq Study Group are from his father's administration….who were pretty successful and established a respectable record of public diplomacy. These principles were not just put on the shelf, but were rejected by the current president."

The role of the military, however, will be different in that troops will be put in even greater danger on a daily basis as they wade deeper into the swamp of Baghdad.

"There will never be true peace in Iraq as long as there are American combat forces in the streets of Iraq," said Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), a decorated Vietnam veteran who has advocated a phased withdrawal of troops after intensive diplomacy.

Few presidents have faced wartime choices with so few good options. Truman did not at the end of World War II. Eisenhower did not in Korea. Lyndon Johnson chose to leave it to his successor when he declined to run for a second term. But in some sense, what Bush is doing is likely to have the same effect in that it will prolong the conflict in Iraq, almost certainly pushing the hard decision of when to leave to the next occupant of the Oval Office.

During Vietnam both Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon made numerous speeches offering new ways to try to summon public support--bombing pauses by Johnson, peace proposals by Nixon--but neither swayed majorities to their views.

"This is in significant part an exercise in shoring up their political support," said historian Robert Dallek. "But this rhetoric that Johnson made, Nixon made and Bush is making really in the long run doesn't amount to a hill of beans. He may get a rally effect, an increase in backing in the short run, but if the realities on the ground don't change and people continue to see this war, like Vietnam, as a failing enterprise, it won't make any difference."

Democrats, many of whom couldn't find the same voice when the war began, now are eagerly and openly critical of the president. Those considering running for president are climbing all over one another to try to put the most distance between their position and Bush's.

Following the rebuke of voters in the midterm election, which many saw as a referendum on the war, the president finds himself more isolated than at any time in his term. And for at least one Republican who would like to replace him, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, strong support for the president might help rather than hurt. But if McCain, who served heroically in Vietnam where he was tortured as a prisoner of war, were to win the presidency, it might well fall to him to end this war with so many echoes of Vietnam.

Inviting A Battle On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — By stepping up the American military presence in Iraq, President Bush is not only inviting an epic clash with the Democrats who run Capitol Hill. He is ignoring the results of the November elections, rejecting the central thrust of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and flouting the advice of some of his own generals, as well as Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq.

In so doing, Mr. Bush is taking a calculated gamble that no matter how much hue and cry his new strategy may provoke, in the end the American people will give him more time to turn around the war in Iraq and Congress will not have the political nerve to thwart him by cutting off money for the war.

The plan, outlined by the president in stark, simple tones in a 20-minute speech from the White House library, is vintage George Bush — in the eyes of admirers, resolute and principled; in the eyes of critics, bull-headed, even delusional, about the prospects for success in Iraq. It is the latest evidence that the president is convinced that he is right and that history will vindicate him, even if that vindication comes long after he is gone from the Oval Office.

Mr. Bush long ago staked his presidency on Iraq, and to the extent he can salvage the war he can also salvage the remaining two years of his administration. So he is taking a risk, challenging not only the Democratic leadership in Congress but also some members of his own party, who are openly skeptical that the new policy will work and who, unlike the president, will be running for re-election.

But there are no guarantees that Mr. Bush's reading of the country and the Congress will prove correct.

"It's more than a risk, it's a riverboat gamble," said Leon E. Panetta, a Democratic member of the Iraq Study Group and former chief of staff to President Bill Clinton. "There's no question that under our system he's going to be able to deploy these troops without Congress being able to stop him. But he's going to face so many battles over these next few months, on funding for the war, on every decision he makes, that he's basically taking the nation into another nightmare of conflict over a war that no one sees any end to."

The White House orchestrated an elaborate rollout for the speech, including a presidential briefing for network news anchors before Mr. Bush addressed the nation. On Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates are scheduled to appear at a news conference before testifying on Capitol Hill — a show of cabinet comity that might have been unthinkable when Donald H. Rumsfeld was still at the Pentagon.

Acknowledging that any mistakes in Iraq were his own and that Americans would face "trying hours" in the months ahead, Mr. Bush took pains to say he had consulted with members of Congress. But Democrats complained the consultation was perfunctory. Standing outside the White House after meeting with the president just hours before his speech, Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised to force a vote on Mr. Bush's plan.

That vote would be nonbinding. But in the months to come, Democrats could go further, tying Mr. Bush's hands by setting conditions on the use of tax dollars, as Congress did during the Vietnam War and in Lebanon and Central America.

Wartime clashes between presidents and the Congress are a familiar thread in American history. But perhaps no president since Richard M. Nixon has so boldly expanded an unpopular war. Explaining his decision to invade Cambodia in April 1970, Nixon said: "A majority of the American people, a majority of you listening to me, are for the withdrawal of our forces from Vietnam. The action I have taken tonight is indispensable for the continuing success of that withdrawal program."

Likewise, Mr. Bush has concluded that he must scale up American involvement in order to scale it down. The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, said on Tuesday that Mr. Bush hoped to "bring the public back to this war." But the president's aides are under no illusions.

"The reality is, conditions on the ground have to change," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president.

In the meantime, some Republicans are already jumping ship. Moderates like Senators Gordon H. Smith of Oregon and Susan Collins of Maine, both up for re-election in 2008, oppose sending more troops to Baghdad, and on Wednesday, a conservative, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, joined them.

After Democrats swept the November midterm elections, people both inside and outside the administration expected the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to provide Mr. Bush with a face-saving exit from the war. Mr. Bush made favorable reference to the study group on Wednesday night, noting that he had accepted some of its 79 recommendations.

But he rejected its central notion, that the United States should set a timetable for scaling back combat operations and mount a new diplomatic offensive to engage Iran and Syria. Mr. Bush concluded that those recommendations were not a recipe for victory, but rather, as he said after a meeting with Mr. Maliki in November, a recipe for “a graceful exit,” a path he did not want to pursue. At their meeting, Mr. Maliki presented Mr. Bush with a plan calling for Iraqi troops to assume primary responsibility for security in Baghdad, shifting American troops to the periphery of the capital. Instead, Mr. Bush concluded that the United States would have to take a central role, because the Iraqis were not capable of quelling the sectarian violence on their own.

In a sense, it is a predictable path for Mr. Bush. This, after all, is the same president who lost the popular vote in 2000, was installed in the White House by a 5-to-4 vote of the Supreme Court and then governed as if he had won by a landslide. And this is the same president who, after winning re-election in 2004, famously told reporters that he had “earned capital in the campaign, political capital, and now I intend to spend it.”

But no American president has been able to prosecute a war indefinitely without the support of the American public. With polls showing fewer than 20 percent of Americans supporting increasing troop levels in Iraq, Mr. Bush and those Republicans who support him know that the new policy will be a tough sell.

“The American people have no reason in the world to think it’s going to work just like the president paints it,” said one of those backers, Senator Pete V. Domenici of New Mexico, “but I think the American people, in their usual good sense, are going to wait around for a while and say, ‘Mr. President, you’ve taken us down a lot of roads in Iraq, let’s go down this one and see if it works.’ ”

The question for Mr. Bush is just how long the American people, and their elected representatives, will wait.

As He Touts A 'Way Forward,' Bush Admits Errors Of The Past (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

As his reelection campaign geared up in 2004, President Bush was asked to name his biggest mistake. He couldn't think of one. By the time he was asked again last year, he had thought of one, his inappropriate "tough talk." Last night, Bush acknowledged that some of the most fundamental assumptions underlying the U.S. venture in Iraq were wrong.

The evolution tracks the sharp deterioration not only of the U.S. position in Iraq, but also of Bush's position at home. As he argued to send even more troops into a war that has lost public support, Bush labored to convince Congress and the American people that he understands where he went wrong and has learned from those errors.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he told the nation. "It is clear that we need to change our strategy in Iraq." He added that generals have "reviewed the new Iraqi plan to ensure that it addressed these mistakes" and "they report that it does."

A chart released by the White House before Bush's "Way Forward" speech went even further, outlining a succession of basic assumptions made in the past about Iraq that as of yesterday it has disavowed -- including the notion that building a democracy would defuse the insurgency and bring down violence. It was the sort of chart Bush's critics might have put together, not a White House traditionally loath to admit mistakes.

Still, the president's admissions were calculated to advance his current political aims and came with significant limitations. He offered no regret for the March 2003 invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein and still argued for staying in Iraq until the job is done. His tone was sober but came without apology or contrition. As one aide put it, "This is not a speech being given on bended knee."

But it was a speech being given arguably with his knees cut out from under him. The spiraling violence in Iraq has turned two-thirds of the American public against him, according to polls, and with Democrats now in charge of Congress, Bush appears increasingly isolated in Washington. Despite his post-election talk of bipartisanship, Bush chose a path almost guaranteed to generate open resistance even from within his own party. Republican officeholders who did stick with him last night appeared largely unenthusiastic.

"He's pretty much alone on this," said William S. Cohen, a former Republican senator from Maine who served as defense secretary under President Bill Clinton. Bush had an opportunity to draw Democrats in by embracing at least some recommendations of the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group, Cohen said: "It would buy you bipartisanship for five or six months. . . . By simply ignoring it and allowing it to die in the crib, so to speak, Democrats are now free agents."

To admirers, that is a virtue. "He's going to do what's in his heart of hearts and nobody can deter him from that course," said James Jay Carafano, a Heritage Foundation scholar. "He's never going to make everybody happy and he's not going to make even most people happy, and he shouldn't try. So the politics of this are going to suck, but he's going to do what he thinks he should do."

For some in the capital, the speech and the president's dilemma brought back haunting memories of another era. "The administration is making the same mistakes now that we made in Vietnam and I'm really sorry about that," said Jack J. Valenti, an aide to President Lyndon B. Johnson. "I learned in Vietnam when the public loses support for a war, forget about it -- it's all over."

Harry McPherson recalled the March 1968 speech he wrote that shifted the direction of the war and that Johnson used to end his reelection bid. Like then, McPherson said, there are no good options. "Many of the same consequences are being bruited about. What happens if we pull out of there? What happens if they win in Iraq? What happens to American prestige in the world? That's what we talked about all the time." While the Iraq war was "a gigantic mistake," he said, "there is a big cost to leaving."

The White House recognized that a speech will not convert critics. "Nobody is under illusions that the public is going to be turned around on this," said the Bush aide, who was not authorized to speak on the record. "What you hope to accomplish with a speech like this is to show the public that there is a genuine, deep and fundamental change and there's a good chance of success."

To make the case that he has embraced fundamental change, Bush had to concede mistakes in a more meaningful way. For the past year or so, he has acknowledged that tactics were flawed but not core decisions. Asked about mistakes at a joint news conference last year, British Prime Minister Tony Blair cited the purge of tens of thousands of members of Hussein's Baath Party from the Iraqi government, one of the most consequential moves after the invasion. Bush, by contrast, said he should not have taunted insurgents by declaring, "Bring 'em on."

Bush went further in his analysis last night. The plan to secure Baghdad, he said, "failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents." He also agreed with Blair that de-Baathification went too far.

In the speech, Bush did not dwell on these mistakes, but the White House elaborated in the chart comparing past "key assumptions" with current ones, showing how its understanding of Iraq has changed. In the past, the chart said, the White House believed "political progress will help defuse the insurgency." But now it has concluded that "political and economic progress are unlikely absent a basic level of security." In the past, the White House assumed the "majority of Iraqis will support the Coalition and Iraqi efforts to build a democratic state." Now, it said, "Iraqis [are] increasingly disillusioned with Coalition efforts."

The chart went on to say that the White House wrongly assumed that dialogue with insurgent groups would reduce violence, that other countries in the region have a strategic interest in a stable Iraq and that Iraqi security forces were gaining strength to handle threats. Now, it said, dialogue has not worked, Arab states have not fully supported the Iraqi government and many Iraqi forces are "not yet ready to handle" the security threat.

Bush must now make the case that those new assumptions are more valid than the last and that his plan will address them. "To be persuasive, President Bush needs to show what specific results an escalation will achieve and when," said Anthony Lake, who was one of Clinton's national security advisers. "And his problem is, he will then be held accountable for those results."

Bush Outlines New Tactics For Iraq, But Faces Big Obstacles (MCT)

By William Douglas And Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush laid out his "New Way Forward" in Iraq Wednesday night, calling for beefing up U.S. forces there by extending tours of duty for 21,500 troops, adding $1.2 billion in new reconstruction aid and letting Iraqi forces take the lead in joint combat operations.

"The changes I have outlined tonight are aimed at ensuring the survival of a young democracy that is fighting for its life in a part of the world of enormous importance to American security," Bush said in a nationally televised address. "The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will."

Bush's latest Iraq plan faces two immediate obstacles:

-Leaders of the new Democratic-led Congress oppose his proposed troop buildup, as do many influential Republicans. They may try to block it, though they haven't agreed on a firm plan to do so.

-Bush's plan relies on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Shiite Muslim-dominated government to crack down on its allies in the country's Shiite militias, which it has so far refused to do.

Questions abound: Will an additional 21,500 American troops in Iraq, taken mostly from units to be held longer in Iraq or sent there sooner, be enough to help restore order both in Baghdad and in violent, Sunni-dominated Anbar Province?

Will an additional $1 billion in aid make a dent in the country's economic problems?

Last, will Bush's efforts to reassure Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Kuwait and Iraq's other Sunni Muslim neighbors calm their fears that Shiite power may expand from Iran through Iraq to Lebanon? Bush has sent an aircraft carrier battle group and some Patriot missile defense batteries to the Persian Gulf to calm Sunni Arab nerves. But he has largely ignored recommendations to open talks with Iran and Syria and to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

The president acknowledged previous failures.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. Past efforts to quell violence in Baghdad failed, he said, because "there were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods" and "there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have." He said his plan would remedy such flaws.

He warned of a "bloody and violent" year ahead in the war-torn country, despite his new proposals.

"This new strategy will not yield an immediate end to suicide bombings, assassinations, or IED (improvised explosive device) attacks," Bush said. "Our enemies in Iraq will make every effort to ensure that our television screens are filled with images of death and suffering."

Bush appeared to signal a more aggressive policy toward Syria and Iran, saying the U.S. would take unspecified steps to "disrupt" attacks on U.S. troops by terrorists and insurgents who use Iranian and Syrian territory to move in and out of Iraq.

Specifically, Bush proposed:

-Boosting U.S. troop strength in Iraq by 21,500 by extending tours of duty, with about 17,500 to Baghdad and 4,000 to Anbar Province. The increase will be staggered, with the first combat brigade arriving in Baghdad on Jan. 15 and the second on Feb. 15. Additional brigades will be added every 30 days.

-Increasing economic reconstruction aid by $1 billion.

-Having Iraq deploy 10,500 additional Iraqi troops and nine additional 800-man police brigades in Baghdad, with all of the new military units in place by Feb. 15.

-A new command structure that will put Iraqis in charge of security in Baghdad, with U.S. troops deeply embedded in Iraqi units. U.S. troops would remain under U.S. command.

-An end to the open-ended commitment of U.S. troops, but no timetable for withdrawal.

-Having Iraqis take the lead responsibility for security throughout the country by November, with continued U.S. help after that.

-The deployment of additional civilian reconstruction teams, including teams embedded with troops to hasten rebuilding efforts in newly secured areas.

-New diplomatic efforts to get more help from Iraq's neighbors and a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

-More pressure on Iraqis to follow through on plans for provincial elections, a new law for distributing oil revenues and other measures intended to foster Iraqi unity.

In addition, Bush's plan appears to abandon a key point of previous U.S. strategy - it no longer emphasizes disarming and disbanding Shiite militias, leaving both to the Iraqi government, which depends on those militia for support.

Bush put Iraq on notice that America won't stay forever.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said. "If we increase our support at this crucial moment and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

Bush's immediate audience is a Democratic-controlled Congress already hostile to his plan to increase U.S. troops in Iraq. Democratic House and Senate leaders issued a statement following his speech repeating their opposition.

Both House and Senate Democrats plan floor votes soon on resolutions opposing the president's troop buildup, but they'll be nonbinding.

Democratic congressional leaders don't appear to have an immediate consensus, however, on what, if any, binding legislation they should push or how fast to move. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., hopes to pass legislation that would require congressional approval of any increase in troops, but party leaders concede that they lack the votes to make that stick at this time, especially over a Bush veto.

Bush, however, can no longer count on solid Republican support in Congress.

"I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., said Wednesday on the Senate floor. "If Iraq is to fulfill its role as a sovereign and democratic state, it must start acting like one."

Similarly, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who's exploring a bid for the presidency in 2008 as a social-values conservative, declared himself against a troop increase Wednesday.

"I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer," Brownback said while traveling in Iraq. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

DOJ_NMG_0115397

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Wednesday he's weighing a Senate resolution endorsing the approach of the Iraq Study Group, which called last month for urgently shifting responsibility to Iraqi forces so that most U.S. combat troops could be withdrawn by early next year.

In the House of Representatives, eight Republicans sent a letter Wednesday to Bush urging him not to increase troop levels.

Many of Bush's new proposals - a limited increase in U.S. troops, Iraqis taking the lead in security matters, billions in reconstruction aid - have been tried before and failed to reduce violence or quell the insurgency.

Last fall, for example, an Iraqi-led joint U.S.-Iraqi military mission to secure some of Baghdad's most violent neighborhoods produced complaints from U.S. military commanders about the ineptness of Iraqi forces.

U.S. military officials complained that the daily missions started late and some Iraqi troops failed to show up for work. Some Iraqi soldiers would do their job only in front of American forces and slack off if only Iraqi commanders were around.

Some top U.S. military officials in Iraq say for Bush's plan to work, Iraqi officials must go after Sunni and Shiite extremists. U.S. troops have aggressively targeted Sunni areas, conceding they can't enter Shiite strongholds, such as Sadr City, because of Iraqi political pressure. Shiite support is the backbone of al-Maliki's government.

Americans have already soured on Iraq. In recent polls, public support for sending more troops to Iraq ranged from 12 percent to 36 percent of Americans, depending on how the question was phrased.

"This is his last chance to convince the American public that he knows what he's doing and victory is possible," said Dennis Goldford, a political science professor at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa. "He's tied his whole presidency to this. He got us into this situation. He thinks there's a way out. This is his last chance at a last chance."

If it fails, Goldford said, Iraq "could become the all-consuming issue" for the final two years of Bush's term, crowding other presidential initiatives. "If he's totally ineffective, he leaves this ravaged sore on the body politic as well as foreign relations."

President Bush's New Plan For Iraq Could Soon Run Into Old Obstacles (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush unveiled what the White House called a "New Way Forward" in Iraq on Wednesday night, but the plan faces old obstacles that have defied solution ever since the United States invaded Iraq nearly four years ago.

Bush's plan relies even more than past stratagems on a weak Iraqi government to fulfill promises it's repeatedly broken to take on sectarian militias and end political squabbles.

It calls for Iraqis to beef up their forces in Baghdad to help quell raging violence there, four months after the Iraqi government failed to contribute four of the six battalions of troops it promised to a similar security effort.

The plan calls for reordering Iraq's Interior Ministry, something that American officials have been insisting on since last spring, when Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki came to office.

Bush also said that Iraq's government would pass a new law on distributing oil revenues and revise its de-Baathification program, which keeps members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party out of government. But both efforts have been stymied by opposition in Iraq's parliament.

The biggest course change is the declaration that Iraqis will be in charge of the effort to secure Baghdad, which al-Maliki has been pushing for.

Bush aides, who detailed the plan in a series of documents and briefings, insisted Wednesday that this time is different. Al-Maliki has pledged to deploy more Iraqi forces to stabilize Baghdad, and the full U.S. troop contingent and financial aid package won't flow unless he follows through on that and other steps, they said.

But if al-Maliki fails to deliver, the president appears to have little leverage other than to bring U.S. troops home - and abandon the "victory" in Iraq that he insists is vital to U.S. national security.

"An awful lot depends on the Iraqis. We don't control the Iraqis anymore," said Daniel Serwer, a vice president of the government-funded U.S. Institute of Peace.

Some current and former U.S. officials said they believe that by placing so much of the burden on the Iraqis, Bush is preparing to blame them for the debacle in their country and withdraw American troops.

Bush for the first time Wednesday said that the U.S. commitment in Iraq isn't open-ended - though he put no time limit on how long Americans would wait to see whether al-Maliki fulfilled his promises. The first test will come Feb. 15, when the additional Iraqi troops are to be deployed in Baghdad.

The president's strategy, the product of a more than two-month review, does abandon some key tenets that have guided U.S. strategy in Iraq for more than a year.

DOJ_NMG_0115398

Gone is the attempt to reach out to Sunni insurgents; previous efforts to bring them into the political process didn't reduce violence, and the U.S. is ending any effort to do so.

Gone, too, is the rapid effort to replace U.S. troops with Iraqi ones, captured in the mantra "As they stand up, we will stand down." While training Iraqi troops remains the key U.S. mission, the No. 1 U.S. goal in Iraq is the defeat of al-Qaida and its supporters.

Outside analysts said they saw some positive elements in the plan, such as a focus on protecting Iraqi civilians and jump-starting the economy from the grass roots - both classic elements of counterinsurgency doctrine. Bush proposes almost $1.2 billion in new economic assistance in Iraq and a doubling of U.S. civil-military reconstruction teams.

But many said they feared Bush's modified tactics are too little and too late to make up for past blunders in Iraq. Those include invading with too few troops, disbanding the Iraqi army, underestimating the cost of the venture and misjudging the rapid growth of Iraq's insurgency.

"The problem is the solutions applied three years ago or two years ago might have stabilized the situation. . . . I find it hard to see they will apply today," said Judith Yaphe, a Persian Gulf expert at the National Defense University.

At best, the current and former officials said, Bush's plan might produce measurable improvement in Baghdad's security - perhaps returning it to the situation before February 2006, when the bombing of an important Shiite mosque in Samarra set off Iraq's civil war.

The core of Bush's "New Way Forward" is a bid to end the endemic violence in Baghdad by deploying 17,500 more U.S. troops and thousands of additional Iraqi troops and police and adopting new rules of engagement.

White House officials said Iraqi forces would take the lead, with American troops embedded in Iraqi units.

That's been tried before, too, and failed, in last summer's joint effort to bring security to Baghdad, called Operation Forward Together.

For the new plan to work, the Iraqi government must crack down on both Sunni and Shiite extremists, top military officials in Baghdad said.

But al-Maliki has refused to move against the militias of powerful Shiite politicians, including firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who are the bedrock of his political support. It is unclear why he'd do so now.

Sunnis, representing Iraq's now-dispossessed minority, criticized the U.S. troop increase even before Bush formally announced it. Sunni insurgents are certain to react with more violence to joint security sweeps by U.S. troops and forces of the Shiite-led Iraqi government.

On Tuesday, some in Iraq thought they saw what a security plan under al-Maliki could look like when Iraqi forces struck Haifa Street in central Baghdad, a longtime Sunni insurgent trouble spot.

U.S. and Iraqi forces fought suspected insurgents for 12 hours in an operation that Sunni politicians charged was sectarian. After Sunnis responded to an attack by al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, they charged, the Iraqi army came in with American forces and struck the Sunnis but did nothing about the Shiite extremists who were there earlier.

The Iraqi government has long claimed that if it quells the Sunni insurgency, the violent reaction from the Shiite militias will end and they'll be disarmed. That approach has been tried and failed, but there's no sign that the al-Maliki government is rethinking it.

Whether Iraqi troops will be up to the task of helping pacify Baghdad neighborhood by neighborhood is as questionable as ever.

During Operation Forward Together, some Iraqi forces did their jobs well. But most daily missions started late, as Iraqi commanders and U.S. forces counted how many Iraqi troops came to work that day.

While U.S. and Iraqi troops were in troubled neighborhoods, such as Amariyah in western Baghdad, crime did fall. But as soon as the troops left, the insurgents moved back in, and the violence, including sectarian killings, car bombings and explosions, surpassed previous levels.

Many wonder where the Iraqi government will find fresh troops for Baghdad. U.S. military transition team leaders in the northern Iraqi city of Sulaimaniyah told McClatchy Newspapers last month that predominantly Kurdish brigades there would dissolve if they were ordered to the capital.

How al-Maliki might bring about political reconciliation, another aspect of Bush's plan, also is unclear. There's intense skepticism that he can move beyond his Shiite base and deliver his half of the bargain, as even a senior Bush aide acknowledged Wednesday.

"There is obviously skepticism, and the president has made that very clear to this (Iraqi) government: People are skeptical - your people are skeptical, our people are skeptical. I will support you, but you need to perform," said the official, briefing reporters anonymously under White House ground rules.

DOJ_NMG_0115399

Larry Diamond of Stanford University's Hoover Institution said Bush should have demanded action from the Iraqis before pledging additional U.S. troops and money.

"They've made commitments many times before, and they aren't delivered upon," said Diamond, who served as a democracy adviser in postwar Iraq. "The deadlines and goals are constantly slipping - and they're like mush."

Analysis: A 'Make-it-or-break-it Moment' On Iraq (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Not since the Vietnam War has a president faced such a daunting policy challenge: Rallying Americans behind a costly military venture that already has lost much of its support among the public and in Congress.

President Bush chose the unusual setting of the White House library — where Jimmy Carter donned a cardigan for his 1977 energy speech — to deliver a long-awaited address outlining his "new way forward" in Iraq.

He chose not so much a change of direction as an acceleration, committing 21,500 more U.S. troops and demanding political progress from Baghdad. Even Arizona Sen. John McCain, a supporter, calls the plan a "last chance" to avoid a decisive setback in Iraq.

And, some say, to his presidency.

"This is a make-it-or-break-it moment," says Ken Duberstein, a chief of staff in the Reagan White House. "This is as much about Bush and his leadership for the last two years as it is about Iraq."

After the congressional elections in November, Bush seemed ready to change course in Iraq. He said voters had delivered "a thumpin' " by handing control of Congress to Democrats in an election driven in large part by anxiety about the war. He replaced Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Then, in December, the Iraq Study Group, headed by Bush family consigliere James Baker, issued a report it titled "the way forward — a new approach." It called for increased regional diplomacy, threats of cuts in U.S. support if the Iraqi government didn't meet political goals and the withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by March 2008.

While he called the commission's recommendations "thoughtful," Bush mapped a course largely at odds with its key provisions.

He's committing more troops and calling on Iraq to meet political goals, but without the threat of U.S. penalties if they don't. While the commission endorsed negotiations with Iran and Syria, Bush calls for increased efforts — and the deployment of a new carrier strike group — to disrupt supply lines from the two countries to Iraqi fighters.

Except for the troop increase, none of the ideas is new. All are familiar parts of the administration's strategy in Iraq and Bush's prior speeches defending it.

Leon Panetta, a White House chief of staff for President Clinton and one of the 10 members of the Iraq Study Group, says the members were concerned from the start whether the White House would listen to what they had to say.

"The president is pretty obstinate about what he thought were the right answers, and obviously we weren't delivering good news, so I can't say it was unanticipated," he says. Panetta called it "disappointing."

"The most important thing we did was to identify the realities of what's happening there," Panetta adds. "If you accept those realities, it leads you to many of the recommendations that we made. If you refuse to accept those realities, then you're going to repeat the same old mistakes. I think unfortunately that's where the president seems to be."

The stakes for Bush, already high, have been raised because he has become so isolated politically when it comes to the war. Six in 10 Americans oppose increasing troop levels, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. Seven in 10 disapprove of his handling of Iraq.

Congressional Republicans, who since the 2003 invasion generally have stood behind the administration, are now divided. And congressional Democrats are considering proposals that would either express disapproval of the troop escalation or try to block funding for it.

"Generally, presidents have a very difficult time changing public opinion," especially once opposition has gelled, says Brandice Canes-Wrone, a professor at Princeton who has studied the power of White House addresses. But Bush's speech may well "buy him some time" to proceed because he is "taking ownership" of a controversial policy.

"If this doesn't work out," she says, "then Bush is to blame solely."

Early in his address, the president acknowledged for the first time that the administration had erred in sending too few troops. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. He called the current situation "unacceptable."

Still, he portrayed retreat as unthinkable, describing the war as a critical part of the larger struggle against global terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0115400

That is an argument Bush often has made — indeed, in a speech on Iraq he delivered precisely one year earlier, to the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Washington.

"When victory comes and democracy takes hold in Iraq, it will serve as a model for freedom in the broader Middle East," he declared on Jan. 10, 2006. He predicted U.S. combat forces would be reduced within a few months and derided some Democratic critics of the war as "irresponsible."

On Wednesday, a subdued Bush made no such predictions of democracy's spread, and his tone toward congressional Democrats was conciliatory rather than confrontational. "Honorable people have different views," he said.

His basic message, though, was unchanged. To "step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear that country apart and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale," he said, creating new dangers for Americans. The year ahead, he said, "will demand more patience, sacrifice and resolve."

Past Troop Surges In Iraq Produced Mixed Results (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Troop surges like the one announced by President Bush last night have been tried before in Iraq to stabilize the country for elections or dampen an upswing in violence -- with mixed results.

The real test for the president's new strategy is how this surge will differ from the past. For example, Mr. Bush ordered more forces into Iraq in July to stop sectarian violence in greater Baghdad. More than 15,000 U.S. soldiers joined 40,000 Iraqi forces in block-by-block sweeps.

But the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki never cracked down on Shi'ite militias, some loyal to a key political supporter, Sheik Muqtada al-Sadr. In the end, the Baghdad command acknowledged the offensive did not meet its objectives.

This time, Mr. Bush pledged that events will be different. The Iraqi army will go after Shi'ites, not just Sunnis. And the buildup will not have a time limit.

Baghdad will be divided into nine military sectors. Mr. al-Maliki will appoint a Baghdad military commander. From the 17,000 U.S. soldiers going to the capital, battalions will be joined with each Iraqi brigade, creating training and operations all in one, said a military source.

On Iran, part of the plan is already in place: a buildup of naval forces in the Persian Gulf. Plus, the source said, the U.S. will capture and hold Iranians helping the insurgents in the hope that this will provide some leverage against Iran's aid to the insurgency.

"The surge will work as long as the Iraqis do their part, and our hands are untied to be tough where required," said retired Army Lt. Col. Robert Maginnis, a military analyst. "Maliki must decide between working with the U.S. and his misplaced loyalties to al-Sadr. I believe the militia issue is the real center of gravity, not necessarily Baghdad. It happens that militia problems are worse in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush has ordered surges before with mixed results. In May 2004, forces were declining to 115,000. But violence in Sunni-dominated Fallujah, and in Shi'ite towns around Najaf, forced the Pentagon to halt the drawdown and rebuild back to 138,000.

The results: A Marine-led force ultimately retook Fallujah that November. Army brigades clashed with Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi Army in a series of battles, reducing the militia to a few hundred.

But Sheik al-Sadr escaped death or arrest. He methodically rebuilt his army, with the help of Iran. Today, he controls thousands of fighters, some of whom break off into death squads and hunt down, torture and kill Sunnis. Hundreds of the bodies have been found strewn around Baghdad.

The Pentagon also surged troops three times for elections: a transition assembly; a constitution and a permanent parliament in December 2005. In each case, the surge was targeted to improve security in the run-up to balloting and then to create a safe atmosphere for voters. The strategy worked. All three elections were deemed successful by international observers. But they had limited impact on long-term violence.

The last buildup came this past summer. Mr. Bush again ordered an increase, from 127,000 to 150,000 to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. The offensive did not work, and Republicans lost control of Congress in part because of larger number of voters turning against the war.

The president then began a far-reaching review, which ended last night with his announced decision to try a troop surge for the sixth time with new tactics.

In Congress, Bush's Plan Unites Dems, Splinters GOP (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Nicole Gaouette

DOJ_NMG_0115401

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's plan to send additional troops to Iraq has further united Democrats on Capitol Hill, who nearly unanimously condemned the president's proposals Wednesday night.

Republicans, meanwhile, have splintered in the face of widespread popular discontent over the war and Bush's plans to escalate it.

The congressional reaction Wednesday to the president's prime-time television address underscored how dramatically Bush's proposal has changed the political dynamic in Washington less than a week after Democrats assumed control of the House and Senate.

Emboldened Democrats, who for years struggled to find common ground in challenging the White House, have found a target in the plan and are coalescing around the demand that troops be withdrawn.

And once-united Republicans now face an unpleasant choice: stand behind a deeply unpopular troop buildup or take on the head of their party.

"There is a lot of anxiety and heartburn here," Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., said outside the House chamber, noting the conflicted feelings of many GOP lawmakers toward Bush. "He's our guy. No one wants to go against our guy. And he's the commander in chief and the guy who campaigned for all of us. But he is Iraq." LaHood and many Republicans stood by the president Wednesday, praising Bush for his commitment to reducing the sectarian strife in Iraq.

"The president should be commended for adapting to the reality on the ground in Iraq," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "And although the new plan is not without risk, it provides the best chance for helping the Iraqi people form a country that can defend itself and is an ally in the war on terror."

But McConnell does not head a united front.

A number of Republican senators expressed deep reservations about the president's proposals Wednesday.

"I want real evidence that a potential surge in troops will do more good than harm and will not exacerbate the existing violence in Iraq," said Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, who was invited to the White House to discuss the plan. "I am skeptical."

Other GOP dissenters include Sens. Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, Norm Coleman of Minnesota, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon and Sam Brownback of Kansas, a presidential candidate who once staunchly supported Bush's foreign policy.

Continuing their strident criticism of the Bush administration's war strategy, Smith called the plan a "Hail Mary pass" and Hagel said it was "dangerously wrongheaded."

Also withholding support was Georgia Republican Rep. Jack Kingston, whose district is the home of the U.S. Army's 3rd Infantry Division, which has served two tours in Iraq.

Democrats, by contrast, rallied Wednesday in vigorous opposition, taking to the floors of the House and Senate and stepping before television cameras to condemn the president.

"There are no timelines, no real goals .... I was very disappointed," California Sen. Dianne Feinstein said on CNN. "It is an escalation. And I'm hard-pressed to see how we come out of that kind of escalation as victors."

Feinstein and other Democrats have voiced increasing alarm about sending more troops into the middle of a burgeoning civil war that they say can only be quelled by Iraqis themselves.

Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, who ran as an independent last year but still caucuses with the Democrats, was a lonely supporter of the president, whom he praised for pushing a "correct and courageous course."

"It is a dangerous illusion to believe that we can depart Iraq and the inevitable killing fields, and terrorist violence will not follow us in retreat, even to our own shores," Lieberman said.

The war continues to pose difficulties for Democrats.

The party's plans to focus on a 100-hour domestic agenda packed with popular measures like ethics reform and a minimum wage hike were overshadowed by the debate over Bush's much-anticipated Iraq speech.

And Democrats, who rode to power on voter discontent with the war, are being forced to articulate a real strategy to match their rhetoric.

But Bush's plan appears to have galvanized Democrats -- who just last summer were put on the defensive by Republicans who induced nearly a quarter of the House Democrats to back a GOP resolution expressing support for Bush's war policies.

Wednesday, House and Senate leaders were confidently gearing up to introduce resolutions opposing the president's plans.

"My bet is that if an up-or-down vote happened on the Senate floor on whether we should send a significantly increased number of troops, that that vote would be overwhelmingly against sending the troops, and a significant number of Republicans would vote not to send more troops to Iraq," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., who helped quarterback Senate Democrats to their November election success.

Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Mass., were lining up co-sponsors for their bills, which would go even further and cut off funds for increasing troop levels in Iraq.

Among their supporters are Sens. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., and John F. Kerry, D-Mass.

"Last year ... there was some squeamishness about the war," said Kerry, who pushed an unsuccessful measure last spring to require a troop withdrawal. "Now there is a unanimity in our caucus."

Analysis: Bush Speech Draws Lines (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, January 11, 2007

President Bush's announcement that he is sending more troops to Iraq sets up the first major test of wills between his Republican administration and the new Democratic-controlled Congress. Both sides are digging in.

The political stakes raised by Bush's prime-time television address were high on both sides.

Democrats, who came to power in midterm elections two months ago in large part because of growing public opposition to the war, must walk a fine line between criticizing Bush's plans and appearing to be obstructionists or undermining the military.

And they presently rule Congress with insufficient numbers to block Bush's plan.

For Bush, the decision to send more troops to Iraq — rather than begin a withdrawal of combat forces as recommended last month by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group — is a huge gamble.

If it fails, he will have few if any options left.

Defying public opinion polls and the newly empowered Democratic leadership, Bush on Wednesday moved to send 21,500 more U.S. troops to Iraq while saying it was a mistake not to have had more forces there previously.

He recognized the risks ahead. "Even if our new strategy works exactly as planned, deadly acts of violence will continue and we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties," Bush said in Wednesday's address to the nation. But, he added, "to step back now would force a collapse of the Iraqi government, tear that country apart, and result in mass killings on an unimaginable scale,"

Democrats served notice they would challenge his plan, with aggressive hearings that begin on Thursday and with votes in both the House and Senate in the coming days on a nonbinding measure opposing any increase in troops.

"American voters expect us to help get us out of Iraq," said Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and a 2008 presidential hopeful.

Congress voted in October 2002 by wide margins to authorize Bush to take military action in Iraq. That authority stands.

Since they now run Congress, even though by thin majorities, Democrats also now share with the president some responsibility over the unpopular war.

Despite their vows to carefully scrutinize Bush's troop increase, their near-term options are limited.

While it's true that Congress controls the government's purse strings, politically about the most it can do is hold hearings and pass symbolic resolutions.

If, even if with the help of some Republicans, Congress is able to pass legislation, such as that proposed this week by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., to require Bush to get congressional approval before sending more troops to Iraq, Bush will surely veto it.

And, given the slim margin of Democratic control, such a veto would almost certainly be sustained.

"The Democrats may control Congress but they can't block the president this time without potentially being accused of losing the war. I think an awful lot of this is staging for the next time," the 2008 presidential and congressional elections, said Anthony Cordesman, an Iraq expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

For Bush, many dangers lurk in the new plan.

The new troops might not be enough to stabilize the country. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki might not rise to Bush's challenge to do more in controlling sectarian violence and shutting down private militias. The new U.S. troops could present more targets to militants.

"We have to succeed. We must succeed. The consequences of failure are catastrophic in the region," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who has long advocated more troops.

Furthermore, Bush risks losing more and more Republican support, which in turn would hasten his lame-duck status. Next week's votes are, in part, a strategy to divide Republicans by forcing them to take a public stand on the war.

"At this point, the battle lines have been drawn pretty deeply. And the concrete is setting," said Stephen Wayne, a professor of government at Georgetown University. "I regard this as a last gasp for the president to try to get a successful resolution of the Iraq quagmire."

Both parties are divided on what to do next.

DOJ_NMG_0115403

More and more Republicans are trying to distance themselves from Bush and the war.

And Democrats are divided on how far to go in fighting Bush's plan or in pressing for troop withdrawals, even as the party's liberal base pressures them to do more to bring troops home.

"If the question is whether Congress would cut off funds, the answer is no. But you had an election in November that was widely interpreted as a rejection of the president's war policy," said John Isaacs, president of the Council for a Livable World, an arms control advocacy group.

"While Americans are not sure about how to get out, and only a small proportion back immediate withdrawal, they certainly aren't inclined to support a new increase, an escalation," said Isaacs.

Before his speech, Bush personally briefed both Democratic and Republican leaders on details of his plan. The leaders emerged in agreement on just one thing — that Americans are understandably skeptical and that the war so far has gone badly.

Then, they respectively sounded what are sure to be battle themes for the coming days.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi renewed their opposition to additional troops. But, said Reid, "We as senators have had no ability to have any input in the president's position on this."

House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said the plan might be distasteful to some but he called it "our best shot at victory in Iraq."

Intensified Combat On Streets Likely (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's plan to send tens of thousands of U.S. and Iraqi reinforcements to Baghdad to jointly confront Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias is likely to touch off a more dangerous phase of the war, featuring months of fighting in the streets of the Iraqi capital, current and former military officials warned.

"The terrorists and insurgents in Iraq are without conscience, and they will make the year ahead bloody and violent," the president said last night in explaining his revised approach. "Even if our new strategy works exactly as planned, deadly acts of violence will continue -- and we must expect more Iraqi and American casualties."

The prospect of a more intense battle in the Iraqi capital could put U.S. military commanders in exactly the sort of tough urban fight that war planners strove to avoid during the spring 2003 invasion of the country. The plan to partner U.S. and Iraqi units may compel American soldiers to rely on questionable Iraqi army and police forces as never before. And while the president insisted there is no timetable associated with the troop increase, military officials said sustaining it for more than a few months would place a major new strain on U.S. forces that already are feeling burdened by an unexpectedly long and difficult war.

Most of all, the White House's insistence on confronting all insurgents and militias, both Sunni and Shiite, may mean that the U.S. military will wind up fighting the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. That militia is estimated by some U.S. intelligence officials to have grown over the past year to about 60,000 fighters, and some in the Pentagon consider it more militarily effective than the Iraqi army. Fighting it could resemble on a citywide scale the sharp combat that took place this week along central Baghdad's Haifa Street, in which U.S. jets and attack helicopters conducted airstrikes just north of the U.S. Embassy in the protected Green Zone.

"There will be more violence than usual because of the surge, and a surge with more casualties plays up on the international stage," said a senior Army official. Sadr "is going to have to make a choice, and if he decides on a confrontation, it will be pretty significant," added a senior Pentagon official.

Sadr is one of the most powerful figures in the Iraqi government, and he has forced it and the U.S. military to back down in the past. Yet if the Mahdi Army is not confronted, the entire offensive may falter and the sectarian conflict may intensify, because Sunnis will feel it is just one more way of attacking them while letting Shiite death squads go free, military experts said. "If our troops do not enter Sadr City, they belittle the notion of a surge because they would leave a leading militia unscathed," said Patrick Cronin of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a defense think tank.

The last time the U.S. military fought both Sunni and Shiite elements in Iraq was the spring of 2004, which became one of the most difficult times in the war. U.S. commanders were stunned to face a two-front conflict against Sunni insurgents in Anbar province and Shiites in Baghdad and across a broad swath of south-central Iraq. Troops from the Army's 1st Cavalry Division fighting in Sadr's stronghold of about 2 million Shiites in eastern Baghdad became enmeshed in a series of clashes resembling the movie "Black Hawk Down." Sadr's militias besieged isolated U.S. patrols and took over police stations, schools and municipal buildings.

DOJ_NMG_0115404

An Army officer who recently commanded a battalion in Baghdad predicted last night that the plan would fail because Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his government "will do things to maintain protection" of Sadr's forces. He also dismissed as "happy talk" the president's notion that the predominantly Shiite Iraqi army and police could reassure pro-insurgent Sunni neighborhoods by conducting foot patrols through them.

Bush said it is now clear that there have not been sufficient troops in Baghdad, and that part of the difference in this approach is that the plan will be adequately resourced. Yet the total number of U.S. troops in Iraq after the planned increase will be about 153,000, less than the peak of about 165,000 in December 2005. Military experts last night wondered, as one said, how a "thin green line" of 17,500 additional soldiers in Baghdad could affect the security situation in a city where many of the 5 million residents are hostile to the U.S. presence. "Too little, too late -- way too late," said retired Col. Jerry Durrant, who has worked as a trainer of Iraqi forces.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted Bush's push for more troops, according to officials familiar with internal deliberations, but recently gave in to the president's wishes. Bush said last night that top commanders reviewed the new plans to add a total of 21,500 Army and Marine forces in Baghdad and Anbar province and approved of them.

"The 'surge' is actually quite small," said retired Army Col. Andrew Bacevich, who compared it with the 206,000 additional troops that Gen. William Westmoreland requested in Vietnam in 1968. "In effect, Bush is counting on the Iraqis to pull our bacon out of the fire," Bacevich said, adding that there is no evidence that the Iraqi military and government are capable of doing so.

The plan calls for the Iraqi government to designate one overall commander for all Iraq army and police personnel in Baghdad. The city would be divided into nine sectors, each with an Iraqi commander and with a U.S. Army battalion assigned to it to support the Iraqi forces.

In the short to medium term, the U.S. military increase in Iraq will involve accelerating some troops into Iraq and extending the tours of others, creating an overlap that raises the overall troop level. At least one Army brigade not originally scheduled to rotate into Iraq -- the 2nd Brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division -- has begun moving into Iraq from Kuwait.

Four more Army brigades in the United States that are already part of the planned 2007 Iraq rotation are expected to deploy beginning in February, between two weeks and two months earlier than scheduled. In Iraq, three Army brigades will be extended past their scheduled one-year tours, in one instance for about four months. Meanwhile, a large Marine combat unit now in Anbar province will have its tour of duty extended.

In the longer term, sustaining elevated troop levels will probably require remobilization of Army National Guard and Army Reserve units. Senior Army officials said they were concerned that soldiers will have longer tours in the war zone or less time at home to see their families, train and repair equipment. Speeding up deployments also carries risks by curtailing time units have to train and receive equipment.

Bush Rhetoric Hard To Square With Facts (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, January 11, 2007

President Bush promised a diplomatic offensive to win support for Iraq from Middle Eastern countries that, if anything, have become more hostile to U.S. policy in Iraq since Saddam Hussein's execution.

In doses of rhetoric hard to square with facts in the region, Bush portrayed the ordinary people of the Middle East as being behind U.S. goals in Iraq, in his speech to the nation Wednesday night.

And he declared the need to address Iran's and Syria's support for insurgents, without acknowledging his refusal to engage either country diplomatically, as many U.S. allies and the Iraq Study Group proposed.

The war that toppled Saddam Hussein's Sunni-run regime has rekindled the centuries-old divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims through Middle East, suspicions that have grown stronger since Saddam's Dec. 30 execution.

Bush, who often invoked the Iraqi leader and his "evil mind" in the past, ignored him in the speech.

In Saudi Arabia, the religious establishment — rooted in the hard-line Wahhabi stream of Sunni Islam — has stepped up its anti-Shiite rhetoric. Last month, about 30 clerics called on Sunnis around the Middle East to support their brethren in Iraq against Shiites and praised the insurgency.

Despite such vitriol, Bush said that from "Afghanistan to Lebanon to the Palestinian Territories, millions of ordinary people" are asking: "Will America withdraw and yield the future of that country to the extremists or will we stand with the Iraqis who have made the choice for freedom?"

Also in his speech:

_Bush declared "al-Qaida is still active in Iraq" and a failed U.S. mission would give such terrorists a safe haven from which to plot attacks against Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0115405

Although few quarrel with that appraisal now, it is also the case that Iraq — contrary to assertions at the time — was not a magnet for al-Qaida before the U.S. invasion.

_Bush proposed $414 million to double the number of U.S. civilian workers who help coordinate local reconstruction projects. These State Department-led units, dubbed Provincial Reconstruction Teams, are to focus on projects both inside and outside Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone. Some will be merged into combat brigades.

He also proposed $400 million in quick-response funds for the teams to do local reconstruction and rebuilding projects.

However, the special inspector general for Iraq said in an October report that continued violence and the lack of security seriously impeded reconstruction. Workers have been prevented from traveling to project sites and the lives of contractors at rebuilding sites are in danger.

The report quoted Iraq's minister of electricity as saying: "Every day I send repair teams, but they can't get to the area; there are too many insurgents ... no one can help."

_The speech also reflected Bush's evolving qualifications about the U.S. commitment to Iraq, not as ironclad now as when he said just over a year ago, "We will stay until the job is done."

The president said in his speech that he made it clear to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and other Iraqi leaders "that America's commitment is not open-ended."

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people — and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

Overall, Bush presented a sobering account of the situation in Iraq, in marked contrast to past statements by the president and his commanders that the U.S. was "on the brink of success," insurgents had been "brought to their knees," and "we have broken the back of the insurgency."

His once-confident challenge to the insurgents — "Bring 'em on" — was replaced by grimmer realism.

Even so, Bush rested much of his case on unknowables — among them whether Iraqi leaders can live up to their pledge to free their forces of the sectarian pressures that have severely limited their effectiveness and made some matters worse.

He declared unequivocally that when U.S. and Iraqi forces sweep insurgents out of Baghdad neighborhoods this time, they won't just rush back in. "This time, we have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," he said.

Promising Troops Where They Aren't Really Wanted (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise And John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 10 — As President Bush challenges public opinion at home by committing more American troops, he is confronted by a paradox: an Iraqi government that does not really want them.

The Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has not publicly opposed the American troop increase, but aides to Mr. Maliki have been saying for weeks that the government is wary of the proposal. They fear that an increased American troop presence, particularly in Baghdad, will be accompanied by a more assertive American role that will conflict with the Shiite government's haste to cut back on American authority and run the war the way it wants. American troops, Shiite leaders say, should stay out of Shiite neighborhoods and focus on fighting Sunni insurgents.

"The government believes there is no need for extra troops from the American side," Haidar al-Abadi, a Parliament member and close associate of Mr. Maliki, said Wednesday. "The existing troops can do the job."

It is an opinion that is broadly held among a Shiite political elite that is increasingly impatient, after nearly two years heading the government here, to exercise power without the constraining supervision of the United States. As a long-oppressed majority, the Shiites have a deep-seated fear that the power they won at the polls, after centuries of subjugation by the Sunni minority, could somehow be pried from their fingers once again.

There are misgivings, too, among other Shiite leaders, including some whom Mr. Bush has courted recently in a United States effort to form a bloc of politicians from the Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities that can break Mr. Maliki's political dependence on the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, who leads the Mahdi Army, the most powerful of the Shiite militias that are at the heart of sectarian violence in Iraq.

Hadi al-Ameri, the leader of the security committee in Parliament and a close associate of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim — a prominent Shiite leader who met with Mr. Bush last month in Washington, and who has quietly supported the American push to reshape the political landscape in Baghdad — was unequivocal in his opposition to a troop increase.

"You can't solve the problem by adding more troops," said Redha Jawad Tahi, another Shiite member of Parliament from Mr. Hakim's party. "The security should be in the hands of the Iraqis. The U.S. should be in a supporting role."

Still, the Iraqis seem to be getting some of the increased authority they have been demanding. The plan Mr. Bush sketched out involved the appointment of an Iraqi commander with overall control of the new security crackdown in Baghdad, and Iraqi officers working under him who would be in charge of military operations in nine newly demarcated districts in the capital. The commanders would sit in a new office of commander in chief directly under the authority of Mr. Maliki. The arrangement could allow Mr. Maliki to circumvent the Ministry of Defense, which is controlled directly by the American military.

The arrangements appeared to suggest that Mr. Maliki could halt any push into Sadr City, the Mahdi Army stronghold that American commanders have been saying for months will have to be swept of extremist militia elements if there is to be any lasting turn toward stability in Baghdad. But Mr. Bush's new plan appeared to have safeguards of its own to prevent sectarian agendas from gaining the upper hand. Bush administration officials said that Americans would be present in the commander in chief's office and that an American Army battalion — 400 to 600 soldiers — would be stationed in each of the nine Baghdad military districts. That means Mr. Maliki will not have complete freedom of movement. In the past, American commanders have been reluctant to hand over operational control to the Iraqis, worried that Iraqi forces will be used as a weapon in a civil war.

Still, Mr. Abadi said that the Iraqis are expecting that the Americans will base themselves on the outskirts of Baghdad and that the Iraqis will take command of the city itself.

"There is a dialogue going on between the prime minister and Bush," he said. "The U.S. agrees that the government must take command."

Shiite suspicions of the American troop increase reflect a tectonic shift in the political realities here. Shiites, the principal victims of Saddam Hussein's repression, had joined with Iraqi Kurds in hailing the American-led invasion in 2003, seeing it as opening their way to power. But once they consolidated their control through two elections in 2005, they began distancing themselves from the Americans, seeing their liberators increasingly as an impediment to the full control they craved.

By contrast, moderate Sunnis, who were deeply alienated by the American occupation at an earlier stage of the war, are now looking to Americans for protection, as Shiite militias have moved into Sunni neighborhoods in a deadly cycle of revenge. On Wednesday, moderate Sunni politicians hailed the idea of more American troops.

The Shiite leaders' frustrations have grown in recent months as American commanders have retained their tight grip in Baghdad. While the Americans have argued for a strategy that places equal emphasis on going after Shiite and Sunni extremists, the Shiite leaders have insisted that the killing is rooted in the Sunni attempt to regain power and that Shiite militias and revenge killings are an inevitable response.

American officials have warned that with lessening American oversight, Shiite leaders might shift to a sectarian strategy that punished Sunni insurgents but spared Shiite militias. The execution 11 days ago of Saddam Hussein, carried out in haste by the Maliki government over American urgings that it be delayed until the legal paperwork was completed, only reinforced such fears. With as many as 17,000 additional American troops in Baghdad, the American force level in the capital will rise above 30,000, and many of those, under the Bush plan, will be in American units that are twinned with Iraqi units, or in expanded teams of military advisers that are embedded with the Iraqis, down to the company level.

American generals have acknowledged that the twinning of American and Iraqi units, and the rapid increase in the number of American advisers, will serve the dual purpose of stiffening Iraqi combat performance and providing American commanders with early warning of any Iraqi operations that run counter to American objectives. In effect, the advisers will serve as canaries in Mr. Maliki's mine, ensuring the American command will get early notice if Iraqi operations threaten to abandon the equal pursuit of Sunni and Shiite extremists in favor of a more sectarian emphasis. Some Iraqi politicians have expressed bitter opposition to the expansion of the advisory teams, saying they will amount to "spies" at the heart of Iraq's war.

But if that appeared to set the stage for future tensions between the Americans and the Iraqis, there was much else in the Bush plan that appeared to have been fashioned to avoid an early confrontation with the Maliki government. While the plan set out political benchmarks, it appeared to lack any timelines to force compliance on Mr. Maliki, who has shown in the past months that his willingness to pledge action on issues urged on him by the Americans is more than matched by his resourcefulness in finding ways to defer steps that might incur resistance among Shiite religious groups.

The wish list set out by White House officials was the same as the one the Americans laid down in May, when Mr. Maliki took office: an oil law that promises a fair distribution of future oil revenues between the Shiite and Kurdish populations that sit atop most of Iraq's oil wealth, and the Sunnis whose heartland is mostly bereft of proven oil reserves; constitutional revisions that will assuage Sunni complaints that their interests were swept aside when Shiite and Kurdish voters approved the charter 15 months ago over Sunni objections; a new de-Baathification law that will sweep aside the barrier that thousands of Sunnis have found in seeking government jobs; and, most important, a militia law that will lay the groundwork for disarming and demobilizing armed groups like Mr. Sadr's that challenge the government's monopoly on armed force.

Hard-line Shiite politicians have been saying with growing vehemence that these American goals amount to an attempt to deprive them of the victory they won at the polls, and that instead of placating Sunnis, a minority of about 20 percent in Iraq's population of 27 million, the United States should stand aside and "allow the minority to lose." For Americans, whose best road home lies in drawing the Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds together, it amounts to a collision with the hard history of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0115407

Only time will tell whether Mr. Maliki and his associates, with the trends in the war running against them, will take the "breathing space" that White House officials said the American troop reinforcements will give them to decide, at last, that history is theirs to command.

Bush Troubled by Video of Hanging

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — President Bush told a private gathering of television news anchors and hosts on Wednesday that he was deeply troubled by the handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein.

"I asked the president if he had seen the execution video of Saddam Hussein," Brian Williams, the NBC News anchor, said on the "Nightly News." "He indicated that he had and said in his view the way it was handled ranked just below the Abu Ghraib prison scandal in terms of mistakes made thus far in the war."

A grainy unauthorized recording of the execution showed some of the guards in the room taunting Mr. Hussein moments before his hanging.

In Iraq on Wednesday, The Associated Press reported that Mr. Maliki has named Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, an Iraqi general who was taken prisoner of war by American forces during the 1991 Persian Gulf war, as the overall commander of his troops.

General Gambar, a Shiite, will have two assistants, one from the police and one from the army, Iraqi military officers said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information. General Gambar will report directly to Mr. Maliki, The AP reported.

At least 91 people were killed or found dead in Iraq on Wednesday, [a news agency] reported.

A day after Iraqis and Americans battled insurgents in downtown Baghdad, the area was quiet and empty on Wednesday. The American military said it had detained 21 Iraqis in two raids there.

Bid To Secure Baghdad Relies On Troops And Iraqi Leaders (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — With his new plan to secure Iraq, President Bush is in effect betting that Iraqi leaders are committed to building a multisectarian state, and his strategy will stand or fall on that assumption.

The plan differs in several respects from the faltering effort to bring stability to Baghdad that began last summer. It calls for a much larger American force. There are to be no safe havens for renegade militias. And, importantly, Iraqi security forces throughout the city are to be put under the direct control of a new Iraqi commander — and backed by American Army battalions.

But the new plan depends on the good intentions and competence of a Shiite-dominated Iraqi government that has not demonstrated an abundant supply of either.

"Everybody raises a question about the intentions and capabilities of this government," a senior American official said, referring to the Iraqi government. "Is this a government that really is a unity government or is it in fact pursuing, either explicitly or implicitly, a Shia hegemony agenda?"

It was just in August that the Bush administration hailed the advent of "Operation Together Forward II," a plan that was intended to provide security to Baghdad's violence-ridden neighborhoods but did not stop the rise in sectarian violence.

Based on the assumption that the establishment of security in Baghdad was a bedrock condition for the broader push to stabilize the country, that plan called for American and Iraqi forces to clear contested neighborhoods in the capital, which would then be held with Iraqi police. That was to be followed to an energetic effort to fix sewage lines and generally rebuild neighborhoods, an effort intended to win public support and help remedy Iraq's chronically high unemployment.

That plan was backed by only modest resources from the start.

With an increase of only 7,000 American troops, the number of Americans participating in the operation was only about 15,000. The Iraqis sent only two of the six battalions that they had promised as reinforcements, bringing the number of Iraqi soldiers involved to 9,600. Some 30,000 Iraqi policemen were to help secure Iraqi neighborhoods, but many police units were infiltrated by the Shiite militias they were supposed to control or ineffectual. Much of the reconstruction that was to have been carried out by the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government was never undertaken or was directed away from Sunni areas.

The failure of the old plan led to a new strategy. Instead of emphasizing the turning over of security responsibilities to the Iraqi forces as quickly as possible so American troops could begin to withdraw, a new priority was to be put on protecting the Iraqi population.

The new strategy required more American forces, and the generals offered different recommendations as to how large the American troop reinforcement should be.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the leader of the United States Central Command, who have long argued that sending too many troops would put off the day when the Iraqis would take responsibility for their own security, initially recommended a more modest approach. According to a senior administration official, they recommended that two additional American combat brigades be sent to Baghdad. A third would be held in reserve in Kuwait and two more would be on call in the United States.

But Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, whom Mr. Bush has selected to replace General Casey, wanted to ensure that he had enough troops to carry out what by all accounts will be an extremely challenging mission. He sought a commitment that all five combat brigades would be sent.

Mr. Bush opted for the larger commitment. Five brigades are to be sent to improve security in the greater Baghdad area — an increase of about 17,500 troops that will more than double the American force involved in security operations there.

Beyond the capital, about 4,000 additional marines have been earmarked for Anbar, the volatile province in western Iraq that is the base for many Sunni insurgents. American and Sunni Arab forces are essentially locked in a stalemate there, and some officers have long complained that the effort in the west is under strength. This relatively modest reinforcement is intended to buttress the Americans' ability to interrupt insurgent supply lines from Syria and to make it harder for the insurgents to concentrate their efforts on Baghdad.

Critics of the troop-increase plan have complained that 17,500 more soldiers are too few to control a capital of six million people. Supporters say that by concentrating these soldiers in crucial neighborhoods, along with the 15,000 American troops already involved in the operation, the reinforcement can be effective.

An unknown variable is the performance of the Iraqis. The Iraqis are to reinforce Baghdad with three more Iraqi Army brigades, bringing the total number of Iraqi brigades in the city to nine — or 20,000 troops if the units are at full strength.

The Iraqi brigades, along with Iraqi National Police units and regular Iraqi police units, will be deployed in nine sectors of Baghdad, each under an Iraqi commander. In an innovation, an American battalion will be assigned to each sector, a way to stiffen the Iraqi forces and monitor them should some harbor sectarian agendas.

In carrying out the old operation, Americans conducted patrols from large American bases in and around the city. This time, according to Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking American command in Iraq, some American troops will remain in contested areas "24/7" to deter death squads and insurgents from infiltrating the sectors once the neighborhoods have been cleared.

In explaining the genesis of the new strategy, administration officials described its formation as essentially the product of a process of elimination. Other options were discarded until the White House was left with what it considered to be the least bad choice in a difficult situation.

Strikingly, Mr. Bush in his speech did not exclude the risk of failure. After listing all the reasons why the new plan has a better chance of succeeding than the old one, Mr. Bush stressed that he had informed Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki that the United States commitment to the new operation was not open-ended.

"If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lost the support of the American people," Mr. Bush said. "Now is the time to act."

Bush's Iraq Plan Faces Obstacles On Two Fronts (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Greg Jaffe And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The success of President Bush's controversial strategy for stabilizing Iraq depends on the cooperation of an Iraqi government paralyzed by sectarian tensions and a Democratic Congress that appears increasingly eager to challenge the administration's handling of the war.

In a prime-time speech to a nation wearied by the violence in Iraq, Mr. Bush acknowledged a litany of American failures and announced plans to send at least 20,000 new U.S. military personnel to Baghdad and the restive Anbar province. White House officials said the first brigade of additional forces would arrive in Iraq later this month, with the remainder of the forces streaming into the country over the next four or five months.

The additional troops are the centerpiece of a broad administration push to retool the military, economic, and political aspects of its Iraq strategy -- and to find a way of staunching the continued decline in American support for the war. In addition to the extra troops, administration officials said they would ask Congress for more than $1 billion in new funding for programs designed to boost reconstruction, economic growth and job creation in Iraq, including $350 million to expand a program that gives military commanders money they can use on small-scale development projects in the areas they patrol.

Speaking from the White House library, Mr. Bush used unusually pessimistic language to describe the situation in Iraq and conceded mistakes in prior strategies in the war, saying: "The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me," Mr. Bush said.

The president said that earlier efforts to secure Baghdad had failed because there weren't enough U.S. military personnel to hold neighborhoods after they had been cleared of insurgents, and because the Iraqi government prevented American personnel from conducting operations in the Shiite districts that house the militias responsible for most of the current violence. The new surge strategy, by contrast, would ensure that "we will have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," and enter Shiite areas of the city, Mr. Bush said.

Still, the administration's ability to control events on the ground in Iraq is rapidly diminishing, and it's far from clear that the strategy will find enough support in either Baghdad or Washington to have much chance of success.

Mr. Maliki has long opposed the deployment of additional U.S. forces to Iraq, and his government crippled earlier U.S. efforts to stabilize Baghdad by failing to deliver the Iraqi security forces it had promised and by refusing to allow a crackdown on the Shiite militias responsible for much of Iraq's current violence.

The surge plan also comes amid increasingly hostile sentiment toward the White House's Iraq strategy on Capitol Hill among both Democrats and Republicans -- and amid signs that the newly Democratic Congress is testing how far it can go in influencing the White House's handling of the war going forward.

Democrats now hope to capitalize on the mounting displeasure among lawmakers of both parties by putting forward nonbinding resolutions in the House and Senate opposing the troop increase, starting as soon as Thursday. Their strategy involves persuading more Republicans to go on record opposing the White House plan, as a way of gauging the depths of opposition to the war plan. Even before Mr. Bush spoke Wednesday night, conservative Republican Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, eyeing a 2008 presidential bid, said he was opposed to sending more troops to Iraq, while Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska derided the move as "a dangerously wrong-headed strategy that will drive America deeper into an unwinnable swamp."

Beyond rhetorical opposition to Mr. Bush's strategy, Democrats may test in coming weeks whether to use Congress's power of the purse to impede the troop increase.

White House officials previewing Mr. Bush's speech acknowledged that its success depended on a new level of cooperation of Mr. Maliki and his government, and said that the administration had received firm Iraqi commitments to deploy significant numbers of Iraqi security personnel to the new push to secure Baghdad and -- more crucially -- to allow American and Iraqi forces to confront forces loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

One of the most noteworthy aspects of the new strategy deals with Iraqi, rather than American, troops. A senior White House official said Mr. Maliki had pledged to send three additional Iraqi army brigades to Baghdad in a broad restructuring of security operations in the city. Individual Iraqi officers -- instead of U.S. generals -- will be given responsibility for each of Baghdad's nine districts, and will answer to a single Iraqi commander who will have command authority over the capital.

A senior Bush administration official described the new push to bring order to Baghdad as Iraqi-planned and Iraqi-led, with American troops in support roles. To assist the Iraqis, the U.S. will increase the number of embedded U.S. advisors that live and fight with Iraqi soldiers.

Mr. Maliki has made similar promises in the past, however, only to renege on those deals when the fighting started and pressure from Shiite militia leaders grew to curb the offensives. Mr. Maliki owes his position as prime minister to Mr. Sadr, who remains his strongest political patron.

Senior U.S. military officials, who remain skeptical about the Iraqi Army's abilities and Mr. Maliki's will to take tough stands, downplayed the Bush administration's suggestions that Iraqi forces would be in the lead initially. Instead, they suggested U.S. troops would take the more prominent role until the situation was stable enough for Iraqi troops to move to the front. "We first have to set the conditions for an Iraqi-led defense of Baghdad to work," said one senior military official involved in planning the operation.

The first two attempts to stabilize Baghdad this summer and fall were plagued by the uneven performance of Iraqi forces, sectarian agendas and a shortage of both U.S. and Iraqi troops, military officials said. The Bush administration hopes the troop influx will remedy those shortfalls. But the surge of about 20,000 more soldiers -- all the overstretched U.S. military can provide – is far less than what most proponents of a "surge" have called for. Hawks like Sen. John McCain and Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative think tank, have called for a minimum of 30,000-35,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad.

White House officials said another big element of the new plan is a greater U.S. demand for accountability on the part of the Iraqis. They said that Mr. Bush had made clear to the Iraqi leader that the U.S. commitment to Iraq wasn't open-ended.

But the officials acknowledged that Mr. Bush hadn't threatened specific consequences -- such as a reduction in U.S. military and economic assistance, or a withdrawal of U.S. forces -- if Mr. Maliki again failed to meet his commitments to provide additional Iraqi forces or to permit a crackdown on Shiite fighters.

"When you're trying to empower a government, you don't talk to them in those terms -- 'You must do this, or else,' " a senior administration official said.

DOJ_NMG_0115410

On Capitol Hill, doubts about Mr. Maliki's capabilities and intentions are fueling growing opposition to the administration's new Iraq strategy -- and triggering talk of legislative maneuvers, like trying to restrict Mr. Bush's ability to send more troops to Iraq, which would have been unthinkable even a few weeks ago.

The Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, Rep. Pelosi and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, both back the idea of a nonbinding resolution opposing a troop increase. Others want to go farther. Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts introduced a bill earlier this week that would prohibit any additional troops from being sent to Iraq unless explicitly approved by Congress. Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), a military veteran who chairs the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, recently introduced a similar measure outlining options that would restrict any troop escalation if it meant reducing readiness at home or extending the tours of troops now in the war zone.

One possible financial pressure point could come as soon as next month, when a stopgap spending bill that has been funding most of the government since October due to expire in mid-February. That is a powerful political tool for Democratic critics of Mr. Bush's policy. Failure to extend the stopgap funding could shut down many agencies -- making any amendment risky. But by the same token, if an Iraq amendment or funding limitation were attached by Congress, the president couldn't simply brush it aside.

Many Democrats are loath to take steps that would portray the party as undermining the troops in Iraq. But measures could gain more support in coming weeks -- especially if proponents succeed in making the point that by opposing additional troops, they are not undermining those already in Iraq.

Balancing concerns about seeming to oppose the military, Democrats run some risk within their own ranks if they are seen as being too pliant toward Mr. Bush in the weeks ahead -- especially after having won control of Congress partly because of the public's antiwar sentiment. A significant chunk of vocal Democratic voters think the U.S. should begin an immediate withdrawal from Iraq, but Democratic leaders have begun to shy away from that plank. Some of the louder liberal groups, such as MoveOn.org, plan to hold a series of rallies in coming days to protest the president's plan and to demand that Congress oppose it.

Indeed, Democratic opposition to the administration's handling of Iraq war is growing markedly across the party, with some of the most conservative Democratic leaders joining some of the most liberal ones in not only opposing the troop increase but also calling for the beginnings of a military withdrawal from Iraq.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who has staked out an array of liberal positions as he campaigns of the 2008 presidential nomination, has strongly condemned the surge proposal in recent days and instead argued for sharp troop reductions.

Wednesday, he was joined by one of the more conservative members of the new Democratic congressional majority, former Navy Adm. Joe Sestak, who said that the "bottom line is that the way forward is not to add more troops, but to set a deliberate timetable for re-deployment from Iraq -- at least by the end of this year -- to serve as a catalyst for the Iraqis to accept responsibility for their country."

Bush's New Plan For Iraq Echoes Key Parts Of Earlier Memo (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's new Iraq policy was said to be the product of weeks of meetings, discussions and analysis by the president and his national security advisers. Yet core elements of the plan were contained in a classified memo that national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley sent to members of Bush's Cabinet on Nov. 8 -- a month before the bipartisan Iraq Study Group issued its report.

Most news accounts about the Hadley memo, which was published by the New York Times in late November, focused on his critique of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. But the 1,800-word document was composed mostly of recommendations for Bush on how to bolster Maliki and improve the security environment.

One key recommendation: filling "the current four-brigade gap in Baghdad with coalition forces if reliable Iraqi forces are not identified." A brigade contains 3,000 to 5,000 troops, so the Hadley memo contemplated roughly 16,000 additional troops.

The president announced yesterday that he would send five additional brigades to Baghdad. An aide said that would total 17,500 troops.

In rebutting criticism that the administration ignored most of the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, a senior administration official pointed yesterday to the fact that the White House accepted its suggestion to embed additional U.S. forces with Iraqi troops. Now, they will go all the way down to the company level.

DOJ_NMG_0115411

But the Hadley memo explicitly urged such a step. "If we expect him to adopt a nonsectarian security agenda," he wrote of Maliki, "we must ensure he has reasonably nonsectarian security institutions to execute it -- such as through a more robust embedding program."

Hadley also called for an "intensive press on Saudi Arabia to play a leadership role on Iraq, connecting this role with other areas in which Saudi Arabia wants to see U.S. action."

As part of the new plan, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East tomorrow, stopping in Riyadh, to enlist greater Arab support for the Iraqi government -- and to try to jump-start Israeli-Palestinian talks, a key concern of Saudi leaders.

Much of the memo focused on how to help Maliki "form a new political base among moderate politicians," allowing him to free his government from the sway of radical Shiite elements. The United States "would likely need to use our own political capital to press moderates to align themselves with Maliki's new political bloc," Hadley wrote.

Under the new plan, the Iraqi government is supposed to allow a "moderate coalition" to emerge as its new political center.

Hadley also described steps that Maliki could make to "demonstrate that his government serves all ethnic communities," such as "shake up his cabinet by appointing nonsectarian, capable technocrats."

This happens to be another key goal of the new plan. The White House said yesterday that the Iraqi government made a commitment to "reform its cabinet to provide even-handed service delivery."

A White House official, speaking on the condition of anonymity, acknowledged that "many of the ideas in the Hadley memo are in the strategy."

But he said that "when we say the strategy is new, we mean we -- us and the Iraqis -- weren't doing it before, say, November 7. We don't mean no one thought of it before that date."

Bush, Allies At Odds On Iraq (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Norm Coleman, the Minnesota Republican, would rather not be in the position of publicly disagreeing with President Bush.

But when it comes to Iraq, Republican lawmakers on Capitol Hill are breaking away, leaving Bush to lay out his new plan without the usually reliable array of GOP support.

"I don't want to embarrass the president, but my position is clear," said Coleman, who visited Iraq last month. "I do not believe that a surge in troops is going to solve the fundamental problem we have."

Coleman and other Republicans are becoming increasingly public with their view that the ongoing violence in Baghdad requires a political solution, not a military one. "Iraqis have to decide they're going to stop killing themselves," he said.

That Democrats are aggressively opposing Bush's plan to boost the number of troops in Iraq is hardly surprising. The midterm elections that brought them to power this year turned, in large part, on voters' dissatisfaction with the war.

Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate say they are talking to their Republican colleagues, hoping to persuade many of them to support a non-binding resolution that would express disapproval about escalating the war.

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said Wednesday that while those conversations are taking place, Republicans are arriving at their opinions independent of Democratic persuasion.

"I think you're seeing the Republicans respond to what is the overwhelming sentiment of the country, and to what is the reality of the military's observation that the proposals will not work," Hoyer said.

Sen. Dick Durbin, the assistant Senate majority leader from Illinois, said in an interview there is no question that Democrats could pass some sort of resolution expressing disapproval of the war in Iraq and with Bush's handling of that war.

"But many of us believe the most effective message from Capitol Hill is a bipartisan message," said Durbin, who later gave the official Democratic response to Bush's speech. "If the president believes support from his own party at risk, he may have second thoughts." Many Republicans say they have formed their opinions from traveling to Iraq and the surrounding region and talking to military officials there.

"Based on the trip I took to Iraq last month, I concluded it would be a mistake to increase the overall level of troops in Iraq," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine).

Collins said she shared her opinion with Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert Gates that a political solution is required to address the civil unrest, not a boost in troops.

So did Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who delivered a lengthy speech on the Senate floor in December, outlining his increasing frustration with the war. He has told the president that he opposed a so-called "surge" in troops.

DOJ_NMG_0115412

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) was similarly unimpressed with the idea of putting more troops at risk, describing her view as "deep skepticism."

Also not persuaded is Sen. George Voinovich (R-Ohio), a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

"At this point I am skeptical that a surge in troops alone will bring an end to sectarian violence and the insurgency that is fomenting instability in Iraq," Voinovich said. "The generals who have served there do not believe additional troops alone will help. And my faith in Prime Minister [Nouri] al-Maliki's political will to make the hard choices necessary to bring about a political solution is fragile at best."

Like many of his colleagues, Voinovich said he wants to see a political solution between Sunni Arabs and Shiite militias.

"And I want real evidence that a potential surge in troops will do more good than harm and will not exacerbate the existing violence in Iraq," he added.

Lawmakers who are typically supportive of the president's policies gave themselves some distance in the hours before Bush's address Wednesday .

"I'm open to the president's plan, but I need to learn a whole lot more of the details," said Sen. David Vitter (R-La.).

His constituents have grown weary of the war, he explained. "I don't know anyone who's not," he said. "It doesn't mean we shouldn't or can't go forward, but it makes it a lot more difficult."

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, has expressed his own reservations, but urged his colleagues to spend some time mulling Bush's proposal in the coming days.

"What he says merits thoughtful consideration by the Senate," Warner said.

Still, Warner is unhappy with the strife dominating Iraq, something he has witnessed firsthand.

"Young men and women in uniform should not be caught in the crossfire of a civil war started with who should have succeeded Muhammad in 650 A.D.," he said.

Bush Accepts Responsibility For 'mistakes' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Wednesday that he will raise U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500 to try to break "the current cycle of violence" there, and he conceded for the first time that he has not sent enough military forces.

Although Bush warned of more bloodshed, he said benefits will be seen over time. "If we increase our support at this crucial moment … we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home."

ON DEADLINE: Share your thoughts on Bush speech

Bush's plan includes $5.6 billion for the troop increase and more than $1 billion in new economic aid for Iraq. It also calls for better performance by the Iraqi government to control its own security.

The president said previous plans failed because there were not enough U.S. and Iraqi troops to protect Iraqi neighborhoods and to contain violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people, and it is unacceptable to me," Bush said. "Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me."

Democrats and some Republicans criticized the plan even before Bush addressed the nation from the White House library.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., new chairman of the House panel overseeing Pentagon spending, said Bush will have to make a strong case to justify more money for troops. "We really have an ability to stop this thing," said Murtha, a Vietnam veteran. "Not today, but later on."

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said committing more troops is the wrong answer. "Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution," he said.

Bush stressed that the goal of his revised plan will be to train Iraqi forces so they can control their country's security by November. He said his troop commitment "is not open-ended."

Bush described the consequences of failure for Iraq and the United States: radical Islamic extremists growing in strength in the Middle East, and terror rising throughout the world.

The president said he had sent another carrier strike group to the Middle East, and he warned Iran and Syria against aiding Iraqi insurgents. He said the United States will "interrupt the flow of support" from Iraq's neighbors.

In Iraq, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has told Shiite militiamen, including supporters of cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, to surrender their arms or face an assault by U.S. and Iraqi forces, the Associated Press reported. The AP quoted an unnamed Shiite legislator who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for al-Maliki.

Bush said he told al-Maliki and his aides that they risk losing the support of Americans and Iraqis if they do not improve security. "A democratic Iraq will not be perfect, but it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them," the president said.

There are now 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. The retooled plan calls for 17,500 troops to be committed over the next several months to Baghdad, site of most of the sectarian violence. That would more than double the 15,000 troops now there. An additional 4,000 Marines are headed to Anbar province in western Iraq, which the administration says is a base for al-Qaeda terrorists.

Bush said the new money for reconstruction and jobs programs would help Iraqis see "that military operations are accompanied by visible improvements in their neighborhoods."

Bush Vows Surge To Fix 'Mistake' (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

President Bush last night conceded that he made a mistake by failing to increase troops in Iraq last year and committed to boosting more than 21,000 troops, setting up a battle with the congressional Democrats, who vowed to fight the new war strategy.

In rejecting the Iraq Study Group's call to withdraw most combat troops within 15 months, the president will push the U.S. military presence in Iraq to its highest level in more than a year.

His plan, revealed last night in a prime-time address to the nation, came with no timetable, and senior administration officials said yesterday that the so-called "surge" in troops has no set end.

But the president said the U.S. commitment to help Iraqis secure the war-torn nation is finite. In the 20-minute speech, the president demanded swift action by the fledgling government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who has refused to crack down on the Shi'ite militias responsible for the recent spike in sectarian violence.

"I have made it clear to the prime minister and Iraq's other leaders that America's commitment is not open-ended. If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people -- and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people. Now is the time to act. The prime minister understands this," he said.

The new strategy will increase U.S. troops in Iraq to about 153,500 at an extra cost of $5.6 billion through the rest of this fiscal year.

The first of five brigades will arrive by Monday; the next, a month later, with the rest coming in monthly increments. The bulk of the "new" troops will be soldiers and Marines already scheduled to go to Iraq, but whose deployments will be extended.

Although he has previously acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, Mr. Bush yesterday said he was wrong both in his decision-making and in his assumptions.

"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," he said. "The situation in Iraq is unacceptable to the American people -- and it is unacceptable to me."

But by pushing for an escalation, Mr. Bush runs smack into Democrats, the new majority party in Congress, who say they reflect American voters' desire to begin bringing troops back home.

"This is the third time we are going down this path. Two times this has not worked," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California. "Why are they doing this now? That question remains."

The president called top Democrats and Republicans to the White House hours before yesterday's speech to brief them. The late hour drew scorn from Democrats, who said that didn't fit with Mr. Bush's postelection promise to consult them more.

"The president's practicing his speech right now," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat. "We had a conversation today that has no impact on what he's going to say."

Congress' four top Democrats -- Mrs. Pelosi, Mr. Reid, Senate Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois and House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland -- issued a joint statement after the speech, saying that the proposal "endangers our national security by placing additional burdens on our already overextended military" and discourages the Iraqi government from taking "the necessary steps to achieve a political resolution to the sectarian problems."

Some Republican lawmakers said they also are skeptical that a surge in troops can achieve much.

"The generals who have served there do not believe additional troops alone will help," said Sen George V. Voinovich, Ohio Republican, who said he also lacks faith in Mr. al-Maliki "to make the hard choices necessary to bring about a political solution."

But Mr. Bush said that fighting in Iraq makes the United States safer and that his plan will bring the troops home faster.

"If we increase our support at this crucial moment and help the Iraqis break the current cycle of violence, we can hasten the day our troops begin coming home," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115414

The president promised lawmakers that if they "have improvements that can be made, we will make them," and took the suggestion of Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, to form a new bipartisan working group to improve relations between the administration and Congress on the war on terror.

But he also challenged critics to prove how their alternatives would "be more likely to succeed."

The new strategy sets up a fierce conflict on Capitol Hill, one that could create a constitutional issue over presidential war powers.

Some Democrats, led by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, want to rescind the resolution authorizing the president to use force in Iraq. But Democratic leaders prefer a less bruising strategy, calling for a nonbinding resolution that would signal Congress' opposition to the surge in troops.

The president said that despite two previous shifts in strategy that failed, his new plan takes into account the source of the violence, and sets "benchmarks" for Iraqis to meet.

Iraqis will take the lead in battling sectarian violence as Americans step back into a support role, and the young government will deploy three additional Iraqi army brigades -- up to 12,000 soldiers -- in and around Baghdad, where the administration says 80 percent of the violence occurs.

"Only the Iraqis can end the sectarian violence and secure their people. And their government has put forward an aggressive plan to do it," he said.

After nearly four years of war, the president redefined what victory in Iraq will look like.

"Victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved. There will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship," he said, alluding to the end of World War II. "A democratic Iraq will not be perfect. But it will be a country that fights terrorists instead of harboring them -- and it will help bring a future of peace and security for our children and grandchildren."

But he also was grim about the coming year in Iraq, which he predicted would be "bloody and violent" and bring "more Iraqi and American casualties."

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and a proponent of increasing U.S. forces, agreed with that forecast: "Is it going to be a strain on the military? Absolutely. Casualties are going to go up."

The president's speech also was uncharacteristically equivocal when he sought to assure Americans that his plan will work.

"The question is whether our new strategy will bring us closer to success. I believe that it will," he said.

In documents supporting the speech, the White House said Mr. Bush had assumed that other governments would back Iraq's new leaders. But Iraq's neighbors "remain wary of throwing their full support" behind Mr. al-Maliki's government. And the White House acknowledged that the U.S.-led coalition has lost the confidence of the Iraqi people, who are "increasingly disillusioned."

Mr. Bush's plans call for more than 17,000 U.S. soldiers to be deployed to Baghdad to handle sectarian violence. Also, 4,000 Marines will be sent to the Anbar province, where al Qaeda is the problem. In addition, the president said he has "recently ordered the deployment of an additional carrier strike group to the region."

He said he was accepting the Iraq Study Group's recommendation to embed U.S. troops with Iraqi units to help with on-the-job training.

But he didn't accept the panel's suggestion that the U.S. begin direct talks with Iran and Syria and pledged instead to "interrupt the flow of support from Iran and Syria," which he said is aiding attacks on U.S. troops.

He also acknowledged the failures of several previous efforts to secure Baghdad but explained why he thought this effort would be different.

"Our past efforts to secure Baghdad failed for two principal reasons: There were not enough Iraqi and American troops to secure neighborhoods that had been cleared of terrorists and insurgents," the president said. "And there were too many restrictions on the troops we did have."

He said American commanders have reviewed the Iraqi plan "to ensure that it addressed these mistakes."

"This time, we will have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared," he said, adding that Mr. al-Maliki has promised to give his commanders enough authority, including going after sectarian militias.

Right now, Iraq's military is in control in three of the nation's provinces, but Mr. Bush said the government has committed to taking control in all 18 provinces by November.

The president said the new plan relies on a strategy the Iraqis drew up themselves and presented to the president when he met Mr. al-Maliki in Jordan after Thanksgiving.

The speech drew about 50 protesters, who chanted outside the White House: "Stop the war" and held up signs dismissing the speech as "words of mass deception."

The Real Disaster (NYT)

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

President Bush told Americans last night that failure in Iraq would be a disaster. The disaster is Mr. Bush's war, and he has already failed. Last night was his chance to stop offering more fog and be honest with the nation, and he did not take it.

Americans needed to hear a clear plan to extricate United States troops from the disaster that Mr. Bush created. What they got was more gauzy talk of victory in the war on terrorism and of creating a "young democracy" in Iraq. In other words, a way for this president to run out the clock and leave his mess for the next one.

Mr. Bush did acknowledge that some of his previous tactics had failed. But even then, the president sounded as if he were an accidental tourist in Iraq. He described the failure of last year's effort to pacify Baghdad as if the White House and the Pentagon bore no responsibility.

In any case, Mr. Bush's excuses were tragically inadequate. The nation needs an eyes-wide-open recognition that the only goal left is to get the U.S. military out of this civil war in a way that could minimize the slaughter of Iraqis and reduce the chances that the chaos Mr. Bush unleashed will engulf Iraq's neighbors.

What it certainly did not need were more of Mr. Bush's open-ended threats to Iran and Syria.

Before Mr. Bush spoke, Americans knew he planned to send more troops to pacify lawless Baghdad. Mr. Bush's task was to justify that escalation by acknowledging that there was no military solution to this war and outlining the political mission that the military would be serving. We were waiting for him to detail the specific milestones that he would set for the Iraqis, set clear timelines for when they would be expected to meet them, and explain what he intended to do if they again failed.

Instead, he said he had warned the Iraqis that if they didn't come through, they would lose the faith of the American people. Has Mr. Bush really not noticed that the American people long ago lost faith in the Iraqi government — and in him as well? Americans know that this Iraqi government is captive to Shiite militias, with no interest in the unity, reconciliation and democracy that Mr. Bush says he wants.

Mr. Bush said yet again that he wanted the Iraqi government to step up to the task of providing its security, and that Iraq needed a law on the fair distribution of oil money. Iraq's government needs to do a lot more than that, starting with disarming the sectarian militias that are feeding the civil war and purging the police forces that too often are really death squads. It needs to offer amnesty to insurgents and militia fighters willing to put down their weapons. It needs to do those things immediately.

Iraq's Shiite-dominated government has heard this list before. But so long as Mr. Bush is willing to back that failed government indefinitely — enabling is the psychological term — Iraq's leaders will have no reason to move against the militias and more fairly share power with the Sunni minority.

Mr. Bush did announce his plan for 20,000 more troops, and the White House trumpeted a $1 billion contribution to reconstruction efforts. Congress will debate these as if they are the real issues. But they are not. Talk of a "surge" ignores the other 132,000 American troops trapped by a failed strategy.

We have argued that the United States has a moral obligation to stay in Iraq as long as there is a chance to mitigate the damage that a quick withdrawal might cause. We have called for an effort to secure Baghdad, but as part of the sort of comprehensive political solution utterly lacking in Mr. Bush's speech. This war has reached the point that merely prolonging it could make a bad ending even worse. Without a real plan to bring it to a close, there is no point in talking about jobs programs and military offensives. There is nothing ahead but even greater disaster in Iraq.

Mr. Bush's Strategy (WP)

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH is right to recognize that U.S strategy in Iraq is not working and to seek a different policy. He is right to insist that the United States cannot afford to abandon the mission and to reject calls for an early withdrawal. But the new plan for the war Mr. Bush outlined last night is very risky. It envisions new missions and dangers for U.S. troops and counts on unprecedented military and political steps by the Iraqi government. The plan is likely to cause a spike in U.S. casualties, while the chances that it will stabilize Iraq are far lower. Moreover, Mr. Bush appears prepared to embrace this approach despite strong opposition from Congress and the public -- setting up a conflict that in itself could hurt the war effort.

The president could have adopted a course that would have attracted broad support domestically and from Iraqis. That was the strategy -- outlined with small variations by U.S. military commanders, the Iraqi government and the Iraq Study Group -- that called for an acceleration of training of the Iraqi army and a gradual handing over of responsibility for fighting insurgents. The U.S. military presence would have decreased in the coming year, but enough troops would have remained to prevent the government's collapse, strike al-Qaeda and prevent intervention by Iraq's neighbors.

Instead, Mr. Bush has chosen to increase the number of Army troops and Marines and to broaden their mission. U.S. forces will be asked to pacify Baghdad in conjunction with Iraqi army and police units. Two attempts last year to stop sectarian war in the capital failed; the president says this effort will be different because more U.S. and Iraqi troops will be involved and because Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has promised to prevent "political and sectarian interference." If the plan proceeds, we hope U.S. forces succeed without heavy casualties. But even if they do, the victory will be temporary. U.S. forces cannot sustain the planned "surge" for long, and Baghdad will not be truly pacified until Iraqis can enforce the peace.

The administration hopes that in the window of security opened by U.S. troops, economic reconstruction will resume and political leaders will reach the accords necessary to end sectarian warfare. Much is expected of the Iraqis in the coming months: First, the government will have to deliver promised army units to the capital and send them into action, including against Shiite militias; then it will have to work out deals on sharing Iraq's oil revenue, rehabilitating former members of the Baath Party and reshaping the constitution. It will have to hold local elections and begin delivering services to all parts of the country.

Mr. Bush decided against the consensus strategy favored by the Iraq Study Group because he believed it would not prevent sectarian war from escalating. That may be right. But the president's policy poses a different danger: that Iraqi troops and Iraqi leaders won't deliver on the steps expected of them during what must be a relatively short time, even as American soldiers fight to secure Baghdad -- and, almost certainly, die in larger numbers than before. It also means launching a mission that -- until now, at least -- has not had the domestic support that should accompany the commitment of troops to battle.

If the United States is not to abandon Iraq to its enemies, the U.S. mission needs to be sustainable, in both military and political terms, over the years it may take Iraqis to stabilize their country. Mr. Bush is betting that a boost in U.S. troops and aid can accelerate that process. If he is wrong, a continued American presence in Iraq may become untenable. The president must do more to persuade the country that the sacrifice he is asking of American soldiers is necessary. And if Iraqis do not deliver on their own commitments in the coming weeks, he must reconsider his strategy -- and suspend the U.S. reinforcements.

The Last Way Forward (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Bush's speech, like his strategy, was unsatisfying. But there are no good options left for the U.S. in Iraq.

PRESIDENT BUSH'S latest plan for Iraq has the feel of an overdue high school book report. It looks nice, reads well and is persuasive in parts. If only he had handed it in on time.

The "new way forward" outlined by the president in a prime-time address Wednesday makes too many obvious points (Iraqis must have more of a stake in their nation's success) and includes too many tired tropes (the war in Iraq is a central front in the war against terrorism). But the core of Bush's speech — the reason to maintain at least some flicker of hope — was an absolute-final-we're-really-serious-this-time ultimatum to the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Represent all Iraqis, Bush said, and do not prevent U.S. and Iraqi troops from cracking down on Shiite militias, or face U.S. disengagement. The test of this strategy will be whether Maliki, who owes his position to Shiite support, understands that the U.S. will not take sides in an Iraqi civil war — and whether Bush means it when he says his commitment is not open-ended.

The president said he will order an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq, to be deployed mostly in Baghdad, and their goal will be to help Iraqi forces make the city safe. This is hardly new. Just last summer, to much fanfare, Maliki announced something called Operation Together Forward to provide security to "all neighborhoods of Baghdad." That effort failed miserably because Iraqi forces too often abandoned their posts or contributed to the sectarian violence instead of preventing it. Just last month, Bush's own national security advisor questioned Maliki's commitment to the rule of law and his ability to enforce it.

To his credit, Bush acknowledged this. "Many listening tonight will ask why this effort will succeed when previous operations to secure Baghdad did not," he said. "Here are the differences. In earlier operations, Iraqi and American forces cleared many neighborhoods of terrorists and insurgents, but when our forces moved on to other targets, the killers returned. This time, we'll have the force levels we need to hold the areas that have been cleared. In earlier operations, political and sectarian interference prevented Iraqi and American forces from going into neighborhoods that are home to those fueling the sectarian violence. This time, Iraqi and American forces will have a green light to enter those neighborhoods — and Prime Minister Maliki has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated."

Bush said he told Maliki that "America's commitment is not open-ended." He continued: "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people — and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

It is unlikely that the additional troops will be enough to make a difference, or that Maliki will honor his latest pledge. But America, and Iraq, will know in a matter of months whether U.S. troops can operate freely and whether Maliki's government is worth defending.

DOJ_NMG_0115417

It would have been nice to have this answer months ago, and Bush deserves the blame for not demanding it sooner. At least he is finally making that demand. For his sake, and for the hundreds of thousands of U.S. troops and millions of Iraqis, we hope it's not too late.

The Fog Over Iraq (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

If the Democrats don't like the U.S. policy on Iraq over the next six months, they have themselves partly to blame. There were millions of disaffected Republicans and independents ready to coalesce around some alternative way forward, but the Democrats never came up with anything remotely serious.

The liberals who favor quick exit never grappled with the consequences of that policy, which the Baker-Hamilton commission terrifyingly described. The centrists who believe in gradual withdrawal never explained why that wouldn't be like pulling a tooth slowly. Joe Biden, who has the most intellectually serious framework for dealing with Iraq, was busy yesterday, at the crucial decision-making moment, conducting preliminary fact-finding hearings, complete with forays into Iraqi history.

The Democrats have been fecund with criticisms of the war, but when it comes to alternative proposals, a common approach is social Darwinism on stilts: We failed them, now they're on their own.

So we are stuck with the Bush proposal as the only serious plan on offer. The question is, what exactly did President Bush propose last night? The policy rollout has been befogged by so much spin and misdirection it's nearly impossible to figure out what the president is proposing.

Nonetheless, here's my reconstruction of how this policy evolved:

On Nov. 30, Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki presented Bush with a new security plan for Baghdad. It called for U.S. troops to move out of Baghdad to the periphery, where they would chase down Sunni terrorists. Iraqi Shiite and Kurdish troops, meanwhile, would flood into the city to establish order, at least as they define it.

Maliki essentially wanted the American troops protecting his flank but out of his hair. He didn't want U.S. soldiers embedded with his own. He didn't want American generals hovering over his shoulder. His government didn't want any restraints on Shiite might.

Over the next weeks, Bush rejected the plan and opted for the opposite approach. Instead of handing counterinsurgency over to the Iraqis/Shiites, he decided to throw roughly 20,000 U.S. troops — everything he had available — into Baghdad. He and his advisers negotiated new rules of engagement to make it easier to go after Shiites as well as Sunnis. He selected two aggressive counterinsurgency commanders, David Petraeus and Raymond Odierno, to lead the effort. Odierno recently told John Burns of The Times that American forces would remain in cleared areas of Baghdad "24/7," suggesting a heavy U.S. presence.

Then came the job of selling the plan. The administration could not go before the world and say that the president had decided to overrule the sovereign nation of Iraq. Officials could not tell wavering Republicans that the president was proposing a heavy, U.S.-led approach.

Thus, administration officials are saying that they have adopted the Maliki plan, just with a few minor tweaks. In briefings and in the president's speech, officials claimed that this was an Iraqi-designed plan, that Iraqi troops would take on all the primary roles in clearing and holding neighborhoods, that Iraqis in mixed neighborhoods would scarcely see any additional Americans.

All of this is designed to soothe the wounded pride of the Maliki government, and to make the U.S. offensive seem less arduous at home. It's the opposite of the truth.

Yesterday, administration officials were praising Maliki lavishly. He wants the same things we want, they claimed. He has resolved to lead a nonsectarian government. He is reworking his governing coalitions and marginalizing the extremists. "We've seen the nascent rise of a moderate political bloc," one senior administration official said yesterday.

But the selling of the plan illustrates that this is not the whole story. The Iraqi government wants a unified non-sectarian solution in high-minded statements and in some distant, ideal world. But in the short term, and in the deepest reptilian folds of their brains, the Shiites are maneuvering amid the sectarian bloodbath all around.

This is not a function of the character of Maliki or this or that official. It's a function of the core dynamic now afflicting Iraqi society.

The enemy in Iraq is not some discrete group of killers. It's the maelstrom of violence and hatred that infects every institution, including the government and the military. Instead of facing up to this core reality, the Bush administration has papered it over with salesmanship and spin.

War's Rorschach Test (NYT)

By Danielle Trussoni

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MY father once told me that he and his mother read the body count in the newspaper together. He didn't tell me the exact day or time, or precisely where they were when they read it, but I like to imagine that they sat at the long, wooden table in the kitchen of the farmhouse where the Trussoni children, all 12 of them, used to eat. It was only a month or so before my father left for the war, the winter of 1967, a time of year when Wisconsin is cold and harsh and so dismal that the red barn sitting just beyond the house would have appeared as a splotch of divine color in a field of gray.

I imagine my grandmother pressing the sheets of crisp, ink-smeared paper against the grain of the kitchen table. The numbers were there, for both of them to see.

The farmhouse was a narrow stone structure, tall and close fitting, nestled between high bluffs just east of the Mississippi River. Row after row of corn and tobacco undulated from the back of the house, rising and falling with the curvature of the land. Like the rest of America, the family got its news from a black and white Zenith television set and the local paper.

Reading the body count in the paper was my father's way of preparing for the war. The American dead, the Vietnamese dead, the Communist dead, each group had its own tally. Similar body counts were broadcast on the nightly news, and he would watch the images of fighting, trying to anticipate his own fate.

But my grandmother, I imagine, read the numbers to steel herself against her fourth son's departure. She had sent three sons to Vietnam already — Richard, Albert and John — and would now send a fourth. A third of her children would be in a war zone and still I imagine she looked much as she did when I knew her: sharp, cool eyes steady, a perennial I've-seen-it-all-and-then-some look about her. My grandmother was normally imperturbable, but my father's draft notice, this fourth boy conscripted, had shaken her.

The numbers signified different things to each of them. By the end of 1967, 15,000 American soldiers had died in Vietnam. For my grandmother this meant that 15,000 other people's children had died. To my father, the numbers seemed decent odds: Yes, the American troops were losing men, but the Communists were faring much, much worse. Of particular interest were what he called the "kill ratios," the number of Vietnamese to every American dead. For Dad, the high ratio of Communist casualties was a sign of hope. He believed, he once told me, that the numbers proved that "the good guys" were winning; the numbers, he said, meant that he had a "better shot" than the enemy; the numbers were "on his side."

Years after his tour, when my father knew just how quickly the numbers could turn — he landed in Vietnam during the Tet offensive and fulfilled his tour during the bloodiest year of the war — he never hesitated to tell me of his swift disillusionment with the numbers. The distinct American advantage in the "kill ratio" said much about winning the battles — it was true, they were killing lots of Vietnamese — but little about winning the war: the Vietnamese were willing to give every man, woman and child for victory, a sacrifice that Americans were simply not prepared to make. In the end, for our 58,000 dead, the casualties on the Vietnamese side were in the millions.

There are no kill ratios in Iraq. We know very little about civilian casualties. But we do know that even as President Bush speaks about a new strategy for the war, more than 3,000 Americans have been killed in four years of fighting. And as I think of those lives cut short, I think of my father and my grandmother on that winter afternoon in 1967, a newspaper open between them, each with their own interpretation.

Perhaps my father is peeling an apple; perhaps he is gazing out the window at the endless frozen cornfields, the pane of glass so thin and ill fitted that a draft of freezing air slips through the kitchen, ruffling the edge of the paper whose reality will soon enough be indisputable.

Mission Baghdad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

President Bush's challenge last night was to convince Americans that his new plan to secure Iraq won't mean risking more lives on a conflict that critics say has become "unwinnable." We think he offered compelling reasons for skeptical Americans of good faith to back him, but the key will be deploying enough forces to accomplish the task.

Mr. Bush's words offered the hope that the new plan won't simply mean employing more troops to carry out a strategy that hasn't been working. Though widely described in the press as a troop "surge" or even "escalation," the number of additional soldiers being sent to Iraq is significant but not overwhelming. The real difference will be how America uses its troops in Iraq. Put in simplest terms, Mr. Bush seems finally to have decided that the way to defeat the insurgency is to protect the population, especially in Baghdad.

For the past couple of years, every visitor to the Iraqi capital has been struck by the near invisibility of American troops on the city's streets. Sure, there were a few in the Green Zone, and lots out by the airport and a bit north at the airbase in Balad. But instead of using them to provide order, Generals George Casey and John Abizaid limited them largely to search and destroy missions while waiting for Iraqi forces to step up to the task of protecting civilian neighborhoods. There were reasonable arguments to be made for this strategy at the beginning -- it might have prevented Iraqi resentment of U.S. occupation -- but it couldn't survive the onslaught of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's car bombs and the reaction of the Shiite militias.

The new plan grew out of ideas presented by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki when he met Mr. Bush in Jordan last year. And under it, U.S. forces are slated to become more visible in the Iraqi capital than they have since the invasion in 2003. Instead of being confined to large bases outside the city, a U.S. combat battalion will be garrisoned in each of nine districts into which the city will be divided. Their job will be to support an Iraqi Army brigade (3,000-5,000 men) that likewise will be dedicated to each district, as well as a national police brigade and the local police.

Iraqis will take the lead in security operations, as they have in recent days in anti-insurgent fighting along Haifa Street. But there seems to be agreement on both sides that the Iraqis will perform with more confidence if they have close American support. The visibility of American forces will also reassure Baghdad's Sunni population, which has had justifiable worries about the infiltration of Iraqi police by Shiite militias.

Thus one question is whether one American battalion -- 600 to 1,000 soldiers -- is enough to do that job in these large areas of Baghdad. The tragedy would be if, after so much buildup, the U.S. only provided enough troops for an expanded version of Operation Forward Together, which failed last year.

Outside Baghdad, meanwhile, another U.S. combat brigade will be dedicated to Sunni-dominated al Anbar province. Ramadi will have to be a main destination, because that insurgent stronghold has to be tackled lest its car-bomb factories disrupt progress in the capital. There are also plans to increase the size of the Iraqi Army by five brigades, from the current 36, though we have our doubts that even this will be enough since the Army is so much more effective than the police.

Crucial to all of this will be the new U.S. ground commander in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who not only recruited and trained the Iraqi Army starting in 2004 but also oversaw the drafting of the U.S. Army's latest Counterinsurgency Manual. His job will be to execute the "clear, hold and build" strategy Mr. Bush has talked about for some time. General Casey has resisted the deployments necessary to make the "hold" and "build" phases work, and General Petraeus will have to insist that he has them.

Iraqi leadership will also be important to the new strategy, as the President noted last night. Mr. Maliki will have to show that Shiite criminals will be dealt with just as Sunni terrorists are. That means no more special treatment for the thugs of Sadr City. Rapid completion of a new oil law that guarantees equitable revenue distribution would also ease Sunni fears that they are going to lose out in the new Iraq. But we continue to believe that the best way to help Mr. Maliki accomplish these goals is not overt American pressure but consistent and overt American support. He will need it, because some compromises will alienate portions of his political base. * * *

In any case, last night's address was at least a tacit acknowledgment that the U.S. has placed far too much emphasis on a political progress as the solution to the violence. The truth is that political compromise won't happen without better security, or as the Petraeus Counterinsurgency Manual puts it, "security is essential to setting the stage for overall progress." There's also the outside meddling by Iraq's neighbors, particularly Iran and Syria. This remains primarily an indigenous Iraqi conflict. But showing those countries that they will pay a price for helping to kill Americans is also necessary for counterinsurgency success.

With the new strategy, new forces and new generals President Bush is putting in place, we have a fighting chance to create a virtuous circle whereby better security leads to more anti-insurgent cooperation from the public -- which in turn leads to still better security. If Congressional Democrats have better suggestions, we'd love to hear them. But the one "strategy" that simply isn't credible is the idea that anybody's interests would be served by a hasty U.S. exit from Iraq.

The Iraqis Must Step Up To The Plate (WSJ)

By L. Paul Bremer

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

"Looking back, I think that if we had then realized the confusion and chaos which existed we would indeed have thought ours a hopeless task. Certainly the authorities in Washington who had prepared (the occupation policy) did not visualize these conditions." -- Gen. Lucius Clay (1950). * * *

As in Germany a half-century ago, the American experience in Iraq has proven more difficult than anticipated. Mistakes were made -- including my own. Denying government positions to officials in the top 1% of Saddam's Baath party was correct. But it was a mistake to turn implementation over to Iraqi politicians rather than to judges. And in requesting American money to help rebuild Iraq's economy, I put too much emphasis on large-scale projects when smaller ones would have shown quicker results to the average Iraqi.

The president has frankly acknowledged the need for a new approach. He has assessed the various options and has courageously, and in my view wisely, rejected the politically popular course of withdrawing. Over the past four years, progress in Iraq has always depended on the interplay among the political, economic and security sectors. Clearly only Iraqis can design the necessary means to bridge their sectarian and ethnic divisions. The Shiites need to show they understand that democracy involves the proper respect for minority rights. The Sunnis must be brought to understand that while there is a place for them in liberated Iraq, their centuries-old domination of the country is over. The Kurds, with longer experience in elected government, must show patience as their Arab brothers wrestle with these and other issues.

Iraqis cannot make the necessary political compromises in an atmosphere of sustained violence. And although Iraq's economy has done well since the liberation, reconstruction, too, has been severely hampered by the lack of security. So security for Iraq's population is the sine qua non for success. By committing additional American forces, the president's new approach recognizes this fundamental reality. It is no secret that I would have preferred that we would have sent in more forces much sooner. But we are where we are today.

Now the Iraqis must step up to the plate. For months, they have promised additional Iraqi forces for Baghdad, forces which until now have never arrived. And Iraqi and Coalition forces operating in the capital have been subjected to constant political interference, hampering the effectiveness of those operations. An early test of the new approach will be whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki now makes good on the promised Iraqi reinforcements, and on his commitment to allow them to deal with the militia, especially those of the radical Moqtada al-Sadr.

Even a successful campaign in Baghdad will not end violence there. But a significant reduction in attacks in the capital would give the Iraqi government the political latitude needed to broaden its political base. The prime minister will also be watched carefully in Washington and in Iraq, to ensure that he delivers on his promises to move on the sensitive issues of oil policy and provincial elections, both important to encouraging an atmosphere of reconciliation. If he does not, then surely the Iraqi people will hold his government accountable, as is provided in the Iraqi constitution. * * *

The president's new approach is bold, unpopular and risky. But he is right to reject calls for American withdrawal. Those who advocate such a course need to be frank about the drastic consequences of such a course.

First, it would abandon 27 million Iraqis to broader and much bloodier violence. Some Americans seem prepared to accept this outcome, arguing, "It's their country. Let them sort it out." This is shortsighted and uninformed. Broader sectarian violence between Iraq's Arabs would certainly provoke the Kurds to declare their independence from Iraq. Over the past four years, I have often spoken about this issue with the Kurdish leaders. They have made clear that their decision to join a liberated Iraq depends on a government which can provide security for all its people and which is not dominated by sectarianism. An independent Iraqi Kurdistan would have an irresistible attraction for the millions of Kurds living in Syria, Turkey and Iran, and would surely lead to a wider regional war. Such a war would threaten American interests and allies throughout the region and lead to American military re-engagement, probably on a very large scale.

Most importantly, an American defeat in Iraq would immediately endanger Americans. By confirming Osama bin Laden's analysis that America is a "weak horse" driven out of Lebanon in 1983 and Somalia a decade later, defeat would be a major recruiting poster for Islamic extremists everywhere. If force again rules Mesopotamia, there is a real risk that extremists will establish themselves there as they had done in Afghanistan, but this time with major economic resources and an operating base not on the periphery of the Middle East, but at its heart.

These, then, are the stakes in Iraq. The president has acknowledged the need for new leadership and a new strategy. He is to be commended for rejecting the easy popular course.

Mr. Bremer was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority in Iraq in 2003-04.

More Troops -- "Escalation"? Or "Surge"? (USNEWS)

By Chris Wilson, Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, January 11, 2007

What do you call a decision to send 20,000 or more additional troops to Iraq?

It depends on whom you ask. President Bush and his team call it a "surge." Increasingly, Democrats and those who oppose the increase are calling it an "escalation," invoking an old specter from the Vietnam era. Even David Letterman, in last night's " target="new">"Top Ten Features of Bush's New Iraq Plan," used the word in No. 2: "Raise money for escalation by robbing Mick Jagger's apartment."

Escalation is a highly loaded term. The U.S. News library team tracked the earliest uses of the word in a military context during the Vietnam era and found that it first surfaced in a series of increasingly critical New York Times editorials in the spring and summer of 1965. The word gained traction from there and by 1968 was showing up on protest signs and in the language of the antiwar movement.

Surge, on the other hand, owes its recent popularity to use by Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and other military officials. Speaking from Baghdad last month after meeting with Army generals, Gates said they "discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish." The term also cropped up a few weeks earlier in the Iraq Study Group's statement that it would support "a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad." "'Surge' suggests it's a short, time-limited event, but at the moment the president is not willing to put any time limit on the whole enterprise," Democratic pollster Geoff Garin said. So far, Bush hasn't said how long his "surge" would last. He might make that clear in his prime-time address to the nation tonight, but don't bet on it.

White House officials say it all depends on how successful the troops are in stabilizing Baghdad in the larger pursuit of what Bush calls "victory," and that won't be known for months. The battle over "surge" or "increase" vs. "escalation" echoes other emotionally weighted word battles of the past, such as "prolife" vs. "prochoice" in framing the abortion debate and "estate tax" vs. "death tax" in describing taxation of inherited assets.

And let's not forget "taxes" vs. "revenue enhancers."

Democrats Aim To Block Funds For Plan (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Senior House Democrats said yesterday that they will attempt to derail funding for President Bush's proposal to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, setting up what could become the most significant confrontation between the White House and Congress over military policy since the Vietnam War.

Senate Democrats at the same time will seek bipartisan support for a nonbinding resolution opposing the president's plan, possibly as early as next week, in what some party officials see as the first step in a strategy aimed at isolating Bush politically and forcing the beginning of a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from the conflict.

The bold plans reflect the Democrats' belief that the public has abandoned Bush on the war and that the American people will have little patience for an escalation of the U.S. military presence in Iraq. But the moves carry clear risks for a party that suffered politically for pushing to end an unpopular war in Vietnam three decades ago, and Democratic leaders hope to avoid a similar fate over the conflict in Iraq.

The striking new approach took shape yesterday morning during a closed-door meeting of the House Democratic Caucus, where Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), invoked Martin Luther King Jr. as she urged her members against timidity, members who were there said. House Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), a quiet, hawkish supporter of the war, stunned many of his colleagues when he came out strenuously against Bush's proposal and suggested the war is no lon ger militarily winnable.

Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense and the party's leading voice for withdrawing troops, is to report back to Appropriations Committee members today on hearings and legislative language that could stop an escalation of troops, said Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a member of Murtha's subcommittee.

Those plans could attach so many conditions and benchmarks to the funds that it would be all but impossible to spend the money without running afoul of the Congress. "Twenty-one thousand five hundred troops ought to have 21,500 strings attached to them," said House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.).

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for Pelosi, said Democratic leaders have made no decision to hold back funds, but he added: "We are not going to give the president a blank check. We will subject any proposal to escalate the war to harsh scrutiny, and we will set benchmarks he has to attain to get that money."

Although Democratic leaders offered a united front last night in their response to Bush's speech, they have long struggled to forge consensus on the details of an alternative policy. Democrats have widely divergent views of the timing of any future withdrawal of U.S. forces and differ on whether there should be a timetable for bringing all troops home. Now in the majority, they will be challenged in the months ahead to outline a policy that will achieve the twin goals of ending U.S. involvement in Iraq without leaving that country in greater chaos.

Democratic reaction to Bush's prime-time speech last night was overwhelmingly negative, setting the stage for a series of legislative moves that will play out over the next few months.

"By calling for the rapid escalation of American troops in Iraq, the president rebuffed his commanders, thumbed his nose at the Baker-Hamilton commission and, worst of all, ignored the will of the American people," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said after the speech.

Bush had hoped to persuade congressional leaders to withhold judgment until last night's speech, meeting with more than 125 lawmakers in the run-up to the speech, including House leaders yesterday. But rank-and-file Democrats were unwilling to wait before laying the groundwork to thwart what they call an escalation.

DOJ_NMG_0115422

House Democratic leaders have said they will not use the power of the purse in any way that would harm troops in the field, a position that had run afoul of the party's liberal activists. Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), a member of the Armed Services Committee, said that pledge is being calibrated to apply only to troops in the field now.

Tauscher said Democratic policy must "satisfy the American people that we're putting a speed bump in front of the president that will actually hold," adding: "The White House is used to doing business on their own, but they're realizing things have changed. This is vastly different."

House Democrats also expect to introduce soon a resolution of disapproval for Bush's new policy but have moved farther than Senate Democrats toward an outright funding confrontation with the White House.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) called Tuesday for the administration to ask for renewed authorization from Congress before sending additional troops to Iraq. "I don't believe there's a single member of the U.S. Senate that would have voted for the authorization bill in October 2002 if they thought the authorization was going to commit American forces to be involved in a civil war," he said yesterday.

But Democratic strategists said that, at this point, there is limited support for the Kennedy proposal.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who with Pelosi co-signed a letter to the president last week urging him not to send more troops to Iraq, has begun meetings with other senior senators, including Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.), Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) to develop specific responses to Bush's new policy.

Antiwar activists continued to press congressional Democrats to block Bush's plans. "The bottom line is that when voters elected the Democrats, they did that on the promise that the Democrats would lead the country out of the war," said Eli Pariser, director of the MoveOn political action committee. "Democrats need to fulfill on that promise, and they're going to."

Democrats Reject Bush's "Way Forward" (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely, Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats launched an immediate counterattack against President Bush's new Iraq strategy Wednesday. Rep. John Murtha vowed to try to block Bush's plan from his perch as chairman of the House defense appropriations subcommittee.

"Escalating our military involvement in Iraq sends precisely the wrong message, and we oppose it," the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate said in a statement released after the speech.

Hours before Bush outlined his "new way forward" in Iraq to the nation, Murtha told USA TODAY that he plans to use his subcommittee's control over the Pentagon budget to force a new direction in Iraq.

Specifically, Murtha, a former Marine and Vietnam War veteran from Pennsylvania, said he'll focus on the administration's supplemental spending request for Iraq, which is expected to be as high as $160 billion.

Murtha says he will hold extensive hearings on the budget request. "We're going to make them justify every cent," he said. He also said he may use the funding bill to hamstring the efforts to add more troops to Iraq.

Among the options Murtha said he's considering: barring the redeployment to Iraq of troops who haven't had the recommended one-year respite in the United States and prohibiting those who are in Iraq from having their tours of duty extended.

Bush said he plans to boost troop levels in Iraq by 21,500. Before the speech, the White House acknowledged that policies covering the Pentagon's access to the National Guard and Reserves may have to be changed to allow for more or longer mobilizations.

Murtha said that by inserting language into the administration's request for more money to fund the Iraq war, he can avoid a Bush veto. Murtha said legislation introduced Tuesday by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., that would require congressional approval of Bush's plan could be vetoed with little consequence. If Congress adds conditions to the Iraq funding bill, Bush will have to accept them or cut off money for the troops. "The supplemental is where the money is," Murtha said. "Nothing else means anything. They can veto anything else."

Murtha said it is unclear whether the full House will take up Bush's plan in coming weeks, as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's preference is to focus on domestic issues first.

Pelosi complained to reporters after congressional leaders met with Bush earlier in the day that the administration had already tried surging troops into Baghdad to improve security conditions twice before.

"Two times this has not worked," said the California Democrat. "Why are they doing this now? That question remains."

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly stopped short of saying whether she would back Murtha's tactics, but added: "She supports what Murtha is doing generally, which is that we should subject it (Bush's proposal) to harsh scrutiny."

DOJ_NMG_0115423

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., plans to introduce a resolution next week to force senators to vote for or against the plan, spokesman Jim Manley said.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., predicted a "significant number of Republicans" would vote against Bush's new strategy.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., plans to offer amendments that will give Democrats heartburn, said spokesman Don Stewart. "We're not the only ones who are going to have to take tough votes around here," Stewart said.

McConnell said of Bush's speech that he is "convinced the military can handle it and we'll be successful."

Another supporter of Bush's strategy is Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an independent Democrat after losing his Democratic primary last year.

"I applaud the president for rejecting the fatalism of failure and pursuing a new course to achieve success in Iraq," Lieberman said.

In the speech, Bush praised Lieberman's "good advice" for urging him to establish a bipartisan working group to try to forge congressional consensus on Iraq.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., said in the official Democratic response that the Democratic leadership had a plan for Iraq. He said their plan calls for "shifting greater responsibility to the Iraqis for their security," beginning the withdrawal of U.S. forces in the next four to six months and implementing "an aggressive diplomatic strategy" to help stabilize Iraq and help achieve a political settlement, including the amending of Iraq's constitution.

Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry said more U.S. troops will not be able to stop the violence. He said he supports setting a date for the withdrawal of troops to force the Iraqis to step up and stop the violence.

"This plan is neither new nor forward-looking," Kerry said after Bush's speech. "This is more of what's taken us backwards. There's no military solution in Iraq. There is only a political solution, and the president has no plan to achieve it."

Democrats Ready To Fight New War Plan (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Democrats yesterday attacked President Bush's new plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq and began laying the groundwork for a showdown between the executive and legislative branches over war powers.

"Escalation of this war is not the change the American people called for in the last election," Democratic Whip Sen. Richard J. Durbin of Illinois said last night in his party's response to Mr. Bush's prime-time presentation of his Iraq strategy changes.

"Instead of a new direction, the president's plan moves the American commitment in Iraq in the wrong direction."

The new Democratic-led Congress plans to grill Bush administration officials during Capitol Hill hearings on the Iraq war -- beginning this morning when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates testify before congressional committees.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, said Americans want to know whether Mr. Bush's strategy is a "change of course."

"Or is this simply more of the same with slightly different rhetoric?" Mr. Schumer said.

Miss Rice will testify before the Senate and House foreign relations committees today, and Mr. Gates, who replaced the war's architect Donald H. Rumsfeld last month, will testify before the House Armed Services Committee today and the Senate Armed Services Committee tomorrow.

Democratic leaders also are drafting a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop surge, which they want to put up for a vote in both the House and Senate next week and which they think some Republicans will support.

"The issue is: Do you support the president's policy? That will be the vote," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican and a favorite of conservatives, last night said Mr. Bush's troop surge is not the answer.

"Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution," he said.

Mr. Bush said he will send more than 17,000 soldiers to Baghdad and 4,000 Marines to the Anbar province to try to break the cycle of violence and "hasten the day our troops begin coming home." He said Iraq has responsibilities that it must meet.

"The president knows there is no silver bullet to make our mission there easier, but he is committed to a new, better strategy that will move us toward a stable Iraq," said House Republican Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri.

"It is not the responsibility of members of Congress to dictate strategy to the commander in chief, who is ultimately responsible, along with the commanders on the ground, for implementing a winning strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0115424

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, said that if neither the hearings nor the anti-troop surge resolution change Mr. Bush's stance, he will move forward with a bill in "a matter of days" that would require the president to seek congressional approval for a troop increase.

"What we really ought to be having is a surge of political initiatives, rather than a surge of military initiatives," Mr. Kennedy said.

Some senators said yesterday that they would support such a move, but Democratic leaders on Tuesday appeared to brush aside Mr. Kennedy's proposal.

If Mr. Kennedy's idea gains momentum and comes to the Senate floor, the president's war powers under the Constitution's Article II would be at issue.

Congress voted to authorize the use of force against Iraq in 2002, and under the Constitution, the president is the "commander in chief" of the nation's military and has authority to prosecute a war as he sees fit.

Mr. Kennedy's bill, however, says that the 2002 authorization no longer applies to the current situation, which Democrats view as a civil war with U.S. troops caught in the crossfire.

"The mission of the Armed Forces of the United States in Iraq no longer bears any resemblance to the mission of the Armed Forces authorized by Congress in the Authorization for Use of Military Force Against Iraq Resolution of 2002," Mr. Kennedy's proposal reads.

Mr. Bush's position is that Iraq is a central front in the war on terror and that al Qaeda and other terrorist groups, some backed by Iran, want to drive U.S. troops out of Iraq and then launch attacks on American soil.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, said the president "did not take the easy path, but he took the correct and courageous course."

"Defeat in Iraq would result in a moral and strategic setback in our global struggle against Islamist extremists who seek to strike our interests and our homeland," Mr. Lieberman said.

Likely Democratic presidential hopefuls in 2008 have taken a range of views on Iraq.

Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, called the troop increase "a mistake that I and others will actively oppose in the days to come."

"Escalation has already been tried and it has already failed, because no amount of American forces can solve the political differences that lie at the heart of somebody else's civil war," he said.

Former Sen. John Edwards, North Carolina Democrat, wants an immediate withdrawal, while Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, has said she opposes a surge but has kept a low profile this week on Capitol Hill.

Among Republican 2008 hopefuls, Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, is one of the strongest supporters of sending more troops.

Mr. McCain has said such an increase must be "substantial and sustained" to make any difference in Iraq. He said last week that, at a minimum, five brigades of 3,500 to 5,000 soldiers should be sent to Baghdad, and two more brigades should be sent to the troublesome Anbar province.

Democrats Plan To Fight Expansion Of Troops (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The new Democratic leaders of Congress on Wednesday accused President Bush of ignoring strong American sentiment against the war in Iraq and said they would build a bipartisan campaign against his proposed military expansion.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California said House Democrats intended to turn the precise words from Mr. Bush's speech into a symbolic resolution, compelling Republicans to support or reject the idea of sending more troops to Iraq. The Senate was developing a similar nonbinding resolution to be considered as early as next week.

"The president's response to the challenge of Iraq is to send more American soldiers into the crossfire of a civil war," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, responding for his party immediately after Mr. Bush spoke. "The escalation of this war is not the change the American people called for in the last election."

The criticism from Democrats resounded in near unison on Wednesday evening, a rare moment for a party that for more than four years has struggled to present a unified policy on Iraq.

Of more immediate concern to the administration was the bleak assessment from some Republicans.

Senator Norm Coleman, Republican of Minnesota, delivered a strong rebuke to the plan in a speech on the Senate floor only hours before the presidential address. A recent trip to Iraq, Mr. Coleman said, confirmed his fears that Baghdad was besieged by irreparable sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0115425

"I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," said Mr. Coleman, who is up for re-election in 2008.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, one of the administration's staunchest allies on Iraq, disagreed. Public opinion was not entirely against the war, Mr. McCain said, adding, "Americans want to be told how we can prevail in Iraq and how we can get out."

Even though Mr. Bush proposed a bipartisan Congressional working group on Iraq, he set the stage for a major confrontation with Democrats, who won the majority last fall after the lingering war soured the climate for Republicans. The clash begins Thursday as Democrats open a series of hearings to scrutinize the president's approach on Iraq.

"In the coming days and weeks, we should undertake respectful debate and deliberation over this new plan," said Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, a Democrat turned independent singled out by Mr. Bush for recommending a new bipartisan group focusing on the war on terror. "Excessive partisan division and rancor at home only weakens our will to prevail in this war."

The White House had asked Republicans to reserve judgment on the Iraq strategy — or to at least stay silent — but several Republicans distanced themselves from the president Wednesday. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, conducted a series of calls and meetings Wednesday in an effort to stem political damage.

"This is a dangerously wrongheaded strategy that will drive America deeper into an unwinnable swamp at a great cost," said Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska. "It is wrong to place American troops in the middle of Iraq's civil war."

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia, said he had reservations about increasing troops, but declined to condemn the president's plan until Congress had had the opportunity to study it.

"Blow the whistle, time out, until Congress has done its homework and its analysis," Mr. Warner said. "But each day that goes by, all of us are pained by the casualties. We cannot dither about."

Six hours before the president delivered his address to the nation, Congressional leaders from both parties were called to the White House for a briefing. Democrats dismissed the meeting as a last-minute procedural briefing, saying the administration had failed to consult with them, as the president promised to only a week ago.

"This conversation that we had with the president just now would have been much better a week ago, a month ago, six months ago," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, as he walked from the White House.

As they prepared their reaction to the president's prime-time address, Democratic Congressional leaders did not ask television networks for broadcast time for a formal response. Instead, they settled on responding with the symbolic resolutions.

Debate over the administration's Iraq policy has been a central focus of the early stages of the 2008 presidential campaign. As several senators and representatives responded to Mr. Bush's speech in Washington, one potential Republican contender, Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, weighed in skeptically from Baghdad in the midst of an extended trip through the Middle East.

Mr. Brownback, who is chronicling his travels in a daily blog, issued a statement Wednesday urging the administration to "transfer more security responsibility to the Iraqis and reduce the threat to American troops."

"The United States cannot sustain a war effort without broad public support," he said. "And we cannot count on such support unless the situation in Iraq improves and American casualties decrease."

How Congress May Block A Troop "Surge" (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

If Congress decides to block the president's plan for a troop buildup in Iraq, it has all the clout it needs - at least on parchment - to trim war funding through its power of the purse. Call it the Murtha plan.

Congress can also opt to push back with hearings, investigations, and resolutions that condemn an escalation of the war or require President Bush to return to Congress for approval before committing troops. Call that the Kennedy plan.

Choosing which strategy to pursue is causing heated debate within the new Democratic majority, which believes it owes its power to an election-season promise to begin withdrawing US troops. They are joined by a growing number of Republicans who - at least in the run-up to Mr. Bush unveiling his Iraq plan Wednesday - were reluctant to send more Americans into a war they believed could not be won.

But even at the lowest public-approval ratings of his career, Bush as commander in chief brings powerful assets to any conflict with Congress over the conduct of war. He can rally the public (as he hopes to do with Wednesday night's speech). He can order troop movements before Congress can thwart them. He can delay requests for supplemental war funding to blunt Congress's power of the purse.

Only in the last few days have Democratic leaders even entertained the idea of cutting off funding for the war. For Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, the lead advocate for using funding to force a change of course in this war, timing is crucial.

DOJ_NMG_0115426

His Defense Appropriations subcommittee is the gateway for every dime spent on the war. He says that he will use that power to bar a troop surge in Iraq if, for example, it undermines the military's domestic readiness.

"If we just pass resolutions, the president will veto them. If he vetoes an appropriations bill, he doesn't have any money. It's the only weapon we have," he says.

But to wield that power, he needs the president to submit a request for additional defense spending before a "surge" of new troops into Iraq. So far, all war funding has been handled that way - as supplemental requests to Congress outside the normal budget process.

In the next two months, his subcommittee will hold hearings to document the state of readiness of US forces and build support for writing benchmarks and conditions into the next defense spending bill.

On a faster track, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts proposed legislation this week that would require the president to come back to the Congress and get authority for deploying additional American troops to Iraq. "I am introducing legislation to reclaim the rightful role of Congress and the people's right to a full voice in the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq," he said in an address at the National Press Club on Tuesday.

"No one - no one - can seriously deny that this civil war is radically different from the mission Congress voted for in 2002," he added.

On the House side, Rep. Edward Markey (D) of Massachusetts is proposing a similar resolution to require Congress to expressly authorize any escalation of the war in Iraq. "After more than 3,000 American casualties, over $300 billion in expenditures, and almost four years of fighting, an increase in the number of members of the US Armed Forces deployed in Iraq above the current level of 132,000 is the wrong course of action," he says.

Representative Murtha worries that if Democrats settle for a quick, symbolic gesture, they could curb momentum for stronger action on the spending side. Should the president veto the Kennedy resolution, or another like it, it would require a two-thirds vote in both the House and Senate to override the veto. "It's not clear we have it," he says.

On Wednesday, Democrats discussed these options in their morning caucus meeting but did not settle on a strategy. "We're going to make a judgment on the best way to present our position on the escalation of the war in Iraq, which our own military does not support," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer, on Wednesday. After a meeting with his caucus on Tuesday, Senate majority leader Harry Reid says that Democrats are working toward "a bipartisan statement on the president's escalation." He expects at least nine Republicans to support it.

For most Democrats, cutting off funds in wartime is still a near taboo topic because it carries a high political risk of appearing to endanger troops in the field.

"I don't know why we have members of Congress out there who say there's nothing constitutional that Congress can do. Politically, they may feel like it's crazy to do anything restricting money supporting troops, but constitutionally they can do what they like and they've done it in the past," says Louis Fisher, an expert in separation of powers at the Library of Congress.

"Congress can attach any condition to any appropriation it pleases," says Winslow Wheeler, director of Straus Military Reform Project at the Center for Defense Information in Washington. "If they want to say none of the appropriations in the supplemental can be used to keep troops beyond their normal deployment period or to send additional troops, sobeit. The president can disregard this at his own peril."

But it requires careful work to draft constraints into legislation without loopholes. President Nixon circumvented an amendment banning funding for combat troops in Laos by describing the forces as "military equipment delivery teams - end use supervisors."

"Congress can urge, propose, recommend, but it's very hard to legislate when it comes to troop deployments," says Charles Stevenson, author of the book "Warriors and Politicians." "They didn't try to [cut funds for aerial bombing] earlier in the Vietnam War, because they didn't think they had the two-thirds to override a veto."

Military experts say that Congress has other levers on the president, including new legislation on the use of reservists.

Democrats Oppose Bush's Plan To Add Troops In Iraq (MCT)

By Renee Schoof, Margaret Talev

McClatchy, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - If President Bush is determined to win over Congress to the idea of keeping more American troops in Iraq, his chances looked dim Wednesday night.

But even as the new Democratic majority and some of the president's fellow Republicans expressed doubts or rejected the notion outright, they had yet to coalesce behind binding legislation to stop him.

DOJ_NMG_0115427

Instead, lawmakers will hold hearings Thursday and in ensuing weeks to analyze the plan, and Democrats are scheduling votes on nonbinding resolutions that would force members of both parties to go on record supporting or opposing Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq.

The Senate could begin debating resolutions as early as next week; House of Representatives leaders were more vague on the timing.

"We will give his proposal a fair hearing, and in our hearings, we will establish the ground truth of what is happening in Iraq, and then we will vote on the president's proposal," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., who opposes Bush's buildup.

Early opposition from Democrats was sharp.

Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., the head of the Out-of-Iraq Caucus, said Bush's plan was futile and would only put more U.S. troops in harm's way. "We cannot undo the harm we have created" in Iraq, she said.

Republican leaders were generally supportive.

"It is our best shot at victory in Iraq, and I think that's what the American people want and expect," said House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., called the plan "courageous and correct." He also said Democrats should be prepared for "considerable debate" on any legislation that they tried to bring to the floor, suggesting that the minority may delay votes.

But the president now faces critics in his own party as well.

Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., who was traveling in Iraq, said Wednesday, "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer. Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., delivered a speech on the Senate floor opposing a troop increase. "I refuse to put more American lives on the line in Baghdad without being assured that the Iraqis themselves are willing to do what they need to do to end the violence of Iraqi against Iraqi," he said.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said she could support more American troops in Anbar province, the hotbed of the Sunni Muslim insurgency, but not in Baghdad, where "it's clear the violence is entirely sectarian."

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, the ranking Republican on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said he'd wait until Thursday to issue a detailed response. But he floated the idea of Republican critics rallying around a resolution endorsing the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group. That bipartisan panel backed a goal of bringing most U.S. troops home by early 2008.

Warner said that while he wanted to support President Bush and show him respect, ultimately "I support what's in the best interests of this country."

In the House, eight Republicans sent Bush a letter warning him that adding troops would make matters in Iraq worse. They said there was no evidence that more American forces could stop the sectarian violence, and that an increase would deepen Iraqi dependence on the United States, reduce the number of American troops poised to respond to other crises around the world and give al-Qaida more recruiting power.

The eight were Reps. Walter B. Jones and Howard Coble of North Carolina, Ron Paul of Texas, Wayne Gilchrest and Roscoe Bartlett of Maryland, John Duncan of Tennessee, Phil English of Pennsylvania and Steven LaTourette of Ohio.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said that measuring the depth of opposition to Bush's plan had to be the first step, "and then after that we will decide what further actions to take."

All options will be considered, he said, including restrictions on funding.

Democrats have floated several ideas about how to block a troop increase.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., has called for a vote requiring the president to win congressional authorization for any more troops in Iraq. He said it wouldn't cut off money for troops who already were in Iraq or were on the way there. American troop levels might already be up in Iraq by the time his legislation passed, but "I can't do anything about that," he said.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., said an amendment to the supplemental budget for the Iraq war could be used to oppose an increase in troops but that it wasn't clear whether such a measure would get enough Republican support to meet the 60-vote threshold that's needed to end debate in the Senate, where Democrats have a 51-49 majority.

Reed also acknowledged that the deployment could be well under way before the Senate votes on the supplemental budget for the Iraq war in several months.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a top defense appropriator, has suggested that there are legislative means to curb the president without hurting the troops. But as of Wednesday night, Democratic leaders had yet to endorse any such plans.

"Prebutters" Ensure Debate Over "Way Forward" Is Backward (WP)

By Dana Milbank

DOJ_NMG_0115428

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

President Bush's announcement last night of a "New Way Forward in Iraq" began with a step backward.

The White House called a noon briefing to preview Bush's 9 p.m. speech, and reporters entered the room to find a multimedia display, which featured a projection screen, large television and laptop showing a yellow map of Iraq and its neighbors in orange.

But moments before the briefing, four young aides scurried into the room, pulled a blue velvet curtain in front of the projection screen, unplugged the laptop and wheeled the television offstage through the curtains.

"It's curtains for Iraq," a reporter observed.

"What happened to the maps?" a correspondent asked White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, who had just entered the room.

"Maps?" she replied. "There were maps?"

Bush aides could be forgiven for this confusion. Usually, official Washington chews over a president's speech after he has delivered it. But yesterday, virtually everything in the speech was disclosed, disputed and defended -- hours before the lights went on in the White House library for Bush's address to the nation.

The culprit? The "prebuttal," the act of rebutting an opponent's speech before the speech is delivered, which has been around for years. The term, like the Internet, was apparently invented by Vice President Al Gore, who was quoted by The Washington Post's Dan Balz as using it during the 1996 presidential campaign. But now prebuttals have become so intense that they have forced the victim of the prebuttal to preempt his own speech -- giving the speech itself an anticlimactic feel.

Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) started the latest round of prebuttals Tuesday. "President Bush will address the nation tomorrow about his decision to send tens of thousands of additional American troops to the war in Iraq," he said at the National Press Club, announcing legislation to thwart Bush's still-unannounced plan.

At dawn yesterday, Bush counselor Dan Bartlett attempted to rebut Kennedy's prebuttal by giving a series of morning-show interviews on the White House lawn. "We don't view Ted Kennedy as a hostile enemy," Bartlett graciously told Fox News, then slyly added: "It's really important for the American people to understand that their leaders in Washington, regardless of all the politics, support our troops."

Kennedy, his support for the troops thus challenged, scheduled a news conference in the Senate press gallery to rebut Bartlett's rebuttal of Kennedy's prebuttal.

By then, however, the prebuttals were everywhere. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) alone issued three written prebuttals of the Bush speech and one orally in the White House driveway.

Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.), giving a news conference at noon, paraphrased Bush's yet-to-be-delivered speech. "The president has basically said: 'First I need more troops and then I'll craft a strategy,' " Schumer deduced.

And Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) offered Bush rhetorical flourishes for the address. "I'm sure he will dress up his rhetoric in words like 'new approach' and 'new beginning,' 'a new way forward.' "

The White House, losing the battle to the "prebutters," scheduled a briefing to preempt the president's speech. Two Bush aides, who could be identified only as senior administration officials, gave out all the details: 21,000 to 22,000 more troops; $1 billion in development aid; no hard conditions or timelines for U.S. involvement. Bush "will talk about the hopes we had at the end of 2005," Senior Administration Official A announced. "He will say that that was dashed in 2006. And he will then conclude that the situation in Iraq is unacceptable."

The White House was evidently doing this on the fly. It delayed the noon briefing, first to 12:15, then to 12:25. "We have promised some documents to you; those are still in production," Senior Administration Official B announced on arrival. When the documents did arrive, they contradicted each other. The first stated that "the war on terror cannot be won if we fail in Iraq." The second document hedged: "Failing in Iraq would make succeeding in the war on terror vastly more difficult."

Official A attempted to answer the prebutters. "We hope that people will have time for debate to occur before taking preemptive action," he said.

No chance. By then, Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) had announced that he was issuing his prebuttal in the form of a "radio actuality and a direct-to-camera video interview." Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) also offered an "audio" option with her written prebuttal. Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) was busy prebutting Bush on MSNBC, while Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) released his prebuttal from Baghdad.

Usual Bush friends were silent; "RNC Announces Winter Meeting Schedule," declared the party's press release.

Only a few brave souls joined the White House in rebutting the prebutters. "I am disappointed that some declared the president's proposals unworkable even before they were announced," declared Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.). On the other hand, Kyl was willing to declare the proposals workable even before they were announced: His "embargoed" prebuttal rebuttal came out three hours before the speech.

Bush Speech Prompts 2008 Contenders To Stake Ground (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's speech outlining his troop-increase plan in Iraq provoked several potential presidential candidates to stake out a position, including some Republicans who had avoided addressing a controversial proposal that is likely to be a touchstone issue in the 2008 campaign.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, ending weeks of dodging questions on the issue, announced Wednesday he would support a troop increase. But Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., announced he opposed it, a sign that Republicans may not be as reluctant to distance themselves from Bush as they once were.

Divisions also opened among Democrats, as two -- John Kerry, D-Mass., and former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C. -- announced their support for Congress to cut off funds needed for a troop increase. That step goes farther than many Democrats want because they fear it will be seen as undermining U.S. troops already in Iraq.

Presidential politics will likely cast a shadow over the opening debate on Bush's proposal Thursday when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice testifies before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Five members of the panel are thinking about running for president.

For months, the only likely presidential candidate to support a troop escalation was Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who made it a signature issue long before Bush threw his support behind the idea. Other Republican aspirants kept their distance from the proposal, which is supported by a mere 12 percent of the public, according to recent Gallup poll.

Romney previously had declined to comment before his term in the statehouse ended in early January, telling interviewers, "I'm still a governor," when asked about increasing troops.

Wednesday, Romney put himself in league with McCain, his leading rival for the GOP nomination, and Bush by issuing a statement calling for additional troops. He said he reached that conclusion through consultations with generals, military experts and ground troops.

McCain acknowledged the political perils of backing such an unpopular plan on CNN after the speech. "I'd much rather lose a campaign than lose a war," he said.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who had been silent on the issue, also issued a statement backing Bush's troop increase. "Even more importantly," he said, "I support the change in strategy, the focus on security and the emphasis on a political and economic solution as being even more important than a military solution."

But Brownback, issuing a statement while on an official trip to Iraq that included a meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, concluded, "I do not believe that sending more troops to Iraq is the answer. Iraq requires a political rather than a military solution."

Almost all Democrats considering a presidential bid opposed the Bush plan, although there were differences in their degree of opposition and their positions on what Congress should do to stop him.

Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, a longshot candidate, is the most militant opponent to the war and has proposed denying any new funding to continue the war and a quick withdrawal.

Presumed front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., had been more moderate about the war and cautious about commenting on the president's plan before the speech.

After the speech, she said, "I cannot support his proposed escalation of the war in Iraq." She reiterated her support for a "phased redeployment of U.S. troops," not a quick withdrawal.

Others were more assertive in advance of Bush's speech.

Kerry announced Wednesday he was backing a proposal by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., to prohibit paying for an increase in U.S. troops unless Congress voted to approve it. Edwards -- an outspoken critic of increasing troop levels who has said he made a mistake voting for the war in 2002 -- on Tuesday also called on Congress to block funding for an escalation.

Some Democratic candidates are not so keen on pulling the purse strings. Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., has not ruled out such action, but has raised questions about the constitutionality and practicality of doing so.

He is calling instead for Congress to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's troop increase -- an approach that Senate Democratic leaders have embraced.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., opposed the Iraq war in 2002, although he was not in Congress to vote against it at the time, and has criticized the proposed troop increase. "We cannot impose a military solution on the problem, there has to be a political accommodation," he said on CNN, explaining that the president had offered no plan to reconcile warring Shiites and Sunnis. "I think we are making a very bad mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0115430

Obama has not embraced the Kennedy fund cut-off bill. He said his staff is looking at options to place conditions on to Bush's actions without risking cuts that could hurt troops in Iraq already.

Meanwhile, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, a potential Democratic contender, said, "The only surge we need in Iraq is a diplomatic one." He also called for U.S. troops to be withdrawn from Iraq this year -- a more specific timetable than many Democrats have embraced.

A Cynical Opposition (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

You might have thought President Bush's announcement yesterday that he intends to deploy several thousand more combat soldiers to Iraq would have been sweet policy vindication for the Democrats. They're the ones who spent the better part of the past four years using Eric Shinseki -- the former Army Chief of Staff who, prior to the war, estimated it would take up to half a million troops to occupy the country -- as a cudgel with which to beat this President over the head.

Thus former House minority leader, now Speaker Nancy Pelosi, citing General Shinseki in May 2004, on "Meet the Press": "What I'm saying to you, [is] that we need more troops on the ground." Thus, too, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, just four weeks ago: "If it's for a surge -- that is, for two or three months -- and it's part of a program to get us out of there as indicated by this time next year, then, sure, I'll go along with it."

Lately the Democrats have been singing from a different hymnal. In a letter Mr. Reid and Ms. Pelosi sent the President last week, they write: "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed. . . . Adding more combat troops will endanger more Americans and stretch our military capability to the breaking point for no strategic gain."

As for Carl Levin, the new Senate Armed Forces Chairman was also one of those who used to call for more troops. But now he is threatening a legislative cap on the number of troops in Iraq if Mr. Bush doesn't start a significant drawdown of U.S. forces in Iraq later this year. We'll bet Mr. Levin never has the political nerve to follow through on anything but TV sound-bite criticism.

Ostensibly, the Democratic complaint is that the Administration has failed to come up with a new strategy for Iraq. In fact, Mr. Bush says he is offering a qualitative departure from what the U.S. has attempted before. (See "Mission Baghad"1.) The real question is whether the Democrats are prepared to act like a responsible opposition now that they control both houses of Congress, in contrast to the last four years of partisan minority sniping.

On the evidence of the past week, the answer is no. On Tuesday, the Democrats announced they would hold a symbolic, nonbinding vote on the troop increase, without so much as hearing what the President has to say. The vote, says Senator Joe Biden, is an effort to "demonstrate to the President he's on his own." So much for presenting a united American face to the jihadis and insurgents killing our troops in Iraq. And this from someone who fancies himself Presidential-timber.

Such a vote would be pure partisanship, and of an especially ugly sort. If Democrats seriously believe that a troop surge "will endanger more Americans," then there might be some moral justification in using Congress's power of the purse to cut off funds for the war. But as House Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel candidly explained, "anytime, politically, you have to explain what you are saying, you have a problem. And so if I am there saying, 'Cut the funds for Iraq and the war in Iraq,' then someone is going to say, 'You are taking away rifles.'"

So the Democrats want the political mileage of opposing the troop increase rhetorically. What they don't want is to take responsibility for their own policy choice. Meanwhile, their rhetoric will only serve to reassure the jihadis that sooner or later Democrats will force a U.S. withdrawal. It's enough to give a half-cheer to genuine Democratic isolationists, who have proposed legislation that would require the President to seek approval to fund additional troop increases. At least they're willing to go on record.

Most reckless is the contention, also by Mr. Reid and Ms. Pelosi, that "it is time to bring the war to a close." No one serious -- not even the Iraq Study Group -- believes that the war will end if we leave. Instead, it will change into a civil war in Iraq, and perhaps a wider regional war, that is likely to draw our forces back in again somewhere in the Middle East. As the bipartisan ISG noted in its December report, "If we leave and Iraq descends into chaos, the long-range consequences could eventually require the United States to return."

If Congressional Democrats want to be constructive, they can insist that Mr. Bush and his generals truly implement the strategy he is now endorsing. The path Democrats have followed in the minority and are now continuing will only make U.S. success harder -- a truth the American people will come to understand, and resent.

Damaging National Security (WT)

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115431

The Democrats had tried several pre-emptive strikes against President Bush's speech last night about how to win the war in Iraq. The president, in our view, is right to send additional troops to Baghdad and other violent areas of Iraq to stanch the blood-letting and enable the Iraqi government to impose its authority over the nation. But in addition to opposing measures to end the war, the House would now undermine national security.

Buried inside the legislation hurried through the House on Tuesday, as part of the Democrats' goal of implementing September 11 commission recommendations, is a provision that would damage a successful multilateral program to combat the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction: the Proliferation Security Initiative (PSI). The PSI was largely responsible for persuading Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi to terminate his search for atomic weapons and for unravelling the nuclear proliferation network run by the notorious A.Q. Khan of Pakistan. Unfortunately, this legislation has the potential to wreak damage by bringing the U.N. Security Council into the process.

The legislation, pushed by prominent members of the House Democratic leadership, including Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos and Armed Services Committee Chairman Ike Skelton, urges "with a particular emphasis" that the president work with the Security Council (where Russia and China, serial proliferators of weapons of mass destruction, have a veto) to "authorize the PSI under international law." During Tuesday's debate, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican, offered an amendment to strike the provision, but it was defeated on a party-line 230-198 vote.

Given its extraordinary record of achievement, it is difficult to see how the initiative, largely the work of John Bolton as undersecretary of state in 2003, could be strengthened by the U.N. Security Council. The United States oversees the program, which sets out principles and steps for interdicting shipments of weapons of mass destruction. More than 70 nations have committed to PSI's antiproliferation principles. In October 2003, operating under the auspices of the initiative, U.S. warships seized uranium-enrichment gas centrifuge components bound for Libya's covert program aboard the BBC China, a German-owned vessel. Libya subsequently renounced nuclear weapons, and its revelations led to the unraveling of the Khan network -- which had played a key role in helping Iran develop the ability to use gas centrifuges to enrich uranium. If the Proliferation Security Initiative had been in place throughout the 1980s and 1990s, Iran might not be on the brink of developing nuclear weapons today.

Although the informal, voluntary structure of the initiative has been essential to its success, this would likely be jeopardized by the Democrats' insistence that the Security Council and the U.N. bureaucracy be brought into play. This would empower both China and Russia, which have helped along the Iranian and North Korean nuclear weapons programs, with increased ability to make mischief. If the Senate refuses to strip this irresponsible provision from the bill, Mr. Bush should consider doing it himself with a veto.

At Least Bush Wants To Win (LAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Bush sticks to his goal of winning in Iraq. The Democrats are just stuck.

AMERICANS ARE torn between two irreconcilable positions on the Iraq war. Some want the war to be a success — variously defined — and some want the war to be over. Conservatives are basically, but not exclusively, in the "success" camp. Liberals (and those further to the left) are basically, but not exclusively, the "over" party. And many people are suffering profound cognitive dissonance by trying to believe these two positions can be held simultaneously. The motives driving these various positions range from the purely patriotic to the coldly realistic to the cravenly political or psychological perfervid. Parsing motives is exhausting and pointless, but one fact remains: "End it now" and "win it eventually" cannot be reconciled.

With last night's speech, President Bush made it clear that he will settle for nothing less than winning it. He may be deluding himself, and his plan may not work, but he at least has done the nation the courtesy of saying what his position is, despite an antagonistic political establishment and a hostile public. What is maddening is that the Democratic leadership cannot, or will not, clearly tell the American people whether they are the party of "end it" or "win it."

Give Sen. Ted Kennedy his due. He not only wants the thing over, consequences be damned, but he's got the courage to admit it, as he did on Tuesday at the National Press Club. But when House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid come to a fork in the road, they follow Yogi Berra's advice and take it. On the one hand, they tell the president that they want this war "brought to a close." On the other, they refuse to use their power of the purse to do exactly that, opting instead for a symbolic resolution. It may be the wisest political course for them, but it does a disservice to the nation by making the Iraq debate the equivalent of boxing with fog.

Here we have a president forthrightly trying to win a war, and the opposition — which not long ago was in favor of increasing troops, when Bush was against that — won't say what it wants. This is flatly immoral. If you believe the war can't be won and there's nothing to be gained by staying, then, to paraphrase Sen. John Kerry, you're asking more men to die for a mistake. You should demand withdrawal. But that might cost votes, so the Dems don't. And, of course, Kerry, Pelosi and other Democrats were in favor of more troops before they were against it.

Another Democratic dodge is the incessant demand for a "political solution" in Iraq. "What is absolutely clear to me is there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq, that only political solutions are going to bring about some semblance of peace," Sen. Barack Obama declared. This is either childishly naive or reprehensibly dishonest. No serious person thinks that peace can be secured without a political solution. The question is how to get one. And nobody — and I mean nobody — has made a credible case that the Iraqis can get from A to B without more bloodshed, with or without American support.

Saying we need a political solution is as helpful as saying "give peace a chance." Peace requires more than such pie-eyed verbiage. In the real world, peace has no chance until the people who want to give death squads another shot have been dispatched from the scene. It reminds me of the liberal obsession in the 1980s with getting inner-city gangs to settle their differences with break-dance competitions. If only Muqtada Sadr would moonwalk to peace!

Last night, Bush finally acknowledged what Americans already knew: The war has not gone well. But he also acknowledged what few Democrats are willing to admit: If we leave — i.e. lose — it will be a disaster, a geostrategic calamity for the United States and quite possibly a genocidal one for the Iraqis. It's long since forgotten, but perhaps the chief moral argument against the Iraq war in 2003 was that it would create an enormous humanitarian crisis in the form of refugees spilling over the borders, which in turn would destabilize the region. That didn't happen. But it would be the most likely result of a U.S. withdrawal now. Yet that's a risk the antiwar crowd is suddenly willing to take.

Bush declared last night that "victory will not look like the ones our fathers and grandfathers achieved. There will be no surrender ceremony on the deck of a battleship…. A democratic Iraq will not be perfect." This sober, stubborn emphasis on victory puts Bush at odds with much of official Washington. He wisely refused to abdicate his war responsibilities to lead to the Iraq Study Group, and instead launched a broader effort to find a way to win in Iraq — a goal former Secretary of State James A. Baker III explicitly dismissed.

Bush came up with the "surge" plan. Will it work? Nobody knows. But the one thing the American people know about George W. Bush is that he wants to win the war. What the Democrats believe is anybody's guess.

Democrats Should Give Bush Final Chance To Win Iraq (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

Politically and militarily, this is President Bush's last chance to avoid catastrophe in Iraq and the Democratic Congress ought to let him play out his hand.

Hard as it might be, Democrats should resist extreme pressure from anti-war forces in their base to undermine what little is left of Bush's popular support and force a withdrawal from Iraq.

The reason is that if the United States loses the Iraq War, the consequences will be dire — and a Democratic president elected in 2008 may well have to deal with them.

That president could inherit an Iraq in all-out civil war, regional chaos pitting Sunnis against Shiites and — worst of all — the collapse of American influence and the triumph of radical Islamist forces, Iran in the lead.

Iraq will not be the last theater of combat between radicalism and moderation, but wherever the next confrontation is — in Lebanon, Egypt, Iran or Saudi Arabia — the United States will be at an automatic disadvantage if it loses in Iraq.

It will be all the worse if the U.S. loses because Osama bin Laden is proved right in saying that the United States lacks the tenacity for any long and difficult struggle.

So, if there is any chance that the Bush administration can succeed in bringing security to the blood-soaked neighborhoods of Baghdad and in suppressing the Sunni insurgency in Anbar province, it ought to be given a last try.

There is certainly no guarantee that Bush's new strategy will work, especially given past failures. In fact, it is easy to list the reasons why we might fail again.

At the top of the list is the inability or unwillingness — so far — of Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government to stop Shiite death squads from torturing and killing Sunnis and to offer the political concessions necessary to dampen the non-al-Qaida Sunni insurgency.

Responsible Democrats — those who don't just want to abandon the Iraq enterprise regardless of the consequences — contend that the only way to force al-Maliki to act is to establish a withdrawal timetable.

Bush does not want to do that because it will give notice to America's enemies that they can just wait for U.S. forces to leave to resume a full-force insurgency.

But Bush needs to tell al-Maliki, if he doesn't understand it already, that time is running very short. Administration officials say they think they have until this fall — nine months or so — to show results.

This strikes me as optimistic. The bottom is dropping out of U.S. support for the war — fast. And the pressure is mounting on Democrats to pull the plug. The latest Gallup Poll showed that the public opposes Bush's troop increase by 61 percent to 37 percent. Eighty-five percent of Democrats oppose it.

Only 15 percent favored immediate withdrawal, but 39 percent more wanted U.S. troops out within a year, while only 31 percent supported their staying as long as needed and 12 percent favored adding more troops.

Administration officials say that al-Maliki is aware of what's expected of him — and by when — and that he is working on diminishing the influence of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, controlling his militias and compromising with Sunnis. Everything depends on his acting fast, however.

Another reason to be pessimistic is that, whenever Iraqi forces have been asked to "stand up" to the challenge of securing Baghdad, they've largely failed.

Bush told Members of Congress on Tuesday that he believed two previous Baghdad security operations failed, both because the U.S. had too few troops and because Iraqis could not hold neighborhoods that had been cleared of extremists.

Now, Bush is adding 15,000 U.S. troops to Baghdad and al-Maliki is supposedly supplying an equal number of his best forces, the first of which are to arrive by Feb. 1.

This is do or die. If the operation begins to show promise, it could turn around both Iraqi and U.S. public opinion. But if reports are that Americans are fighting and dying, but Iraqis aren't, demands for withdrawal will become irresistible.

It also remains to be seen whether even U.S. forces can perform this counter-insurgency mission successfully. The new U.S. commanding general in Iraq, David Petraeus, is an expert on such combat and has a record of success in previous Iraq tours.

The U.S. Army's new counter-insurgency manual, written under Petraeus' supervision, declares that "the military forces that successfully defeat insurgencies are usually those able to overcome their institutional inclination to wage conventional war" and instead protect and win support from the local populace.

It remains a question whether U.S. units will be numerous enough — and well-trained enough — to perform the mission. It's appropriate for Congress to inquire about that — and make sure training is adequate for counter-insurgency operations in the future. There will be more.

Democrats have every right and responsibility to ask hard questions about Bush's strategy and to advocate alternatives — such as moving U.S. troops out of populated areas to guard Iraq's borders and oil wells, leaving urban combat to the Iraqis.

At the moment, that does not seem to be a viable strategy, given the deficiencies of Iraqi forces, but it could be a transition role when and if the Iraqis can take charge of the cities.

If they can't or won't — and if al-Maliki can't or won't reach accommodation with the Sunnis — the U.S. may have to consider yet another alternative: the "80 percent solution," in which we back the likely winners of a civil war in Iraq, the Shiites and Kurds.

This would not be a desirable conclusion — one advocate calls it "winning dirty" — but it may be the only alternative to losing Iraq, the region and U.S. influence in the world.

Now that they have taken over Congress, Democrats have a responsibility to do more than simply oppose Bush and his policies. If there is any possibility that the United States and its interests can still succeed in Iraq, they need to help it happen.

It's very possible that America will fail. If so, Democrats should give no one the opportunity to say that they precipitated it.

Take The Lead (WT)

By Terry Michael

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

It's hard to get out of a deal with the devil.

That's the congressional Democrats' dilemma, as they continue to treat the Iraq war as a speed bump on their pathway to the perks of restored power, rather than as a moral question to which voters loudly demanded a moral answer two months ago.

Take Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware. "There's not much I can do about it," responded the Democratic "leader" on foreign policy, when asked on one of the Sunday venues for pompous pontificators how he would respond to any attempt by President Bush to escalate the war in Iraq (or "surge," if you prefer it in Orwellian newspeak).

This is a man who sees a future president during his morning look in the mirror. Sadly, the glass reflects an empty suit who embodies the congressional Democrats' decision to reduce action on Iraq to a political calculus appropriate for the highway appropriations bill, rather than as a moral imperative to challenge a policy that has sent thousands of twenty-somethings to their deaths in the desert.

You certainly can do something about it, Senator. It's called leadership. You rise on the Senate floor. You say you were out of your mind to write a blank check for this hideous misprojection of American military power. And then you propose immediate withdrawal, just slow enough to maximize the safety of the 135,000 mostly young men and women you helped put in harm's way by your collusion with this elective war. You do what Republican Sen. Gordon Smith of Oregon had the guts to do last month, stopping just short of accurately labeling this public policy obscenity a criminal enterprise.

I have lived in these 10 surreal square miles for over three decades, usually playing by the rules of decorum required by the political and media classes, first as a young congressional aide, later as a national party committee and presidential campaign operative, and now as an aging educator of journalism students who want to spend their careers interpreting politics.

But, like millions of other Americans, I can no longer contain the primal scream I want to direct at the members of my party who declined to engage a real debate in the run-up to this completely avoidable misjudgment of old men and women, willing to send boys and girls to die for their ideological hallucinations and political cowardice.

Non-existent, and certainly non-threatening WMDs. A secularist paper-tiger dictator, despised by the Islamist lunatics who actually had anything to do with September 11. A tribal, theocratic culture with zero indigenous movement for pluralistic democracy.

All of those things were knowable when congressional Democrats like Mr. Biden had an opportunity to stop this madness before it started. Some of them actually shared the neoconservative pretensions of a new American imperialism. But most just quaked in their permanent campaign boots, fearing being labeled Cold War-style liberal wimps. They averted their eyes and closed their mouths instead of acting like a responsible opposition party four years ago.

So, trying to finesse their way out of their Faustian bargain, Democrats now engage in a transparent antiwar vamp, with limp proposals to implement the September 11 commission report and half-measures opposing escalation. And they receive aid and comfort from misguided and timid editorial pages, like those of The Washington Post and The New York Times, which also colluded with power in the run-up to Iraq instead of challenging it, and which now circumscribe discourse with the narrow frame of how best to muddle on through rather than promote an honest debate about whether to stay or go.

Where are the Gordon Smith's in the Democratic Party? Where are the conviction politicians willing to spend political capital to lead a citizenry which has decided overwhelmingly that this war is crazy? Where are the institutions of media power with the courage to say the emperor has no cowboy boots, no jeans, no garments at all — just a hideous, stubborn smirk that is literally making this country ill and squandering our reputation around the globe?

I long for a principled politician like my ex-boss Paul Simon, who would have had the courage and the moral authority to take the Senate floor and demand an end to this madness. Instead, the only place I can find truth speaking to power is on a cable TV comedy channel, not in the chambers of what used to be called the greatest deliberative body in the world. Is anybody out there willing to lead?

To Counter Iran's Role In Iraq, Bush Moves Beyond Diplomacy (NYT)

By Helene Cooper, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — In promising to stop Iran from meddling in Iraq, President Bush returned Wednesday night to a strategy of confrontation in dealing with Tehran, casting aside what had been a limited flirtation with a more diplomatic approach toward it.

Mr. Bush accused Iran of providing material support for attacks on American troops and vowed to respond. "We will disrupt the attacks on our forces," he said in his speech. "We will seek out and destroy the networks providing advanced weaponry and training to our enemies in Iraq."

Mr. Bush said the United States would send another aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to the Persian Gulf. Administration officials said the battle group would be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran, a response to the growing concern that Iran is building up its own missile capacity and naval power, with the goal of military dominance in the gulf.

Mr. Bush also announced the deployment of Patriot missiles to protect America's gulf allies. A battery of such missiles is already in Qatar, having been moved there several months ago.

The more combative talk reflects increased frustration in the administration with Iran, which American officials blame for part of the rising death toll in Iraq.

Military officials in Baghdad say they have documented a gradual rise in the number of sophisticated roadside bombs using "shaped charges" — a type of weapon that commanders believe is imported from Iran. According to military statistics, 78 coalition troops were killed and 243 were wounded by these bombs between September and December of last year, compared with 53 killed by the bombs in the previous nine months.

American officials have provided members of Congress information to support the claim that Iran is helping to orchestrate attacks on Americans in Iraq, but the administration has not made that information public.

The American officials say that the Revolutionary Guard's Quds force trains inside Iran and then dispatches operatives into Iraq, using contacts with Iraqi Shiite militias to attack American troops.

"They're training to kill coalition forces," said one senior American counterterrorism official, speaking on condition of anonymity. "Their comments about wanting to see a stable Iraq are belied by this type of activity."

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, told Congress late last year that while he was originally skeptical of reports of Iranian operations inside Iraq, he now had the "zeal of a convert" on the matter.

One American official who recently returned from a trip to Baghdad said American commanders in Iraq believed that Iran was using its vast political influence to press Shiite politicians not to forge any long-term agreements with Sunnis.

"We caught them with their finger in the cookie jar last month," a senior administration official said, referring to the arrest of five Iranians in Iraq whom the Americans accused of running guns and planning sectarian attacks. The Iranians were eventually released by Iraqi authorities.

American officials maintain that the latest moves should not be seen as preparations for a military strike against Iran. But they also said that Mr. Bush's top deputies, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, had decided that, barring some major conciliatory move from Tehran, American moves to engage Iran had run their course.

The United States has grown frustrated with what one administration official described as the "molasseslike" pace of diplomatic efforts at the United Nations to impose broad sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

The Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 with sanctions intended to curb Iran's uranium enrichment program, which Iran says is for peaceful purposes but the United States and some European nations contend is for the purpose of creating nuclear arms. The measure bars the trade of goods or technology related to Iran's nuclear program.

But American officials acknowledge that the resolution is too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear program and are seeking to increase economic and psychological pressure on Iran. The United States is pressing governments and financial institutions in Europe, Japan and China to cut some of their financial ties with Iran.

For instance, during talks in Washington last week between Ms. Rice and visiting Vice Foreign Minister Yang Jiechi of China, American officials urged Beijing to abandon a proposal for a $16 billion natural gas deal for the China National Offshore Oil Corporation to develop Iran's North Pars gas field, American officials said. The Chinese assured the United States that a decision was not imminent, American officials said.

Mr. Bush is expected to seek to apply pressure to other countries to limit their dealings with Iran in the coming month. American officials are hoping that the economic pressure will also persuade Iran not to actively oppose the new Bush strategy in Iraq.

Iraq PM Cracks Down In Shiite Militiamen (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, January 11, 2007

Iraq's prime minister has told Shiite militiamen to surrender their weapons or face an all-out assault, part of a commitment President Bush outlined on Wednesday to bring violence under control with a more aggressive Iraqi Army and 21,500 additional American troops.

Senior Iraqi officials said Wednesday that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, under pressure from the U.S., has agreed to crack down on the fighters even though they are loyal to his most powerful political ally, the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Previously, al-Maliki had resisted the move.

Bush laid out his new plan to quell violence in and around the Iraqi capital in a televised address to the nation Wednesday night. In earlier operations, the president said, "political and sectarian interference prevented Iraqi and American forces from going into neighborhoods that are home to those fueling the sectarian violence.

"This time, Iraqi and American forces will have a green light to enter those neighborhoods," Bush said. "Prime Minister Maliki has pledged that political or sectarian interference will not be tolerated."

Before Bush spoke, a senior Shiite legislator and close al-Maliki adviser said the prime minister had warned that no militias would be spared in the crackdown.

"The government has told the Sadrists: 'If we want to build a state we have no other choice but to attack armed groups,'" said the legislator, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the prime minister.

DOJ_NMG_0115436

Bush warned that the U.S. expected al-Maliki to keep those promises.

"America's commitment is not open-ended," Bush said. "If the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people and it will lose the support of the Iraqi people."

Al-Maliki on Saturday announced that his government would implement a new security plan for Baghdad, which consists of neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweeps by Iraqi forces backed by U.S. troops.

In the past, the Iraqi government has tried to prevent American military operations against the Mahdi Army, while giving U.S. forces a free hand against Sunni militants. The Bush administration has pushed al-Maliki, who took office in May, to curb his militia allies or allow U.S. troops to do the job.

Although al-Maliki withdrew political protection from the Mahdi Army, there was no guarantee the Shiite fighters would be easily routed from the large and growing area of Baghdad under their control.

The militia has more fighters, weapons and sophistication today than it did in 2004, when it battled U.S. forces to a standstill in two strongholds, the Shiite holy city of Najaf and Sadr City, Baghdad's sprawling Shiite slum.

Sunni militants, meanwhile, have put up fierce resistance in the five days since al-Maliki announced his new security initiative for Baghdad.

Iraqi and U.S. troops have battled Sunni insurgents along Haifa Street in central Baghdad in two major battles.

The neighborhood is only about 2 1/2 miles north of the Green Zone, site of the Iraqi government headquarters, the U.S. Embassy and base for thousands of American soldiers.

Eighty suspected insurgents were killed in the fighting — 50 of them on Tuesday alone, in an assault backed by U.S. troops, fighter jets and attack helicopters.

Bush said the U.S. will send 21,500 more troops — 17,500 of them to help pacify Baghdad,

The increase in troop levels was part of a larger military and economic effort intended to turn around a 3 1/2-year-old war that has cost the U.S. hundreds of billions of dollars and more than 3,000 lives.

In preparation for the new security plan, the Iraqi military will bring two brigades from northern Iraq, a region largely populated by Kurds, and one from the south.

Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died, many of them in the capital in the past year — after the war became a religious conflict between Sunnis and Shiites. Sectarian violence began after the February bombing of a major Shiite shrine by al-Qaida in Iraq.

Al-Maliki has not commented on the Bush administration's plans to create a set of benchmarks to measure the Iraqi government's progress on improving security.

Washington wants the prime minister to come up with a plan to equitably share the country's oil wealth, ease restrictions on former Baath Party members and hold provincial elections — steps regarded as critically important to drawing Sunnis into the political process.

An Iraqi general, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to disclose details of the plan, said a mainly Kurdish force would be sent into the Sadr City slum in northeast Baghdad, which serves as headquarters of the Mahdi Army.

The general said Kurds, who are Sunni but not Arab, were being used against the Shiite militia because soldiers from other Iraqi units were likely to refuse to fight fellow Shiites. An estimated 80 percent of Iraq's army is Shiite.

Under the new security plan, the general said, U.S. and Iraqi troops will sweep Baghdad neighborhoods in an effort to dislodge the Mahdi Army, as well as Sunni extremists — including al-Qaida in Iraq and two of its allied groups, the Ansar al-Sunnah Army and the Omar Brigade.

Iraqi and U.S. officials said Iraqi commanders will be put in charge of each of nine city districts. Each commander will operate independently of Iraqi military headquarters.

Al-Maliki has named Lt. Gen. Aboud Gambar, an Iraqi general who was taken prisoner of war by U.S. forces during the 1991 Gulf war, as the overall commander.

Gambar, a Shiite, will have two assistants, one from the police and one from the army, Iraqi military officers said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to disclose the information. Gambar will report directly to al-Maliki.

The Americans plan to put 400 to 600 U.S. soldiers in each district as a backup force, a senior Bush administration official said Wednesday. Others will be held in reserve throughout the capital to deploy quickly on the request of Iraqi commanders.

One senior U.S. official said al-Maliki agreed to stop protecting the Mahdi Army under pressure from both the U.S. and his fellow Iraqis. In a conference call with U.S. reporters, the official said the al-Maliki "plan will work" because it frees his military from political and sectarian influence.

The latest drive to pacify Baghdad is at least the fourth since the war began. All have had only limited success, with insurgents and militants swiftly returning to neighborhoods after U.S. and Iraqi military forces departed.

DOJ_NMG_0115437

In the most recent of these operations, Iraq's army fielded fewer troops than promised. That made it impossible to maintain control of areas that U.S. forces had cleared of gunmen.

Police on Wednesday reported that at least 92 people had died violently or been found dead across the country.

In a single deadly attack, Sunni gunmen opened fire on a convoy of buses carrying Shiite Muslim pilgrims home from the hajj, the annual pilgrimage to Muslim holy places in Saudi Arabia, according to police and Akeel al-Khazaali, the governor of the southern province of Karbala.

At least 11 people were killed and 14 wounded. Al-Khazaali told Iraqi state television that some of the slain pilgrims had been severely burned in the ambush, which occurred about 75 miles west of the Shiite holy city of Karbala.

Police said 60 bodies, many of them victims of torture, were found in Baghdad Wednesday. Seven more were discovered in the northern city of Mosul. Shootings, mortar attacks and bombings at various places around Iraq claimed another 14 lives.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday that four more American soldiers died of combat wounds in Iraq. A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division died Tuesday from a gunshot wound sustained in the Diyala province northeast of Baghdad.

Two more soldiers died the same day in Iraq's western Anbar province. One was assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group, and one was assigned to 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division.

A 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) Soldier was killed by a roadside bomb outside of Fallujah.

New Baghdad Approach Features 'Gated Communities' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The military's new strategy for Iraq envisions creating so-called "gated communities" in Baghdad -- sealing off discrete areas and forcibly removing insurgents, then working to create jobs for residents and stationing American units in the neighborhood to keep the peace.

The United States previously has found it nearly impossible to secure the sprawling city. But by focusing an increased number of troops in selected neighborhoods, the military hopes it can create islands of security segregated from the chaos.

The gated-communities plan has been tried -- with mixed success -- in other wars. In Vietnam, they were called "strategic hamlets" and were a spectacular failure. But counterinsurgency experts say that such security zones can work if, once the barriers are established, the military follows up with neighborhood sweeps designed to flush out insurgents and militia fighters.

The strategy, described in broad terms by current and former defense officials, is an attempt to recreate the successes that military units have had in smaller Iraqi cities, most notably Tall Afar.

For the past two years, the U.S. military has been focused primarily on training Iraqi security forces. Under the new plan in Baghdad, the primary mission of U.S. combat forces will be to protect Iraqis living in the city.

"In counterinsurgency, by now we have all figured out, the population is the prize," one defense official said.

Critics of the troop increase have said that the sheer size of Baghdad, with its population of nearly 6 million people, makes it impossible to replicate the Tall Afar strategy. But counterinsurgency experts say the gated-communities concept is a way to concentrate troops on smaller sections of Baghdad.

"You do it neighborhood by neighborhood," the defense official said.

A neighborhood of Baghdad could be sealed off by using a highway or a river as a barrier, or creating roadblocks and checkpoints between neighborhoods, counterinsurgency experts said.

White House officials outlined a plan Wednesday to divide Baghdad into nine districts and to station U.S. battalions and Iraqi forces in each. Moving units out of the super bases that surround Baghdad and into urban neighborhoods is critical to making any gated-communities plan work, defense officials said.

Senior administration officials have said that the new plan would be led by Iraqis. But the intense violence gripping Baghdad will require that American units be used to quiet the fighting initially.

In Tall Afar, a town of 150,000 people, U.S. forces built a berm around the city to control access, then swept through to rout insurgents and al-Qaida members. The military followed up by establishing combat outposts throughout the city where small units of soldiers could have a round-the-clock neighborhood presence. The offensive was combined with a push by military leaders to reconcile Shiite and Sunni factions in the city.

Ideally, once a neighborhood is cleared and regular patrols begin, U.S. forces would have to fight less. Advocates of the approach say that gated communities will allow the U.S. and Iraqi militaries to ease Iraqis' fears of being victims of sectarian violence.

"You can create gated communities because the population wants them, because the population wants to feel secure," the defense official said. "Or you can create them to control the population and its movements, and make it more difficult for insurgents to operate. That is the theory behind it."

It is not clear which Baghdad neighborhoods will become gated communities, or how many such enclaves will be created. So far, the Iraqi government has largely restricted operations in Shiite neighborhoods. Defense officials say it is critical that the new plan allow U.S. forces to operate in both Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods.

The gated-communities model is an updated version of the strategic hamlets used in the Vietnam War. Under that strategy, people were moved to villages that the military believed it could defend.

"It didn't work," said Conrad Crane, one of the authors of the military's counterinsurgency manual. "They ended up locking up the insurgents with the population in these new hamlets .... It actually helped the Viet Cong with recruiting."

The strategy worked when the British used it in Malaya in the 1950s, successfully cutting off insurgents from the population and from supplies, Crane said. The technique was first developed by the French when fighting insurgents in Algiers, and it was successfully used in Northern Ireland cities, said Marine Lt. Col. Lance A. McDaniel, another author of the military counterinsurgency manual.

In Iraq, Crane said, the strategy could work because it would not involve moving people out of their neighborhoods.

"It would be done with much more cultural sensitivity," Crane said. "You are trying to identify who belongs and who doesn't."

Keeping U.S. forces inside the communities is vital to the success of such strategies, McDaniel said.

"You have a unit which has responsibility for an area and they are doing active patrolling day and night with the Iraqi security forces," he said. "People get to know you. It is a lot different than holing up in a base somewhere and going through a few times a day."

Counterinsurgency experts said that, once U.S. and Iraqi forces succeeded in holding an area, they could use reconstruction money to create jobs for citizens there. The hope is that, with improved stability and jobs programs, the zone of security could expand throughout Baghdad.

A Diplomat Who Loves The Really Tough Jobs (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

In Harm's Way Is Where Ryan Crocker Thrives

On April 18, 1983, Ryan Crocker was in his office at the U.S. Embassy in Beirut, with its spectacular view overlooking the Mediterranean. His wife, Christine, was working next door. At 1:05 p.m. a dark delivery van made a sharp left onto the guarded cobblestone lane and rammed into the front wall, detonating an explosive that ripped apart the seven-story high-rise. A huge brown cloud of smoke could be seen for miles.

It was the first suicide bombing by Islamic extremists against a U.S. target.

Crocker -- the career diplomat the Bush administration has nominated to serve as U.S. ambassador in Baghdad -- was blown against the wall. Bloodied but not seriously injured, he and his wife fled the building. He then began to search through the twisted steel and concrete for colleagues.

New York Times correspondent Thomas Friedman lived nearby and raced to the site. "I came around the corner and there was the American Embassy cut in half like a doll's house, bodies hanging out of it, smoke belching, and the first person I saw staggering around in the ruins was Ryan, his sleeves rolled up, looking in the rubble," Friedman recalls.

The bomb, which killed 64 and wiped out the CIA station, marked the start of a trend that now defines U.S. foreign policy.

If there's an awful assignment in the Middle East or South Asia, Crocker, 57, has had it. He actually prefers the hot spots, colleagues say.

The toughest hardship assignment for Crocker -- and the only one he tries to avoid -- is Washington, says former ambassador Edward Abington. "He prefers the most difficult posts. There's a real sense of adventure in him," Abington says.

Seven months before the Beirut attack, I encountered Crocker after a right-wing Christian militia entered the Beirut slums of Sabra and Shatila and, in a 48-hour orgy of killing, murdered some 800 people, including many women, children and the elderly. Journalists were among the first to go into the area after the militia left, but when many of us arrived, Crocker and his wife were already surveying the bloodshed and streets littered with bodies.

"With a hand-held transmitter, he was walking through the Shatila refugee camp and describing as he moved scenes of a massacre of shocking magnitude," wrote former secretary of state George Shultz in his autobiography, "Turmoil and Triumph."

The massacre followed the assassination of Lebanon's Christian President-elect Bashir Gemayel.

DOJ_NMG_0115439

"I was on the phone with him for hours trying to confirm whether or not Gemayel was dead," recalls former U.S. assistant secretary of state Elizabeth Jones. "We had been burned with the [former Egyptian president Anwar] Sadat assassination, so we had to have someone see the body or say that he was still alive."

Crocker was dispatched. "He's extremely tough-minded about what needs to be done even in the worst tragedy," Jones says.

He now appears headed to Baghdad as part of a personnel sweep that is bringing a whole new set of faces to the top of diplomatic and military jobs as part of President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq.

For Crocker, an Air Force officer's son who attended schools in Morocco, Turkey and Canada, it's coming full circle.

He first went to Baghdad as a young economic officer, a year before Saddam Hussein seized power in 1979. Baghdad had broken off relations with Washington, so the United States had an interest section. U.S. diplomats were under 24-hour surveillance and banned from leaving Baghdad without government permission.

"It was very difficult to make contact with Iraqis, as it was so dangerous for them," says Jones, who was posted in Baghdad as political officer. "Saddam executed most of his first cabinet, so we already knew what a difficult person we were dealing with. . . . Ryan was the best at triangulating the situation and figuring out what was happening."

Iraq then invaded Iran in 1980, setting off the bloodiest and longest modern Middle East war. Crocker and Jones had to evacuate Americans, but stay themselves.

Crocker met and married his wife, Christine, a foreign service secretary, in Baghdad. The two have been inseparable ever since, colleagues say.

Almost a quarter-century later, Crocker was one of the most significant voices inside the administration about the dangers of invading Iraq.

In late 2002, as the Bush administration prepared for war, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell tasked Crocker and Assistant Secretary of State William Burns with exploring the risks of military intervention. The result was a six-page memo they entitled "The Perfect Storm," according to an account in Washington Post reporter Karen DeYoung's biography "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell."

The memo bluntly predicted that toppling Hussein could unleash long-repressed sectarian and ethnic tensions, that the Sunni minority would not easily relinquish power, and that powerful neighbors such as Iran, Syria and Saudi Arabia would try to move in to influence events. It also cautioned that the United States would have to start from scratch building a political and economic system because Iraq's infrastructure was in tatters.

Crocker returned to Iraq after the 2003 U.S. invasion to help during the transition and the creation of the Coalition Provisional Authority. He left that July, a time when he and colleagues could still drive to farewell meetings in the capital in unarmored vans.

The night before he left, Jalal Talabani, the Kurdish leader who is now Iraq's president, threw a large and raucous party for Crocker, who told colleagues in frustration that he was returning to Washington to teach at National Defense University for a year and then retire.

"He has often been critical of policies he has been charged with implementing and had little success in persuading the political leadership to change," says a former colleague who requested anonymity in light of the new appointment.

Iraq will be his fifth embassy as ambassador -- sixth if you count reopening the embassy in Afghanistan after the United States ousted the Taliban in 2001. He also was the top U.S. envoy in Lebanon (again), Syria, Pakistan and Kuwait. Each has involved personal danger or crisis.

In 1998, during a U.S. bombing campaign on Iraq, Syrian mobs attacked the U.S. ambassador's residence in Damascus. Christine Crocker fled into a vaulted safe-room in the residence as rioters ransacked the building. Jones remembers talking to Christine on a line that connected directly to Washington from the residence and on a separate phone to Ryan, who had raced home to help his wife but was stuck outside. The place was so badly trashed that they had to move out.

Though President Bush gave him the State Department's most prestigious title of "career ambassador" in 2004, Crocker is little known outside diplomatic circles and intensely private -- a stark contrast to the flamboyant and media-ready current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad. Crocker is also an unassuming diplomat in a profession known for its dapper suits and fancy dress.

He drove a pickup truck in Washington, and Crocker coined the term "no socks required" to describe attire at parties he and his wife host.

David Mack, a retired diplomat who served with Crocker in Iraq and Lebanon, still remembers dinners of "cold Spam and peas eaten with crackers" when he stayed at the Crockers' Beirut apartment.

A Red Sox fanatic, Crocker favors heavy metal and hard-rock jam groups, including Iron Maiden and Black Crowes, colleagues say.

DOJ_NMG_0115440

Crocker gets through most of his tough assignments by running. The day before the embassy blew up in Beirut in 1983, he ran in the first -- and some say only -- marathon held in Lebanon. Mack, now vice president of the Middle East Institute, recalls how Crocker took him out running along Beirut's seafront Corniche, during the middle of the civil war.

Crocker has now run in marathons on four continents, including a 50-kilometer race in Jordan. He also ran a 10-kilometer uphill race to the top of Mount Hermon in the Golan Heights that was particularly painful, he told colleagues. As a young foreign service officer learning Arabic, he had to take a field trip to use the language, and he chose to live with a Bedouin tribe of sheepherders in Jordan. He made that choice so he could run, according to Frederic C. Hof, who still remembers Crocker's field report.

In his current post in Pakistan, Crocker still regularly runs, often exhorting members of the embassy staff to join him. "His idea of unwinding is running 10 miles with security guys behind him in a four-wheel drive trying to keep up," says retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, who has known Crocker for years and recently visited him in Pakistan. Crocker's favorite run is from outside Islamabad to the border of the Northwest Frontier Province.

During the few times he lived in Washington, Crocker ran most days from Alexandria to the State Department, his clothes in a backpack.

Friends say they can always tell when he's worried about something because he runs longer and harder, getting rail thin in the process.

Crocker is the first career foreign service officer and Arabist to take the Baghdad job, which may put him at a disadvantage in persuading the administration on policy. The three previous U.S. envoys -- Khalilzad, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte and Coalition Provisional Authority chief L. Paul Bremer -- had all been political appointees who had a direct line into the White House.

"It's going to be a terrible job," says former ambassador to Lebanon Robert Dillon, who was also in the embassy when it blew up. "As a career guy, he's going to be under a lot of pressure and I'm not sure how much support he'll get in Washington."

But diplomats and military officers who have served with him say Crocker, who knows Iraq's tribes as well as its Arabic dialect, was the only realistic choice to deal with the country's labyrinthine politics.

Says Abington, "To the extent anyone can make a difference there, Ryan will."

New US Team In Iraq: Seasoned, But How Tough? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

Bush's military and diplomatic picks have less ideological bent.

As a US diplomat in Lebanon in 1983, Ryan Crocker survived an embassy bombing that revealed America's exposure to a festering civil war - and portended the deepening Middle East divides to come.

Now Mr. Crocker, the US ambassador to Pakistan, has been tapped by President Bush to join a reshuffled diplomatic and military "Team Iraq." It's an assignment for which a deep knowledge of the political and cultural complexities at play, both in Iraq and regionally, will be a huge plus.

Crocker - who is part of the crucial policymaker portion of the new Iraq strategy that Mr. Bush is scheduled to announce Wednesday night - would become the top US diplomat in Iraq as ambassador in Baghdad. As such, he would join a new team whose goal will be to stave off full-blown civil war in Iraq, as well as the disastrous regional and security consequences that would be very likely to accompany it.

The team that Bush has freshly assembled, spanning the State Department and the Pentagon, has nothing of the sharp ideological bent that both got the Bush administration's Iraq policy in trouble in the first place and kept it from seeing the policy mistakes that were made, experts say.

But some look beyond the steely professionalism and impressive records of the team members and wonder who among them will play the "bad cop" with the Iraqis - in other words, who will require the political decisions that these experts say will determine whether Iraq can be salvaged or not.

"This is a team of people in their careers 20 to 30 years. They aren't driven by ideology, and they know their stuff," says Edward Walker, a former assistant secretary of State for Near Eastern affairs. "But somebody is going to have to be the tough guy and tell the Iraqis there is no more free ride."

Comparing the place the United States is in now with the war and ethnic cleansing it faced in Bosnia in the 1990s, Ambassador Walker says, "In that mix, you had Richard Holbrooke [former US ambassador to the United Nations], a tough guy who knocked heads together and got the Dayton peace accords. I don't see that player on this team."

Other key shifts in Bush's Iraq team include:

DOJ_NMG_0115441

· Returning John Negroponte, who has been director of national intelligence, to the State Department to shoulder the Iraq effort as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. This would free her up to dedicate more time to the broader Middle East.

· Putting Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, a counterinsurgency expert and advocate of deploying more troops in Iraq for a broader security role, in charge of coalition forces in Iraq.

· Nominating Mike McConnell, a retired vice admiral with 25 years of intelligence experience, as director of national intelligence to replace Mr. Negroponte.

· Choosing Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador to Iraq, to replace John Bolton as US ambassador to the UN. Shift began with Rumsfeld's exit

The shifting of policymakers actually started last November with the replacement of Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense by former CIA Director Robert Gates. Mr. Rumsfeld's views, which held that a light US footprint would be enough to husband the transition to a stable and democratic Iraq, did not fit with Bush's conclusion that more troops would be needed to secure Baghdad and give the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki a chance to succeed.

In a sense, the departure of Rumsfeld was like the changing of the guard at the White House information and influence gate: Advocates of what was to become the president's "way forward" suddenly had better access to Bush.

"The centerpiece [of our military strategy in Iraq] has always been 'develop the Iraqi Security Forces' - not 'defeat the insurgency,' " says retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, an advocate of a large and sustained troop increase.

Now a consultant who has prepared annual assessments of Iraq security for the Pentagon, General Keane met with Bush in mid-December to discuss a revised strategy. His visit exemplified how the White House became more accessible to war-escalation advocates after Rumsfeld's departure.

Key to the policy shift was the naming of General Petraeus as senior US commander in Iraq. The guiding force behind the military's new counterinsurgency manual, Petraeus has long differed with the emphasis on training Iraqi forces over providing civilian security.

He is "the most qualified general officer we have to undertake this change in Iraq strategy," says Keane.

In Iraq during the invasion as leader of the 101st Airborne Division, Petraeus made known his concerns about the rioting and lawlessness that was allowed to boil over in Baghdad after the ouster of Saddam Hussein. He later voiced worry about the security impact of disbanding the Iraqi Army.

Those concerns dovetailed with the thinking of Crocker, who was in charge of governance issues in Baghdad for several months after the invasion. Bush's new approach to Joint Chiefs

Until recently, Bush had been deferential to the positions of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, practically making a mantra of saying he adhered to the judgments of his top generals in making military decisions. But the Iraq team reshuffle is evidence that the president is no longer wedded to that approach if it means sticking with policies that clash with his vision.

"The president has retaken control of Iraq strategy," says Frederick Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington and prominent advocate of a large troop increase. "The administration has made itself more independent of the generals."

Independent of the generals, maybe, but still largely dependent on what the Iraqi leadership does. And that means influencing the Iraqi government will be one of the new Iraq team's biggest tests, experts say.

Negroponte and Crocker are "two consummate diplomats," says Mr. Walker, who is an adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington, "but maybe too consummate. Neither one is confrontational."

Crocker will be taking the reins of US diplomacy in Baghdad after more than two years in Islamabad - another key US partner in the battle with Islamic extremism.

But the American relationship with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf mirrors the prevailing approach to Mr. Maliki, analysts say, in that the US has not been ready to force either to take the hard steps it would like to see - that is, Mr. Musharraf confronting the Islamist extremists active on the border with Afghanistan, or Maliki disbanding Iraq's militias and pushing through key political decisions like constitutional reforms and oil-revenue legislation.

Crocker, who prefers foreign assignments and has studiously avoided any major policymaking stints in Washington, will be following orders from Washington. Many eyes will be watching for whether the order to "get tough" comes down.

"The administration hasn't been ready to abandon [Musharraf] in that he is the only thing standing between us and an explosive situation in Pakistan that would hurt us," says Walker. "The situation with Maliki is analogous, but I'm not sure this Iraq team is any more prepared to say, 'We're not going over the cliff with you.' "

Violence Claims 99 Iraqis, 3 U.S. Troops (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

BAGHDAD — Suicide bombers, roadside explosions and mortar rounds killed at least 99 Iraqis and wounded 26 across the country Wednesday. The U.S. military said three American troops had been killed in Al Anbar province Tuesday.

In downtown Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi troops continued to search for suspected guerrillas in the largely Sunni Arab Haifa Street neighborhood, making 15 arrests in the second day of an offensive, Iraqi officials said. The assault was launched Monday on fighters who had taken control of the three-mile stretch near the heavily fortified Green Zone, home to the Iraqi government complex and the U.S. Embassy.

A Ministry of Defense official said raids and searches had concluded Wednesday afternoon. Iraqi troops found four bodies in rubble, apparent casualties of Tuesday's fighting in which at least 51 suspected militants were reported killed.

Despite the central Baghdad crackdown, 50 bodies were found in a neighborhood near Haifa Street. Ten more 10 corpses were discovered across the Tigris River in the Rusafa neighborhood. All appeared to have been shot execution-style, Iraqi officials said.

Elsewhere in the downtown area, a bomb blast injured two people. A second bomb damaged water pipes near the Sadr City neighborhood, cutting off supplies to parts of the mostly Shiite Muslim district. Three people were injured by a third blast. The night before, a family of four was killed by a mortar round in Sadr City.

Four mortar rounds struck a house in east Baghdad on Wednesday, killing two people and injuring two.

In Mahmoudiya, south of the capital, two car bombs destroyed a gas station, killing one person and injuring three, not far from where the city council was meeting, Iraqi officials said.

Gunmen attacked a caravan of Shiite pilgrims heading toward the southern city of Karbala, killing 11 and injuring four.

In the north, a suicide car bomber detonated his explosives close to a convoy carrying the mayor of Tall Afar, killing one person and injuring three police officers, Iraqi officials said. The mayor survived.

In downtown Tall Afar, a suicide bomber wearing a vest packed with explosives killed four people and injured a dozen. In Mosul, police recovered three bodies from various neighborhoods.

In Babil, south of Baghdad, authorities recovered five bodies.

Near the Syrian border in Al Anbar province, four bodies were found. All bore signs of torture.

In Diyala province, where 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops have engaged in a weeklong offensive, forces recovered caches containing 1,172 Katyusha rockets, 1,039 rocket-propelled grenades and 171 missiles, among other weapons. U.S. commanders said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have swept through more than 124 square miles of farmland and palm groves, zeroing in on tunnels and canals that were the scene of fierce fighting in November.

12 Die In Attack On Shiite Pilgrims In West (WP)

More Than 70 People Slain or Found Dead in Baghdad; Two Added to U.S. Toll

BAGHDAD, Jan. 10 -- Two busloads of Shiite Muslims returning from their holy pilgrimage to Mecca were gunned down Wednesday while passing through a predominantly Sunni Muslim swath of western Iraq, news services reported.

The attack on the convoy of pilgrims, who were returning to their homes in southern Iraq from the hajj in Saudi Arabia, killed 12 people and wounded 18, Iraqi state television said. Insurgents have frequently targeted travelers on the highways through the barren desert of western Iraq.

In Iraq's capital, 11 people were killed by bombings in the areas of Palestine Street, Waziriya and New Baghdad, among others, and police patrols found 60 bodies west of the Tigris River, according to Brig. Sadoun Abdul Karim of the Interior Ministry.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of two U.S. servicemen -- a soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group and a soldier with the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division -- who were involved in operations in Anbar province on Tuesday.

Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, traveled Wednesday to the holy city of Najaf in southern Iraq to meet with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the revered Shiite cleric who wields considerable influence in Iraqi politics. Rubaie told reporters that he briefed Sistani on Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new security plan for the capital, and he suggested that Sistani was receptive to his remarks. But when asked directly whether Sistani gave his explicit approval for the security crackdown, Rubaie demurred.

Sistani "isn't really interfering in the details of the plan. He only emphasized the limiting of weapons to the hands of the state and that the law should be imposed on all Iraqis without any exceptions," Rubaie said.

In northern Iraq, a suicide bomber detonated explosives Wednesday morning at a gathering near a police station in Tall Afar, west of Mosul, killing four people and injuring 10 others, all civilians, said Brig. Gen. Wathiq al-Hamdani, the Nineveh province police chief. A second suicide bomber attacked in Tall Afar near a location where cooking gas is sold, injuring a policeman.

Some parts of Baghdad appeared calmer Wednesday, following a day-long battle involving more than 1,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops in the predominantly Sunni neighborhood along Haifa Street. Iraqi soldiers were in charge of the area, and no U.S. soldiers were present, said Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman. "It was quiet there today," he said.

U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Hit 3,017 (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

As of Wednesday, Jan. 10, 2007, at least 3,017 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,423 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

The AP count is nine higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Wednesday at 10 a.m. EST.

The British military has reported 128 deaths; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; Denmark, six; El Salvador, five; Slovakia, four; Latvia, three; Estonia, Netherlands, Thailand, two each; and Australia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Romania, one death each.

The count includes two deaths listed by the Department of Defense that could not be verified as Iraq-related casualties by the AP.

In Baghdad Slum, Sectarian Strife Is Also Child's Play (WSJ)

War Games Are Part of Life For Little Hassoni Hussein, A Shiite in Sadr City, Now 5

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A year ago, a young gunman walked into Ali Hussein's living room and drew a weapon. The intruder's head was wrapped in a scarf, leaving a narrow slit for his eyes. His clothes were all black, the favorite attire of a powerful Shiite Muslim militia. He introduced himself as a commander, shouted the incantation "God is greater" and warned Sunni Muslims not to fight back. With that, he raised his plastic pistol.

The gunman's name is Hassoni, and he was only 4 years old at the time. The scene unfolded in his father's house in Baghdad's Sadr City slum, a sprawling Shiite Muslim district stretching toward the eastern edge of the Iraqi capital. "I was happy to see him this way because it means he has courage," Mr. Hussein, 26, said of his son. Since then, Hassoni's favorite game has grown more elaborate, migrating from the living room onto the neighboring streets, drawing in other children and increasingly emulating the violent world of the adults.

As Iraq careers toward full-scale civil war between its Shiite majority and Sunni minority, the culture of celebrating sectarian strife has taken root even among the very young in Sadr City. Home to more than two million people, the Baghdad district is the stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia blamed for abducting and killing Sunnis. But to Sadr City residents, the Mahdi Army is a revered self-defense force, the only group they see as capable of preventing wholesale slaughter of Shiites at the hands of

Sunni extremists. Shiite politicians blame atrocities against Sunnis on rogue forces that falsely claim to represent the real Mahdi Army.

The celebration of sectarian violence is widespread here. Some militia leaders have acquired almost mythical status, including Abu Dera, an elusive gangster alleged to be behind some of the worst sectarian killings of Sunnis. In the lore of the streets, Abu Dera and other fighters are Zorro-like figures who strike into the heart of Sunni neighborhoods, dispense swift revenge and return home unharmed.

Hassoni, who is now 5, spends hours listening to such tales in his family's grocery store, where customers routinely trade stories -- real and imagined -- of Shiite militias fighting Sunni insurgents. Abu Dera became his hero, and his father has helped encourage the adulation by playing songs on his stereo extolling the valor of Shiite gunmen. "Abu Dera is trying to kill the bad guys," said Mr. Hussein, who works as a security guard at the Ministry of Education and sometimes helps patrol his neighborhood.

A friendly boy with striking brown eyes and neatly combed hair falling over his forehead, Hassoni says he wants to grow up to be powerful enough to have a big car and armed guards surrounding him.

When he plays with friends, the boys divide themselves into two groups -- one Shiite and the other Sunni -- and shoot at each other with pellet guns, lurking behind cars and in roadside ditches. "Kids always refuse to be Sunnis, but because they need to play, some of them have to pretend to be Sunnis," said Mr. Hussein, who often watches his son's hours-long battles. Using trash, the children erect their own barricades. Hassoni likes to pretend to be Abu Dera and calls himself the leader of the gang. Other members include a boy nicknamed Bush Senior for his foreign-looking red hair. Hassoni often returns home with torn clothes and pellet bruises.

A few blocks away, Qassim Abdul-Ridha, a father of four, said his 6-year-old son, Karar, and his gang fight street battles against other children, often sending a girl to scout out the rivals' hiding places. Chanting "Muqtada" in homage to Muqtada al-Sadr, the powerful Shiite cleric who leads the Mahdi Army, the boys try to capture their opponents' toy guns as trophies.

The real Mahdi Army is always nearby to provide inspiration. Sometimes, Hassoni hangs around grown-up gunmen manning the real roadblocks and runs errands for them, such as bringing them food and drink. He also gathers war stories and then breathlessly relays them to his parents. The latest tale Hassoni heard on the street involved a group of Shiite gunmen who mounted a rescue mission of Shiite hostages held by Sunni extremists. The gunmen ended up kidnapping the kidnappers and brought them to Sadr City. "He's very excited, always smiling, when he tells us these stories," his father said.

One day, Hassoni brought home a steel pipe he found in a garbage dump and declared it to be a rocket launcher, which he was going to use to fire mortars at Sunni neighborhoods, much as real militiamen do. Asked recently what he thinks of Sunnis, he answered with one word: "terrorists." Together with other children, Hassoni fills empty bottles with sand, and sticks a twig in them to resemble a fuse. The bottles serve as make-believe bombs for use against imaginary Sunnis or American patrols.

Hassoni's arsenal of toy guns has grown from one plastic pistol to include two AK-47 models and a sniper rifle with a scope, now his favorite weapon. Mr. Hussein gave him the rifle as a gift at the end of the fasting month of Ramadan when Iraqi families exchange presents. Hassoni was so excited, his father says, that he paid no attention to a toy train and a toy piano given to him by his mother and aunt. The black life-size rifle looks completely real.

The line between the game and real life has grown increasingly blurry. In late November, suspected Sunni insurgents detonated five car bombs inside Sadr City, killing 240 Shiite civilians, the bloodiest attack since the U.S. invasion in 2003. The blasts occurred just over a mile from Mr. Hussein's house, and Hassoni saw the black plumes of smoke. Later that evening, Hassoni and other children patrolled their street looking for strangers. Hassoni started saying things like, "Sunnis hate us and don't want us to be anywhere near them," his father said.

A few days later, Hassoni and his gang spotted a boy they didn't know. They stopped him and demanded to know what he was doing on their street. "I heard the Mahdi Army saying that if you see strangers, ask them where they come from and what they are doing here," he said. "And that kid was not from our area." When the boy tried to run away, Hassoni and his friends caught him and beat him up.

Later, it turned out that the boy and his parents, all Shiites, were visiting relatives on Hassoni's street. "We had a lot of problems with our neighbors because of this fight," Mr. Hussein recalled. He said he sat his son down for a talk, telling him it is wrong to attack other boys. Hassoni promised to behave but said he will continue looking for strangers on his street.

National Guard Presses Pentagon For Reforms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 11, 2007

The White House's plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq is prompting National Guard officials to step up pressure for changes to mobilization, training and equipment that would have long-term implications for retention and efficiency.

Lt. Gen. Steven Blum, chief of the National Guard, told The Hill that his troops would be ready to serve — and, in many cases, serve again — in Iraq as part of President Bush's new strategy.

"There is no question in my mind that if the nation needs us, we will do it," he said after an Association of the United States Army breakfast. "It would be a huge mistake to not send the National Guard to shoulder some of that burden."

Nevertheless, he said, "now is the time" to implement changes. "If we do not do that, we risk the ability to sustain an all-volunteer force, in my judgment," Blum warned.

Pentagon policy limits Guard and Reserve units to 24 months of mobilization, or active duty. The Pentagon has interpreted that policy as 24 cumulative rather than consecutive months.

Because the war in Iraq has lasted for almost four years, longer than anticipated, National Guard officials complain that citizen soldiers have been used inefficiently.

Before they deploy overseas, they spend months at mobilization stations to train, which means their first deployments last up to 18 months.

Many Guard members have been deployed overseas as individuals and not as part of their full units, compounding the problem by harming unit cohesion. Many guardsmen have come close to serving 24 months. While the Guard's goal has been to send troops overseas every six years, many have been deployed every three to four years. About 206,000 National Guard soldiers have been deployed to Afghanistan and Iraq.

National Guard officials, who want to see soldiers deploy for only 12 months at a time, would like to maintain a five-year force-generation cycle in which soldiers train for four years to be ready for deployment in the fifth.

According to a Pentagon source, the Army has agreed to reform the mobilization process, but it is unclear whether the Guard would be able to keep the desired force-generation cycle. The Guard would be able to provide troops for 12 straight months and a better schedule would turn out a more dependable force without the need for months of training before deployment.

A new mobilization policy would give the soldiers, their families and their employers more predictability, Blum said. Much of the training could be carried out at their home bases, he added.

"If we had good predictability in a normal National Guard time we would equip and train those people to reduce the time" after they are called on active duty, Blum said.

A change in mobilization and training cannot occur without the proper equipment, he said. Traditionally, the Army shortchanged Guard and Reserve forces on their equipment — the Guard has a $29 billion shortfall in equipment — but the realities of the Iraq and Afghanistan wars are slowly forcing changes.

"If you do not have the equipment, you can't train on it, and that means when you call the unit out it takes extended time to issue the equipment and train on the equipment, learn how to operate it," Blum said. "That is time wasted. The equipment has to be in the soldiers' hands to provide strategic depth to our reserve forces […] and to shorten the time it takes to get units ready to go overseas."

A senior Army budget official said the National Guard now enjoys a "very healthy slice of the procurement dollars."

"There are a lot of resources dedicated to improving that equipment," said Lt. Gen. David Melcher, the Army's budget chief.

Blum expressed optimism that the Pentagon will be open to change.

"I think we are very close to having what I think will be a solution set to that," Blum said. "I think the Army has come to recognize that this is the long war and we have to adopt a strategy for the citizen soldier."

Congressman Under Investigation Steps Aside From Justice Department Budget Work (AP)

AP, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - Rep. Alan Mollohan, under Justice Department investigation about whether he has benefited from directing federal funds to nonprofit groups he helped start, stepped aside Wednesday from working on key elements of the department's budget.

The move came on the day Mollohan, D-W.Va., was named chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee responsible for the department's budget.

Mollohan will not have anything to do with setting the budgets for the attorney general's office, the FBI or the Justice Department's criminal division and prosecuting attorneys, he said in a letter to Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis. That way, he can't be accused of using his power as payback for the ongoing investigation or to influence it.

DOJ_NMG_0115446

However, Mollohan will still have a big say in other elements of the agency's budget, including allocation of lawmakers' pet projects such as grants to state and local law enforcement agencies.

At issue is at least $202 million of federal funding that Mollohan has steered to five nonprofit groups in his district - with much of the money going to organizations run by people who contribute to the lawmaker's campaigns.

Last year, Mollohan stepped down from the House ethics committee after media reports into his activities, and the FBI soon launched an investigation. A conservative group, the National Legal and Policy Center, has alleged that the 12-term congressman has undervalued his assets in annual financial disclosure reports.

Mollohan and a political action committee he controls have received more than $146,000 in the past 10 years from donors affiliated with these nonprofits.

Earlier this year, the FBI subpoenaed financial records from the nonprofits, though no charges have been filed.

Mollohan has denied any wrongdoing and made the decision to step aside from the Justice Department budget on his own, said his spokesman, Gerry Griffith.

"These charges are rubbish, and whatever financial success my wife and I have had is a result of my wife's expertise and her years of experience in real estate," Mollohan told his Democratic colleagues at a private meeting.

Mollohan nonetheless opted to take himself out of position to consider "any related Justice Department accounts."

"I have never received word from the Justice Department about the scope, nature or state of these inquiries," he said.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, praised Mollohan and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., "for recognizing that recusal is the appropriate course of action."

Sloan criticized Republicans for not requiring Appropriations Committee members Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., and John Doolittle, R-Calif., also under Justice Department scrutiny, for not making similar moves.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lawyer To Pay $3.1M Over Comverse Stock Options (USAT)

By Edward Iwata, Usa Today

USA Today, January 11, 2007

William Sorin, former general counsel at Comverse Technology (CMVT), will pay $3.1 million to settle charges that he conspired with the company's former CEO and chief financial officer to improperly backdate stock options, the Securities and Exchange Commission said Wednesday.

Without admitting or denying the charges, Sorin agreed to disgorge $1.7 million and pay $818,000 in interest and a $600,000 civil penalty, according to the SEC. About $1 million of the disgorgement will come from backdated options he exercised.

Sorin is the first corporate counsel fined by the SEC in the federal crackdown on the backdating of stock options by 200 companies.

Haywood Gilliam, a partner at Bingham McCutchen and former Justice Department securities fraud chief in San Francisco, says regulators are "focusing more on gatekeeper defendants such as attorneys, and I would not be surprised to see more of it."

Sorin's attorney, James Brochin, declined to comment.

Last year, the SEC and Justice Department charged Sorin, former Comverse CEO Jacob "Kobi" Alexander and former chief financial officer David Kreinberg with a stock-manipulation scheme that allegedly reaped them $8 million.

According to court filings, Alexander and Kreinberg manufactured evidence to defend the options grants and deceived Comverse directors and auditors. Prosecutors alleged that Comverse set up a roster of phony grant recipients labeled "I.M. Fanton" after a secretary saw The Phantom of the Opera.

The SEC alleged that the men backdated option grants to coincide with low closing prices of Comverse stock, making the options more valuable than if they had matched Comverse's higher share price on the original grant dates.

In his criminal case, Sorin in November pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities, mail and wire fraud. He faces a maximum of five years in prison at his sentencing in February, prosecutor Ilene Jaroslaw says.

Alexander fled to Namibia and was arrested there in September. He faces an extradition hearing in April.

Kreinberg, in his criminal case, pleaded guilty to conspiracy and securities fraud in October in New York. He faces a maximum prison sentence of 15 years at his sentencing next month.

Ex-Counsel At Comverse Settles Lawsuit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Former Comverse Technology Inc. General Counsel William Sorin will pay $3 million to settle a Securities and Exchange Commission civil lawsuit alleging he took part in a long-running effort to manipulate executive stock-option grants.

Mr. Sorin also will be permanently barred from serving as a corporate lawyer, officer or director of a publicly traded company, the SEC said.

MORE ON OPTIONS

· Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

The Harvard Law School graduate settled without admitting or denying the SEC's allegations about his role in backdating stock-option grants. Mr. Sorin, former Comverse Technology Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg and fugitive former Chief Executive Jacob "Kobi" Alexander were named in the SEC's civil suit in August and were criminally charged as well. Mr. Alexander fled to the African nation of Namibia, where he is awaiting a hearing on extradition to the U.S.

Stock options give holders the right to buy shares at a future date at a price set on the grant date. Backdating occurs when those awarding options change the actual grant date to another one when the stock price was lower, potentially increasing the value of the option grants.

Prosecutors charged the option-manipulation effort produced substantial personal profits for the executives while costing shareholders.

Mr. Sorin pleaded guilty in November to a single criminal charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud, mail fraud and wire fraud. Mr. Kreinberg pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy and securities fraud and resolved the SEC charges by agreeing to pay nearly $2.4 million. The SEC said its investigation is continuing.

Federal regulators claimed Mr. Sorin falsified company records to show that directors on the firm's compensation committee approved grants of stock options when they hadn't. The SEC said Mr. Sorin assisted a similar effort by falsifying company records at Ulticom Inc., a majority-owned subsidiary of Comverse, a Woodbury, N.Y., software company. Messrs. Sorin, Kreinberg and Alexander resigned in May amid an investigation by a special committee of the company's board of directors.

Mr. Sorin's attorney, James Brochin, declined to comment.

Under the settlement, Mr. Sorin will pay a $600,000 fine and return $1.6 million, including $1 million he garnered by exercising backdated stock-option grants, plus more than $800,000 of interest. The SEC said the settlement is subject to approval by the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York.

Apple Chief Benefited From Options Dating, Records Indicate (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Apple Inc. chief executive Steve Jobs confirmed his place this week as the premier impresario of the Internet age, taking the stage in San Francisco to unveil a smart phone that won a raucous endorsement from thousands of fans in the audience and sent Apple stock rocketing to a record high.

But his signature performance at the annual Macworld Conference and Expo did not dispel the scandal swirling around Apple over its backdating of stock options. Despite the company's defense that Jobs never personally benefited from a pair of stock option grants he received -- he gave them up in 2003, long before allegations of wrongdoing surfaced -- filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission show that his options were exchanged for 5 million shares of restricted Apple stock.

That stock was worth $75 million at the time, nearly the same as the value of the options he relinquished, using a technique for calculating the value of investments popular with financial analysts and used by Apple.

Steve Dowling, Apple's director of corporate communications, said the 2003 transaction did not directly benefit Jobs because he could not sell the restricted shares until he had remained at Apple for another three years.

Some investor advocates call that explanation disingenuous. "You are torturing the English language to say he did not benefit from the options," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services. "He certainly benefited from the grant because the grant was converted on a value-to-value basis."

McGurn and other analysts also said the amount of stock Jobs received appeared to be inflated because the value of his options was exaggerated, at least in the case of one grant, by the improper backdating.

The 5 million shares, which doubled in number when the stock split, continued to increase in value until last March, when Jobs was eligible to sell the shares. At that point, they were worth nearly $650 million. Jobs sold nearly half of them as soon as he could, in March, for $295.7 million.

DOJ_NMG_0115448

Jobs is a unique figure in the technology industry. He is a rock star in the realm of geeks, the visionary behind such totems of the computer age as the Mac and the iPod and an evangelist of such charisma that his followers attribute to him the ability to make them rethink reality. His achievements have earned him a fortune estimated recently at $4.9 billion. After co-founding Apple, Jobs left the company after a power struggle, only to return in 1996 and revive its flagging fortunes. He was also chief executive of Pixar Animation Studios and, after it was bought by Walt Disney Corp., became Disney's largest shareholder.

While senior executives at other companies have recently been forced from their posts over allegations that they were involved in improper booking of stock options, Wall Street analysts have said Apple would be reluctant to oust Jobs even if he were clearly implicated in similar practices. His leadership is synonymous with the company's success.

Nearly 200 companies have acknowledged or are under investigation for the backdating of stock options, a practice that involves picking an effective date for an option when the stock price was low so that the recipient can make more money when he sells it. None of those companies is as prominent as Apple, and Apple has confirmed that federal authorities are looking into its practices.

Apple disclosed to the Securities and Exchange Commission late last month that it had falsified the approval of 7.5 million stock options given to Jobs in 2001 by recording a fictitious October meeting to ratify the options. The company acknowledged that the options were actually finalized on Dec. 18, 2001. That date's stock price, which Apple now concedes should have been the basis for the option price, was 15 percent higher than it was on the date of Jobs's grant.

The company told the SEC that it would take a $20 million charge to account for the improper pricing of the grant. The company said an internal investigation had discovered that 6,428 option grants to executives and other employees made on 42 occasions were improperly dated and agreed to take an $84 million after-tax expense as part of restating its finances.

Though Apple said Jobs may have recommended the selection of some favorable dates for options, it said he did not appreciate the accounting significance of choosing false dates. The company said its internal review found no misconduct by current members of Apple management.

Though the 2001 award to Jobs has gained the most attention, an earlier, more generous grant in 2000 is also at issue. The Apple board finalized an award of 10 million stock options to Jobs on Jan. 12, 2000, and said in its filings last month that it was correct in using Jan. 12 as the date for the options' price.

Apple stock on that date happened to be at its lowest level for a six-month period, including about 10 weeks prior, making the stock options especially lucrative. By Jan. 18, when Apple said the board transmitted its unanimous written consent to the grant, the stock price had increased nearly 20 percent.

Lucian Bebchuk, director of Harvard Law School's program in corporate governance, said Jobs falls into a category of chief executives that Bebchuk has labeled "super-lucky." These are the people who have received stock options on dates representing the lowest price of the financial quarter.

"He has some company. He is not the only one to be as fortunate," Bebchuk said. He and his fellow researchers found in a study released two months ago that about 1,000 CEO grants from 1996 to 2005 fell into this category. For most of these options, he said, the dates were more likely to have been the result of "manipulation" rather than good fortune.

Backdating stock options is not illegal. But not disclosing the practice to investors or falsifying documents to cover it up may be.

In lawsuit filed last month in federal court in Northern California, Apple shareholders alleged that company officers and directors had manipulated the price of stock options for Jobs and other executives by repeatedly selecting dates with favorable stock prices. The plaintiffs allege that by doing so, Apple officers and directors unlawfully enriched Jobs and his fellow executives and concealed the practice.

Dowling, the Apple spokesman, declined to comment on the lawsuit. Nor would he comment on how Apple selected the dates for the sets of options awarded to Jobs, saying any available details were contained in SEC filings.

Apple reported in its filings that Jobs voluntarily gave up his stock options in March 2003 and "in exchange for his cancelled options" received the 5 million shares of restricted stock. The filing said Jobs relinquished the options partly because he was concerned that the number of unexercised options at the company had grown too large for its financial health. Apple's stock price had declined sharply in previous years, making many of those with options reluctant to use them. With the exercise price higher than the market price at the time, the options were said to be "underwater," meaning that anyone who exercised such an option immediately would lose money.

But while it would be unwise to exercise options under those circumstances, the options were far from worthless. They were good for up to 10 years after they were issued, allowing time for Apple stock to rebound, as it subsequently did.

The value of stock options on a specific date can be estimated with the Black-Scholes model, a widely used technique that factors in variables such as exercise and market prices, interest rates, dividends, expiration date, and stock volatility. Based on

Apple's figures, disclosed in SEC filings, the combined value of Jobs's two stock option grants when he relinquished them in March 2003 was $81.3 million.

Graef Crystal, a retired consultant who is widely recognized as an expert on executive compensation, recently conducted a separate calculation using the same approach. But instead of using Apple's estimate of the stock's expected volatility, a crucial variable, he measured its actual volatility in the market. He also used his estimate of how long executives hold options before using them, based on experience instead of Apple's projection. Crystal calculated that Jobs's options were worth $76.6 million when he gave them up.

Financial analysts said that both estimates show that the options were of generally the same value as the stock Jobs received. Crystal said this showed that the exchange of options for stock was based on "some kind of parity."

Crystal and other financial experts said Jobs appeared not only to benefit from his options in general but specifically from the favorable dates when they were issued because lower prices for the options could ultimately translate into more shares of stock when he made the exchange.

In the case of the 2001 grant, for instance, the difference between the false October date and the December date, which Apple now says was the proper one, was worth about $5 million to Jobs when he traded the options in. Had the lower value been used in calculating the amount of stock he would get in return, he would have received 630,000 fewer shares. By the time he could sell them three years later, these shares would have been worth more than $40 million because of the soaring price of Apple stock.

Dick Grasso, the former chairman of the New York Stock Exchange, asked a state appeals court to throw out a lower court's ruling that he must return a portion of his $187.5 million compensation package.

At a hearing before the appellate division of the New York State Supreme Court, Gerson Zweifach, Mr. Grasso's lawyer, said New York State Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Ramos erred in October when he granted a summary judgment request by the state attorney general's office.

Mr. Zweifach said there are too many issues that remain in dispute about whether Mr. Grasso fulfilled his fiduciary duties to the Big Board and what the NYSE's directors knew about his compensation package for the case to be decided without a trial. He said the case should be decided by a jury.

"It was error for the trial court to even attempt on summary judgment to decide what people knew and what Mr. Grasso should have known," he said.

The attorney general's office, which sued Mr. Grasso in 2004 alleging his pay was excessive for a not-for-profit corporation, has said Mr. Grasso should be forced to return more than $112 million.

In November, the appeals court stayed all proceedings until it could consider a number of issues raised by Mr. Grasso, including whether to reassign the case to a different judge.

Mr. Grasso, who left the NYSE in 2003 amid turmoil over his pay, has denied wrongdoing. The Big Board has since become a publicly traded for-profit company -- NYSE Group Inc.

Mr. Zweifach said Mr. Grasso's compensation was spelled out in his employment contract, particularly the formula used to determine payments owed to him under the exchange's Supplemental Executive Retirement Plan, or SERP.

He also argued that the NYSE's board was made up of corporate executives who wouldn't have stood by silently if they felt Mr. Grasso wasn't giving them the full story on his compensation.

Special Deputy Attorney General Avi Schick argued Mr. Grasso had an "affirmative" obligation as chairman of a nonprofit corporation to make sure exchange directors were fully aware of his compensation.

Mr. Schick said minutes from meetings of the board's compensation committee don't reflect discussions of how Mr. Grasso's annual compensation affected his accrual under SERP.

Mr. Grasso, who attended the hearing, declined to comment afterward.

U.S. Attorney Charges H-P Investigator With Identity Theft (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- In another criminal charge stemming from last fall's Hewlett-Packard Co. spying affair, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan charged independent investigator Bryan Wagner with felony identity theft and conspiracy.

Mr. Ryan's spokesman, Luke Macaulay, said no other federal charges were filed in the H-P matter Wednesday, but that the Justice Department is still investigating the case.

Mr. Wagner, of Littleton, Colo., was one of five people charged with several felony counts last fall by the California attorney general's office in connection to the H-P scandal. Those charged by California include H-P's former nonexecutive chairman, Patricia Dunn, and its former chief ethics lawyer, Kevin Hunsaker. All five have pleaded not guilty to the California charges, including Mr. Wagner, who state and federal prosecutors allege used false identities to obtain the private phone records of numerous H-P directors, employees and journalists.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fumo Told He's Target Of Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mario F. Cattabiani And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 11, 2007

Federal prosecutors last year sent a formal warning to State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo that he may be indicted, according to sources familiar with the investigation.

The issuance of a so-called target letter from prosecutors to Fumo, one of Pennsylvania's most powerful politicians, is a significant milestone in the four-year investigation, which appears to be in its final stages.

The target letter was sent to Fumo last summer, around the time two of his computer aides were charged with destroying evidence to thwart the investigation, sources said. The Inquirer learned of the letter this month. A lawyer for Fumo yesterday declined to comment.

Typically, prosecutors send target letters to people who are likely to be charged, as a warning and as an invitation to testify before the grand jury. It's an offer that the targets usually refuse.

"It is the rare case, in my experience, that you can talk a prosecutor out of charges once a target letter is issued," said Lawrence S. Lustberg, a Newark lawyer who defended one of the Commerce Bank executives convicted in the 2005 City Hall corruption trial.

However, the delivery of a target letter, part of a secret grand jury process, is no guarantee that charges will be filed.

Before prosecutors present a potential indictment in such a high-profile case, they often consult with senior Justice Department officials in Washington. Also in such cases, defense attorneys are likely to be afforded the opportunity to meet with top officials, including U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan.

The Fumo investigation is focused on whether Fumo used funds from a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity for personal or political benefit - and whether Fumo and staffers destroyed evidence to try to thwart the FBI.

With the grand jury's term due to expire next month, prosecutors have subpoenaed witnesses to appear in the coming weeks, sources said.

Fumo is represented by the prominent Philadelphia firm of Sprague & Sprague. Mark Sheppard, a firm lawyer, would not discuss whether Fumo received a target letter.

"On behalf of the senator, we're not going to engage in any discussion involving the ongoing investigation," Sheppard said. "The process needs to run its course."

Fumo's spokesman, Gary Tuma, declined to comment. On several occasions last year, Fumo, a Philadelphia Democrat, denied any wrongdoing and has called the investigation politically inspired by the Bush administration.

Robert Zauzmer, a prosecutor in the case, declined to comment yesterday.

Fumo has been arrested twice before - and been exonerated each time.

In 1973, city prosecutors charged him with voter fraud, saying he interfered with poll watchers in order to give an advantage to a Democratic state senator.

When Republican District Attorney Arlen Specter stepped down, his successor, a Democrat, dropped the charges, saying the case was weak.

In 1979, a jury convicted Fumo in federal court of placing "ghost" employees on the state legislative payroll, but the trial judge later tossed out the conviction. He said the jury's verdict wasn't justified by the evidence.

The current investigation is focused on the finances of Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, a South Philadelphia charity that prosecutors have described in a court filing as "nominally independent but which the senator in fact controls."

Boosted by huge contributions obtained by Fumo from Peco and the Delaware River Port Authority, the charity reported almost $25 million in assets in 2002, the last time it filed a public disclosure.

Since the investigation began in 2003, authorities have reviewed Fumo's personal and financial records and Citizens' Alliance records, generating "thousands of pages of grand jury transcripts, and hundreds of pages of agent interview reports," according to a government filing.

In particular, authorities have scrutinized payments of more than $200,000 in 2002 and 2003 by Citizens' Alliance for polling. Public records show that a Fumo political committee ultimately repaid the money.

Agents have also reviewed myriad smaller Citizens' Alliance purchases to determine whether Fumo got any personal benefit from the charity's spending, sources said.

In addition, authorities are conducting a related obstruction-of-justice investigation. The two former Fumo aides indicted in June with trying to scuttle the FBI probe, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, have declined to cooperate with authorities and are scheduled for trial in May.

According to a government filing, another Fumo computer technician, Donald Wilson, was granted immunity and told the grand jury that Fumo "knew that we were deleting" e-mail to prevent the FBI from seizing it.

The Inquirer reported a year ago that longtime Fumo aide Ruth Arnao also received a target letter. Arnao, who once worked in his legislative office and later ran Citizens' Alliance, has not been charged with any crime. Her lawyers have said she has done nothing wrong.

Defense lawyers who have followed the case closely described the target letter to Fumo as a sign that prosecutors believe they have amassed enough evidence to charge the senator with a crime.

According to the official guidelines manual issued to federal prosecutors, "a 'target' is a person as to whom the prosecutor or the grand jury has substantial evidence linking him or her to the commission of a crime and who, in the judgment of the prosecutor, is a putative defendant."

To send a target letter, prosecutors must "believe in good faith that they have credible evidence to warrant an indictment," said Nicholas C. Harbist, a former federal prosecutor in Philadelphia who is now a defense lawyer in Cherry Hill.

Lustberg said that prosecutors generally issue target letters for one of two practical reasons - as "a sincere notice to a potential defendant that he is in trouble" or "to shake the trees and see what comes of it."

In this case, the grand jury term was set to expire in September but was extended to February.

Several former prosecutors said that the extension doesn't necessarily mean that prosecutors have had second thoughts about charging Fumo.

"I would read the situation this way: The government believed that it had sufficient credible evidence of a crime, but decided to delay issuing its indictment to continue its investigation," Harbist said. "It could be simply that the government wants to investigate any defenses, to close any loopholes."

Prison For Guards Over Sex With Inmates (AP)

By Bill Kaczor, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. (AP) - Two guards received one-year prison sentences Wednesday for their roles in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a fatal shootout at a federal prison for women.

Gregory Dixon, who admitted having sex with inmates but denied giving them anything for it, has taken responsibility for his actions and was sorry, his lawyer said.

The other guard, Alan Moore, told U.S. District Judge Robert Hinkle he was wrongly convicted.

``I did not do the things I was accused of," Moore said.

A jury convicted both in November of conspiring to accept illegal gratuities and other crimes.

Dixon and Moore were among six guards who had been charged with being part of a conspiracy to trade cigars, cigarettes, chewing gum, jewelry and cosmetics to inmates for sex and money at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution.

``They took an honorable position and public trust and used it for self-gratification," Assistant U.S. Attorney Alan Sprowls told the judge. ``Their conduct was a complete abandonment of what they knew was right."

One guard, Ralph Hill, pulled a gun and began firing at federal agents who had gone to the prison to arrest the suspects June 21. Hill and Justice Department Special Agent William ``Buddy" Sentner were killed, and a prison officer aiding in the arrests was wounded.

Three other guards pleaded guilty.

Hinkle said he considered the sex the most serious aspect of the crimes because it involved mistreatment of inmates.

Dixon admitted having sex with inmates and giving them gum and cigars but insisted there was no quid pro quo, defense lawyer Thomas Findley said.

Defense lawyers said neither man had decided whether to appeal.

Former Swift Employees Charged With Identity Theft (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Alan Bjerga

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- A federal grand jury charged 53 former employees of Swift & Co.'s meat processing plant in Cactus, Texas, with felony identity theft, the U.S. Attorney's office in Dallas said.

Those charged were among 295 at the Cactus plant arrested in mid-December during nationwide raids targeting illegal immigrants at six Swift facilities. About 1,300 Swift employees, or 9 percent of its workforce, were arrested by federal agents. So far, 246 of those arrested nationwide are facing criminal charges, most for identity theft, according to Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd in Washington.

``It is a serious crime to hijack and steal a citizen's good name and credit to illegally stay in the United States," U.S. Attorney Richard B. Roper said in a statement. He said most of those charged had used stolen or forged documents to find employment.

Each of the 53 former Swift workers charged today is facing one count of false representation of a Social Security number. The felony carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Most face additional charges as well, according to the statement.

Swift spokesman Sean McHugh said the Greeley, Colorado- based company had no comment on the charges. Closely held Swift, accounts for about 11 percent of U.S. cattle slaughter and is the third-biggest U.S. beef and pork producer. The company resumed normal operations shortly after the December raids.

Judge Tosses Out Testimony In Case Of Bodies Found In Reservoir (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A federal judge ordered jurors in the case of a man charged with masterminding a kidnapping-for-ransom plot that ended with five bodies tossed into a California reservoir to disregard the defendant's testimony after he refused to answer questions under cross-examination.

Iouri Mikhel, 42, testified last week that he helped lure some of the victims to meetings but never killed them. He also acknowledged being a "professional criminal" who laundered money and was a black market trader in his native Russia.

When Mikhel declined Tuesday to answer questions from prosecutors and an attorney representing a co-defendant, U.S. District Judge Dickran Tevrizian ordered the testimony removed from the court record.

Closing arguments were scheduled to begin Wednesday.

Mikhel, 42, has pleaded not guilty to charges that include conspiracy and hostage-taking resulting in death. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

Prosecutors allege Mikhel and several accomplices abducted Los Angeles-area businesspeople over a four-month period in 2001 and 2002 and collected $1.2 million (â,¬920,000) in ransoms before killing them.

Bodies of the five people kidnapped were later found in the New Melones Reservoir near Yosemite National Park.

One of the accomplices, Ainar Altmanis, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit hostage-taking and three counts of hostage-taking resulting in death. He cooperated with prosecutors, who agreed to seek no more than a 20-year sentence, and testified against Mikhel.

Two other defendants pleaded guilty to charges in the case, while two more have pleaded not guilty.

Lawyer Gave Information To Kerkorian (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger And Allison Hope Weiner

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Jan. 10 — When Kirk Kerkorian's longtime lawyer was indicted on wiretapping and conspiracy charges last February in the federal investigation of the Hollywood private detective Anthony Pellicano, the billionaire investor was mentioned almost as an afterthought.

There were no accusations that Mr. Kerkorian knew or approved of any wiretapping, and no indications that he had even been interviewed by the F.B.I. about Mr. Pellicano's work on his behalf.

But in recordings that Mr. Pellicano secretly made of his own telephone conversations, Mr. Kerkorian's lawyer, Terry N. Christensen, repeatedly said he told the billionaire — then 84, and locked in a legal dispute with his ex-wife, Lisa Bonder Kerkorian — what the private detective was learning from what prosecutors say were his wiretaps.

Mr. Christensen stops short of saying he has told Mr. Kerkorian that Mr. Pellicano was using wiretaps, but says he is providing Mr. Kerkorian with details of Ms. Kerkorian's private conversations.

Mr. Kerkorian has not been accused of any wrongdoing, and it is unlikely that someone could be held criminally liable for the actions of an investigator hired by his lawyer without showing that the client knew of the investigator's illegal acts.

Yet the recordings show how Mr. Pellicano's information could affect a high-stakes lawsuit, and make clear that Mr. Kerkorian, according to Mr. Christensen's assurances, was grateful for intimate information that helped his case.

"Tell me that the old man has a smile on his face," Mr. Pellicano said on May 14, 2002.

"He does, O.K.? He's happy," Mr. Christensen said. "Our jaw is still hanging down."

Mr. Kerkorian was then embroiled with his ex-wife in a nasty child-support and paternity battle. Mr. Pellicano heard Ms. Kerkorian talking to her lawyers, relatives and friends even as she and Mr. Kerkorian were wrangling over her demand for a $270,000 increase in monthly child-support payments. Ms. Kerkorian's effort ultimately failed; a judge increased the payments by just $316.

The secret recordings also show how Mr. Kerkorian and his lawyer pushed the private detective to investigate another multimillionaire, the movie producer Stephen L. Bing, whom Mr. Kerkorian suspected of being the biological father of his ex-wife's daughter.

A spokesman for Mr. Kerkorian, Dick Sobelle, declined to answer questions for this article. "We're not at liberty to comment on any of this," he said. Federal prosecutors declined to comment, as did Mr. Pellicano, who is in jail awaiting trial.

Mr. Christensen's lawyer, Terree A. Bowers, declined to answer questions, but when told the thrust of this article, called it "irresponsible, unwarranted and a pack of lies." He added: "In fact, there are absolutely no tapes or reliable evidence of any wiretaps involving the Kerkorian-Bonder litigation. The charges are and remain totally unfounded."

The recordings are among hundreds that prosecutors have turned over to defense lawyers, along with tens of thousands of documents. That evidence was subject to a court protective order, and prosecutors are investigating The New York Times's access to some of it.

Mr. Christensen and Mr. Pellicano, both of whom have pleaded not guilty to felony wiretapping and conspiracy charges, were among seven people indicted last February as part of an F.B.I. inquiry. Two have pleaded guilty, and the trial of the other five, after several delays, is set for August.

Mr. Kerkorian, through his holding company, the Tracinda Corporation, controls MGM Mirage, with its extensive hotel and casino properties. He bought and sold the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie studio three times from 1969 to 2004. Last year, he bought 9.9 percent of General Motors, trying to pressure it into a deal with Nissan and Renault, then retreated, selling his shares for a profit of $100 million. Forbes put his net worth at $8.7 billion last year.

Mr. Kerkorian will turn 90 in June. The recordings in which he is discussed by his lawyer and the private detective suggest he could be called to testify at their trial about what he knew and when.

The wiretapping on Mr. Kerkorian's behalf began after his ex-wife sued to increase his child-support payments from $50,000 to $320,000 a month. Mr. Kerkorian had learned much earlier that her daughter, who was born before he married Ms. Kerkorian, was not his biological child. But now Mr. Kerkorian pressed his lawyer to find out who the father was.

On March 18, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano that "proof of exactly how she got pregnant" would be worth $100,000 to Mr. Kerkorian.

Over the next two months, Mr. Pellicano recorded at least 33 more conversations with Mr. Christensen. While they did not use the word "wiretap," they freely talked about what Mr. Pellicano heard while monitoring Ms. Kerkorian's phones.

On April 27, 2002, Mr. Pellicano reported hearing her discuss trying to leverage Mr. Kerkorian's desire to spend time with her daughter into a bigger settlement. "This is her exact words, by the way," he said. " 'How much money is he willing to pay me to get that?' That's her exact words."

He also said Ms. Kerkorian had confided in her father about her case. "There's no way except with my unique techniques that you would know this," he said.

A few excerpts show the kinds of information Mr. Kerkorian's side gained from learning of Ms. Kerkorian's telephone conversations:

¶On April 22, 2002, Mr. Pellicano reported to Mr. Christensen that Ms. Kerkorian was furious at her lawyers and ready to fire one of them, Stephen Kolodny, but Mr. Kolodny talked her out of it. "I'll tell you something, if we continue to get this kind of information with their strategy, we'll really kill 'em," he said.

Mr. Kolodny said he had no recollection of Ms. Kerkorian threatening to fire him in this time period.

¶On Saturday, April 27, two days before a settlement conference, Mr. Pellicano told Mr. Christensen he had picked up "massive detail" about Ms. Kerkorian's settlement demands.

"She wants all her legal fees paid. You understand?" Mr. Pellicano said. "She wants retroactive support back to August of last year. She wants $125,000 a month. She wants a joint press statement saying that neither one of them was at fault, and they just both made mistakes."

DOJ_NMG_0115454

Repeatedly, Mr. Christensen said he intended to, or already had, told Mr. Kerkorian what Mr. Pellicano had learned from Ms. Kerkorian's phone calls:

¶On April 27, Mr. Pellicano said Mr. Christensen might want to warn Mr. Kerkorian about something.

"She talks about killing him," Mr. Pellicano said. "She says, 'You know, I gotta kill him.' She says those things. Now, whether she really means it or not, probably not. But does she say it? Absolutely."

Two days later, Mr. Christensen returned to the subject. "Those comments and that discussion was pretty disgusting, and I'm thinking that I should probably, you know, give Kirk a heads-up," he said.

Mr. Christensen's lawyers later claimed that Mr. Pellicano's information about such statements by Ms. Kerkorian was what led Mr. Christensen to become involved with the private detective in the first place.

Steve Sitkoff, a lawyer for Ms. Kerkorian, scoffed at the notion that she was ever a threat to anyone. "It's ludicrous to think that she would ever mean any harm to Kirk or anyone else," he said.

¶On May 10, Mr. Pellicano argued for telling Mr. Kerkorian not to trust the mediator in the case, Deborah Simon. After Mr. Kerkorian had left Ms. Simon a lengthy message, Ms. Simon told Ms. Kerkorian all about it, Mr. Pellicano said, and Ms. Kerkorian was thrilled.

"The elation was overwhelming," Mr. Pellicano said.

"Well, I will let Kirk know the emotional high that Lisa got out of Deborah's call," Mr. Christensen said. Ms. Simon did not respond to messages at her home and office.

¶On May 14, Mr. Pellicano asked if Mr. Kerkorian had been briefed about another exchange he had overheard. "Did you tell him about that?" he said.

"Yeah, oh sure," Mr. Christensen said. "He just couldn't believe it."

Ms. Kerkorian, who had a long relationship with the billionaire, married and quickly divorced him when her baby was a year old, and the two agreed at the time that the child was his.

By the time Mr. Pellicano was hired, the investor already had been told by his ex-wife's friends that she had had an affair with Mr. Bing, the film producer, around the time when her daughter was conceived. So, after Mr. Pellicano tried to but could not confirm that Ms. Kerkorian had been artificially inseminated, Mr. Christensen pressed him to focus on Mr. Bing — who was already embroiled in a contentious and public paternity fight with the actress Elizabeth Hurley.

At one point, on April 28, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano that he took no pleasure in pursuing Mr. Bing. "But Kirk is going through this, and he's been [expletive] defrauded, O.K.? And I am not resting until this is put to bed, and it's not going to be put to bed until we find out who the father is."

Ultimately, Mr. Bing, who declined to comment, was identified as the father of Ms. Kerkorian's child, with the help of a DNA sample lifted from his trash.

As word broke of that finding, on May 15, 2002, Mr. Christensen told Mr. Pellicano to shut down the wiretap of Ms. Kerkorian after one final night of listening. The private eye said he hoped to work for Mr. Kerkorian again.

"Maybe the old man will give me something in the future," he said.

"Well, that you can count on," Mr. Christensen said.

Land In Bribery Case Isn't In Chicago Alderman's Ward (CHIT/AP)

Associated Press

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

CHICAGO -- When FBI officials arrested Alderman Arenda Troutman this week, they alleged that she took $5,000 from a fictitious developer in exchange for helping him move forward on a project in her South Side ward.

Or, rather, what they assumed was her ward.

A closer look has revealed that the parcel in question isn't in Troutman's 20th Ward, after all, but in the 16th.

While Troutman's lawyer is crying foul, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said the mix-up is a non-issue.

"From a legal standpoint, it doesn't matter," he said. "It's not an element of the crime."

But defense attorney Sam Adam Jr. said his client knows the boundaries of her ward and that the location revelation "should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on."

"The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese," Adam said. "It is stinking to high heaven."

Troutman was arrested at her home early Monday by federal agents who said they had to break a window to get in.

Prosecutors allege that in return for the $5,000 and the promise of more, Troutman agreed to back the bogus developer in getting zoning changes and alley access for a proposed development.

Federal Magistrate Michael T. Mason set a $10,000 unsecured bond for Troutman, releasing her on her own recognizance.

Adam said he will argue that the development was phony and that Troutman didn't do anything to help it.

FBI officials also allege that Troutman told an informant to have the developer make out a $15,000 check to the 20th Ward Women's Auxiliary. State records show the organization is run by her mother and sisters.

Details Don't Get In Way Of FBI Sting (CHIT)

By Ray Gibson And Gary Washburn, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Reporters Jeff Coen And Laurie Cohen Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, January 11, 2007

Video: Real estate not in Troutman's ward

If the federal sting that snagged Ald. Arenda Troutman were a Hollywood movie, Chicagoans in the know might be complaining about a flawed plot.

Troutman, who represents the South Side's 20th Ward, was arrested for allegedly taking money to grease the way for a real estate development at 5730 S. Halsted St.

But the site in question, as it turns out, isn't even in Troutman's ward.

If the 5730 property "was on the other side of the street, it would have been in the 20th," said Thomas Leach, a spokesman for the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners who double-checked the city ward map at the Tribune's request. But the site is actually in the adjacent 16th Ward, he said.

Under longstanding practice and tradition, Chicago aldermen have great power over governmental approvals that can clear the way for a real estate development or kill it. But those familiar with the way Chicago works also know that the alderman of one ward typically has no say over what happens in the ward of a colleague.

"We assumed that she knew her ward, and that [the property] was in her ward," said Ross Rice, a spokesman for the FBI.

Rice said investigators did not double check, and from the FBI's perspective, it's a moot point.

Either Troutman herself believed the parcel was in her ward and she could influence the process, or she knew the parcel wasn't in her ward and thought she could take money anyway, he said.

"From our perspective and from a legal perspective it doesn't matter," he said.

Troutman, who has been in the City Council for 16 years, has demonstrated that she knows council tradition.

Troutman's lawyer, Sam Adam Jr., said the revelation about the location of the parcel used in the sting casts the case further into doubt. He said Troutman knows the exact boundaries of the area.

"And that should prove to everyone that there was nothing fraudulent going on," he said, because Troutman wouldn't do anything fraudulent and draw attention to a development that she knew wasn't in her ward.

Attempts to reach Ald. Shirley Coleman (16th) were unsuccessful. But a Coleman aide, reached by phone, knew immediately that 5730 S. Halsted was in her boss' territory.

The ward boundary isn't the only odd twist in the plot line.

When Troutman took the first step in an alleged attempt to get a zoning change to make the project possible, she was told by the city's zoning administrator that the parcel could accommodate the development just the way it was--raising the question of whether investigators checked the zoning status before deciding on using the property in the sting.

Then, trying to do what she could, Troutman allegedly made a call to the city's Planning Department to say she would be writing a letter in support of the project. She allegedly was stymied again, informed by a department employee that the correspondence would not be necessary because the land was not owned by the city.

Details of the sting are outlined in a criminal complaint, filed Monday by an FBI agent assigned to the case.

The complaint charges that Troutman continued to try to find a way to earn bribe money, finally using her clout to allow the developer to use a public alley for access to his project's parking lot.

But the plot evades the issue of whether a real Chicago developer would pay the exorbitant tab for such a relatively small favor--and why Troutman thought she could score as much as the government contends she sought.

According to the complaint, she got $5,000, the promise of another $10,000 and had discussed being given a residence and commercial space in the project.

Alley-access ordinances are routine, said Ald. Thomas Allen (38th), chairman of the council's Transportation Committee, which processes hundreds of such proposals every year. It would be "ridiculous" to pay a bribe to get one through the City Council, he said.

Troutman submitted the ordinance for the Halsted Street property on Dec. 13, records show. It won preliminary approval from Allen's committee on Jan. 3. But, given the federal allegations, the alderman said he will not present it to the full council for approval until city lawyers and federal prosecutors advise him on what to do.

Adam said he will argue the development was fake and Troutman did nothing to help it. Any money she took from the cooperating witness in the case cannot be called a bribe, he said.

"The government's case is smelling like Limburger cheese," he said. "It is stinking to high heaven."

Defendant May Take Stand Today In Bribery Trial (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, January 11, 2007

Federal prosecutors rested their bribery case Wednesday against the Shelby County Commission's former top administrative aide, Calvin Williams, who may take the stand today in his own defense.

Williams is accused of taking a $1,500 bribe in 2003 from friend-turned-informant Tim Willis for helping get an urban development grant approved by the commission.

Willis secretly recorded the payoff on audio and video provided by the FBI, which was conducting a widespread public corruption investigation known as Tennessee Waltz.

Through his public defenders, Williams has contended the payment was a legitimate fee as part of a business arrangement he had with Willis.

In secretly made recordings, however, jurors have heard Williams say he is "not a part of Strategic Solutions," a political consulting concern run by Willis.

Among the six witnesses called by Williams on Wednesday was attorney Buck Wellford, a county commissioner from 1994 to 2002 who said on cross-examination by prosecutor Lorraine Craig that he thought Williams should have focused more on his administrative duties with the commission and less on the commissioners' political issues.

Wellford said Williams appeared to have "a special relationship" with Commissioner Cleo Kirk, who sponsored the urban development grant of $100,000 for the Glenview Neighborhood Development Partners Inc.

"He (Williams) was at his beck and call 24 hours a day," said Wellford. "Commissioner Kirk made more demands on his time than any other commissioner, as Calvin Williams put it to me."

Williams said on the tapes shown to jurors that half of the $1,500 payment from Willis was to go to Kirk, an allegation the former commissioner has denied.

Kirk has been subpoenaed to testify, but has not been called by either side.

Other defense witnesses included former county mayor Jim Rout and former commissioner Julian Bolton, whose brief testimony dealt mostly with procedural aspects of funding and resolutions.

Bolton said there was strong support on the commission for funding the Glenview project, which was approved in September 2002.

The trial is being held before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel H. Mays Jr.

Storm Left New Orleans Ripe For Violence (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 10 — The storm of violence that has burst over this city since the New Year's Day can be traced in part to dysfunctional law-enforcement institutions, aggravated by a natural disaster that turned the physical and social landscape of New Orleans into an ideal terrain for criminals.

Eight killings have occurred in 10 days. New Orleans, the United States' murder capital by many measures in 2006, is well on its way to keeping that distinction in 2007. Since July 2006, there have been at least 95 murders per 100,000 residents, and possibly a higher ratio depending on how the city's depleted population is counted, said Peter Scharf, a criminologist at the University of New Orleans.

Frightened citizens now see their city as a stalking ground, roamed with impunity by teenagers with handguns — an image that may not be far off the mark, experts here say.

There are a variety of reasons for the descent toward chaos. An automobile-bound police department is reluctant to walk the streets and interact with the city's residents. It is at war with the district attorney's office, which is prosecuting seven officers for a deadly shooting soon after Hurricane Katrina struck in 2005. Judges in the city's courts regularly rule in favor of criminals.

Completing the grim picture is an already fragile social structure in the city's poorest wards that has been all but destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Moving back to town, in many cases, are "kids with guns, and without parents," said Mr. Scharf, who predicted a year ago that the city was in for a tidal wave of violence.

DOJ_NMG_0115457

The police, feared and hated by the city's poor, get no cooperation from them in solving crimes. "Stop that snitchin!" is the inscription on the T-shirt of a man waiting for a bus on Canal Street. In killing after killing, police officials have begged for witnesses to step up, to no avail.

The result is an unwitting carrying out of the classic Maoist strategy of guerilla insurgency: criminals swim like fish in the surrounding sea, protected by a population that finds no reason to give them up, and is often afraid to.

Frustrated, police officers have been known to lash out at residents. Disturbing police brutality cases — officers beating up, or even shooting, random African-American men — are now competing for headlines with the latest killings.

Infuriating the police agency he must work with, Eddie Jordan, the district attorney, referred to the police as "rabid dogs" after he indicted seven of them last month in the shooting death of two men after Hurricane Katrina.

In this violent city, the Police Department's arrests are usually not for crimes of violence at all, but for drugs. Such arrests constitute 65 percent of the city's total, twice the national average, according to a study by the city's independent Metropolitan Crime Commission. And the problems only continue once an arrest is made. In 2003-4, only 7 percent of those arrested were sentenced to prison, only 5 percent of all convictions were for violent offenses, and only 12 percent of homicide arrests resulted in jail, the study found.

In addition, New Orleans judges go light on sentencing, the study found: they give felons jail time far less often than do judges in other states' courts.

The last time there was a murder conviction in New Orleans was in August — and in that case the judge later reduced the offense to manslaughter, according to the district attorney's office. The judge, Charles Elloie, who publicly expressed sympathy for criminal defendants, has since been suspended for returning suspects to the streets with little or no bond.

"There's a lot of factors converging here," said James Bernazzani, the Federal Bureau of Investigation's special agent in charge in New Orleans, "based on local institutional dysfunction, a population that wasn't educated, and a state judicial system that doesn't mete out consequence for criminal activity. And you've got a citizenry that doesn't cooperate."

The way out of this conundrum is not easily seen by experts or by citizens weary of pledges by local officials — there was another one Tuesday —to make things right. Checkpoints, sheriff's deputies, clergy intervention: all were earnestly promised, under the glare of television lights, in an open-air setting in the heart of the New Orleans killing grounds, the Central City neighborhood.

"It's like Casablanca, round up the usual ideas," said Mr. Scharf, the criminologist.

The surge in killings is a threat to the city's faltering repopulation campaign.

"People I've never heard talk like this, die-hard New Orleanians, are weeping, talking about leaving," said Mary Howell, a civil rights lawyer here. "It's palpable."

Many people are looking to the federal government for help, and are hoping the United States attorney, Jim Letten, might prosecute a few of the murder cases normally handled by the district attorney's office. Mr. Bernazzani said Wednesday that "where we can find the federal hook, Jim Letten has agreed to take the case," adding that additional federal agents were being recruited for New Orleans.

Meanwhile, citizen advocacy, the catalyst for most post-hurricane reform here, will make itself felt again Thursday with a march on City Hall intended to highlight the killings.

Tim Seeman, who runs the kitchen at Parasol's, a restaurant that recently was held up, sees some hope in this awakening.

"This is nothing new. This has been brewing for years and years. But finally people are admitting it," Mr. Seeman said.

Home In The Ruins (NYT)

New Orleans

As its problems mount, the Big Easy is becoming increasingly unnerved.

Local officials, who will never be mistaken for the brightest lights in the firmament, have been unable to stem a hideous wave of murders. On Tuesday Mayor C. Ray Nagin said, "Enough is enough," then added, "But we've said that before."

The public school system, one of the worst in the nation, is trying to sell off some of its buildings to help with a desperate cash crunch.

Most depressing, more than 17 months after the horror of Hurricane Katrina, mile after mile after mile of the city that loved to present itself as the epicenter of laughter and good times still lies in ruin.

New Orleans is a place that could use a hopeful sign of any kind, some positive development to signal that perhaps better times are coming.

Enter Ghebre Selassie Mehreteab. Most people call him Gabe, and so will I for the rest of this column. Gabe is a middle-aged bundle of energy who heads the NHP Foundation, a national nonprofit organization that has taken on the difficult mission of providing quality housing at rents that poor and middle-class families can afford. There is no more imperative need in New Orleans than affordable housing.

On Garden Oaks Drive in the Algiers neighborhood Gabe showed me a remarkable sight — a sparkling two-story apartment complex, neatly landscaped, that was owned by NHPF, was badly damaged by the hurricane, and is now being completely renovated at a cost of $20 million.

Nearby are buildings that look like the hurricane hit them yesterday. The NHPF complex, known as Forest Park, will have 284 solid, attractive, energy-efficient units completed this year, with tenants beginning to move in as early as May. The rents will range from $194 to $673 a month.

In New Orleans East, which had been completely submerged in the flood, I stood with Gabe and an architect at what was once the site of a housing complex known as Walnut Square. "New Orleans East was under water for eight days," said Gabe. "We had to raze it. It's demolished."

A quiet wind was blowing across the vast empty space where 18 residential buildings used to be.

The effort to rebuild Walnut Square, at a cost of $37 million, is already under way. There will be 209 apartments, with rents ranging from $130 to $820 a month. There will also be a commercial strip, a community center and day care facilities. (The apartments will be built on raised foundations to guard against future catastrophic floods.)

Eventually Gabe hopes to build 3,000 affordable rental apartments in and around New Orleans at a total cost of $300 million.

How does he do it, when others find the task so daunting?

The key, he said, is to combine the expertise of a successful real estate operation with the talent and vision of an experienced foundation committed to what is essentially a charitable mission. NHPF, which has its Louisiana office in Baton Rouge, gets the funds to build from government grants, tax credits and low-interest loans, as well as conventional financing.

As Gabe dryly noted, "There is not much profit in developing low- income housing."

No successful rebirth of New Orleans is possible without substantial amounts of new and rebuilt housing — housing that the city's very large percentage of low-income residents can afford. Most of the people homing in on development opportunities here have either no interest or no expertise in building such housing.

"There are essentially two kinds of organizations here," said Gabe. "You have out-of-town real estate developers who look at this as a tremendous opportunity and their main concern, quite naturally, has been how much money they can make. On the other hand, you have well-meaning nonprofit entities that unfortunately, in most cases, do not have the capacity to develop on a significant scale."

Compounding the problem has been the lack of housing expertise in New Orleans. Much of the city's housing stock pre-Katrina was so poor as to be illegal in most major American cities. The Housing Authority of New Orleans, which administered public housing, was in such bad shape its operations had to be taken over by the federal government.

Half the population of New Orleans has been dispersed across the United States. Many of those still in the city are living in trailers or are doubled up with relatives and friends. There is no way to overstate the desperate need for housing.

Gabe and the NHP Foundation have provided at least one model that works.

Death Rate Higher For Ex-Prisoners Than Current Inmates (WSJ)

By Keith J. Winstein

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

In what may be the first large-scale study of mortality among released prison inmates in the U.S., researchers found that getting out of jail can be hazardous to your health.

The death rate for ex-prisoners was four times that of current inmates, and more than triple the rate for the general population, even after the effects of age, sex and race were factored out. More than 30% of the excess deaths were due to drug overdoses.

Within the first two weeks after a prisoner is released, the figures were worse: former inmates were 13 times as likely to die as the population at large - and almost 80% of those extra deaths were from drug overdose.

After drug overdoses, the leading causes of the higher death rate were murders, heart disease and suicides.

The doctor who led the study, Ingrid A. Binswanger of the University of Colorado, said she was surprised that the difference in death rates was so large. The findings could indicate a substantial public health problem, since about 700,000 people are released from prison in the U.S. each year, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0115459

"These are preventable deaths, particularly the overdose deaths," said Martin Y. Iguchi, a UCLA public health professor who was not involved with the study. "We need to pay much more attention to inmates as they re-enter society."

The study, to be published in the New England Journal of Medicine Thursday, tracked 30,237 inmates released from the Washington state prison system between 1999 and 2003. Researchers cautioned that the figures, which are broadly consistent with previous studies in Finland and Australia, do not necessarily apply to the rest of the U.S.

Joan Petersilia, a University of California criminologist who wrote the book, "When Prisoners Come Home," said the study would underscore efforts to change what happens "at the moment of prison release."

For example, some states, including California, confiscate psychiatric medications upon release, requiring ex-prisoners to search by themselves for a psychiatrist to continue their prescriptions. "Often this doesn't happen, as you can imagine," she said -- leading to relapses and suicides.

Too Casual To Sit On Press Row? (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

When the trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice opens next week, scores of journalists are expected to throng the federal courtroom in Washington, far too many for the 100 seats set aside for the media.

But for the first time in a federal court, two of these seats will be reserved for bloggers. After two years of negotiations with judicial officials across the country, the Media Bloggers Association, a nonpartisan group with about 1,000 members working to extend the powers of the press to bloggers, has won credentials to rotate among his members. The trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the highest-ranking Bush administration official to face criminal charges, could "catalyze" the association's efforts to win respect and access for bloggers in federal and state courthouses, said Robert Cox, the association's president.

The new validation doesn't necessarily clarify the blurry line between bloggers and traditional journalists at a time when millions of people are discovering that they can project their opinions and expertise around the world with just a few keystrokes. The debates over the traditional checks-and-balances process that journalists follow are continuing, and some bloggers are resisting efforts to be put under the umbrella of the traditional news media.

"The Internet today is like the American West in the 1880s. It's wild, it's crazy and everybody's got a gun," said Thomas Kunkel, dean of the University of Maryland's journalism school. "There are no rules yet."

The common journalistic practices of verifying facts, seeking both sides of a story and subjecting an article to editing are honored mostly in the breach. Innuendo and rumor ricochet around the Internet as blogs link from one to another, at times making defamatory voices indistinguishable from the many others involved in this experiment of free expression.

Yet, after detailed talks with Cox, officials at the U.S. District Court decided that public awareness of court proceedings could be enhanced by his group's members, among them documentary filmmaker and journalist Rory O'Connor (http://www.roryoconnor.org/blog) and freelance writer James Joyner (http://www.outsidethebeltway.com).

"Bloggers can bring a depth of reporting that some traditional media organizations aren't able to achieve because of space and time limitations," said Sheldon Snook, administrative assistant to Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan. Snook added that some bloggers also bring expertise that is welcome in court.

Several media experts have been predicting a greater presence of bloggers in court -- as defendants. For instance, Kunkel, who is also president of the American Journalism Review, said courts might soon draw the limits of what is acceptable by imposing hefty libel and defamation judgments on bloggers, many of whom do not realize their writings can have expensive legal consequences.

According to the Media Law Resource Center, 69 lawsuits have been brought against bloggers nationwide, including a $1 million suit filed last year against Maine blogger Lance Dutson, who accused his state's tourism department of wasting taxpayer money in a promotional campaign. The advertising agency that developed it sued for libel, defamation and copyright infringement but ended up dropping the suit after advocates rallied to Dutson's defense.

Most cases against bloggers have not made it to trial. Cox, in an effort to head off suits, recently launched an initiative to raise the standards of his members through online education, holding out the prospect that they could then qualify for blogging liability insurance offered through the association.

Cox also envisions fostering an elite tier of bloggers and has been in talks with Harvard Law School about online courses associated with its Berkman Center for Internet & Society, which already offers several courses on the Web about various facets of law. By accepting the association's ethical standards and adopting an official policy for making corrections, members of this group would be credentialed by the association, which in turn would win them access to news and sporting events, advance copies of new books for review and entrance to advance screening of movies.

He had been focused in particular on working with the federal court in Washington to gain credentials for high-profile cases, starting with Libby's trial on charges that he lied to government agents and a grand jury investigating the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

Cox, who writes a blog called WordsInEdgewise, said he would assemble a diverse group of bloggers -- with various political outlooks from different parts of the country and readerships large and small -- to rotate throughout the Libby trial, including himself, O'Connor, Joyner and Dutson.

"The history of where blogging is going to go is not defined. It could go in a very positive direction or it could go in a very negative direction," Cox said. "We have to do more than just sit on our hands and see what happens."

The American Society of Newspaper Editors, which has endorsed a proposed federal shield law that would keep journalists from being forced to disclose confidential information in legal proceedings, has said that the shield should cover anyone involved in news-gathering activities, including bloggers.

Under Cox's plan, an online course focusing on the basics of media law would be offered in part by the Poynter Institute for Media Studies, a prominent journalism training organization in Florida that is interested in the issues of blogging. The organization became intimately aware this year of the pitfalls of blogging through a miscue of its own that has become a case study in the challenges that blogs face.

Poynter got sucked into the controversy following the July death of an Indianapolis Star photographer who had developed breathing troubles and collapsed in the newsroom. A Star retiree posted on her blog that management had contributed to the photographer's death because phones in the newsroom could not dial 911, something that she'd heard from staffers in the newsroom but that ultimately proved to be false.

"I was hot under the collar," the blogger, Ruth Holladay, said. "I went with what I wanted to say . . . I went with my gut."

Her entry caught the attention of Jim Romenesko, who posted a link on his widely read blog for the Poynter Institute but did not verify the story or contact the Star's management for comment. Nor was the entry viewed by an editor before it was published.

Dennis Ryerson, the Star's executive editor, said that no one blogged about Indiana's Occupational Safety and Health Administration clearing the newspaper of any wrongdoing in connection with the photographer's death. "Yet the postings that made those allegations are still available for anyone to read," he added.

The incident has prompted Poynter to revise its blogging guidelines.

Still, some of the Internet's most prominent bloggers have balked at the idea of journalistic codes of conduct, citing a 2006 study by the Pew Internet and American Life Project that found that only one-third of bloggers consider their writing to be a form of journalism.

"Blogs are first and foremost a conversation, people talking," said Jeff Jarvis, a journalist-turned-blogger who created a forum called BuzzMachine.

Blogs, he said, have a "different biorhythm" where postings that are initially inaccurate or unfair are corrected online through readers comments and updated blog entries. "This is a world," he said, "where you publish first and edit later."

Lawyers For Delphi Corp. To Ask Judge To Approve $3.4B Investment Plan Despite Objections (FINDLAW/AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Board members of Delphi Corp. decided on Wednesday to move forward in seeking the approval of a federal bankruptcy judge to allow five private equity and institutional investors to buy shares worth as much as $3.4 billion (â‚¬2.6 billion) in the company upon its reorganization.

Directors of the Troy, Michigan-based auto parts maker essentially rejected an unsolicited $4.7 billion (â‚¬3.6 billion) bid made by a rival investor. Judge Robert Drain was scheduled to consider the plan and objections in a Thursday hearing.

The plan is a crucial part of an overall transformation sought by the company, as it attempts to exit bankruptcy in the first half of this year. Objectors say it transfers a disproportionate amount of the company's value to the investors at the expense of other stakeholders in the case.

The plan allows affiliates of three private equity investors, Appaloosa Management LP, Cerberus Capital Management LP and Harbinger Capital Partners Master Fund I, as well as Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS Securities LLC, to buy shares in a restructured Delphi for $1.4 billion (â‚¬1.08 billion) to $3.4 billion (â‚¬2.62 billion). It would give the investors a minimum of 30 percent and up to 72 percent of the restructured company but also depends on consensual resolution of Delphi's labor agreements by Jan. 31.

Highland Capital Management LP made a competing proposal Dec. 21, three days after the original bid, to buy shares at a cost of $4.7 billion (â,¬3.62 billion). Highland has joined the acting U.S. Trustee, the official committee of equity security holders, the International Union of Electronic Workers-Communications Workers of America and two other unions in objecting to the Appaloosa-Cerberus plan.

The U.S. Trustee and the IUE-CWA, which represents the second-largest group of Delphi employees, objected in part based on their belief that the investment plan takes the place of the usual process of creating a bankruptcy reorganization plan since it outlines how some creditors would be paid.

The equity committee objected to fees and expenses Delphi would pay to Appaloosa and its partners once the judge approved the plan.

Delphi lawyers rebutted some of the objections Wednesday and also made certain changes to address concerns raised by the equity committee for how the investors would be reimbursed if the plan fails to be executed.

The Appaloosa-Cerberus investor group can terminate the agreement if the court has not approved it by Jan. 22.

Lawyers for General Motors Corp. supported the Delphi plan in a separate filing on Wednesday.

Delphi was part of GM until 1999 when it was spun off as a stand-alone company. GM remains its biggest customer and has participated in negotiations to resolve outstanding issues over its supply contracts and legacy labor obligations.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Weighing A Civil Rights Probe In Death (HC)

By Armando Villafranca And Brian Rogers, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, January 11, 2007

It may monitor internal inquiries into fatal shooting by HPD officer during traffic stop

The FBI said Wednesday that it likely will open a civil rights investigation to monitor ongoing inquiries into the shooting death of Robert McIntosh by a Houston police officer.

The move only will monitor investigations by local authorities and is not a formal investigation to determine whether McIntosh's civil rights were violated, said Shauna Dunlap, a spokeswoman for the FBI.

"Agents have been looking into the matter, and it looks likely that we will open a civil rights investigation to monitor the progress of the district attorney's investigation and the Houston Police Department internal affairs investigation," Dunlap said.

The decision came on a day punctuated with community activists' calls for a federal investigation of Houston police after two men were shot and killed in separate incidents this week. City and police officials said they would fully investigate McIntosh's death and that of Omar Esparza. Esparza, 21, described as mentally challenged and mentally ill, was shot to death Sunday at his East End home. Officers said he lunged at them with a hammer above his head.

McIntosh, 23, was shot to death Monday after a traffic stop in the Sunnyside area, prompting an outcry from community leaders when witnesses alleged the man was handcuffed before the shooting. He was unarmed.

One witness' accountOne witness, Yolanda Perry, who said she saw a Houston police officer fatally shoot McIntosh after handcuffing him, appeared Wednesday before a grand jury for more than hour but declined to comment about her testimony.

Perry, the wife of the Rev. George Perry, was subpoenaed after she declined to give a statement to authorities investigating the shooting.

She has said she was standing outside their church when she saw McIntosh being chased on Knoxville by Houston police officer Leonard Smith.

Smith had stopped a car in which McIntosh was a passenger about 1 p.m. Monday for a defective taillight. The driver, identified by police as McIntosh's girlfriend, was taken into custody in the 8700 block of Cullen on an arrest warrant from Bexar County.

Perry said McIntosh fought with Smith, then broke free and ran down Knoxville. Smith, whose thumb was broken in the scuffle, then fired his Taser, striking McIntosh in the back.

Perry has said the officer then handcuffed him and shot him three times.

The department's sideHPD officials have denied Perry's version of what happened, saying McIntosh was handcuffed after he was shot, a standard procedure to protect the officer.

Prosecutor Edward Porter declined to talk about what Perry told grand jurors because grand jury proceedings are secret.

DOJ_NMG_0115462

The district attorney's office investigates all shootings involving officers in Harris County, Porter said. He said it wasn't unusual that Perry was subpoenaed to explain her version of the events.

Porter said the investigation will continue and invited witnesses to the shooting to come forward.

Activist Quanell X, who accompanied Perry to her grand jury appearance, said Harris County officials were "disrespectful" and indifferent to Perry, as she waited eight to nine hours to give a statement Tuesday.

"It was not necessary to make her appear," Quanell X said. "I think they were upset and agitated that they couldn't get a statement from her at (her) church."

After Perry testified Wednesday, Quanell X renewed calls for an outside agency to investigate the shooting.

Dunlap said the FBI decided to wait until it reviews the case and meets with other agencies involved in the investigation before deciding to launch a probe. If the FBI opens an investigation, she said, it may come in the next few days.

"We have to gather the facts and take a look at what's out there," she said.

How a formal probe worksThe FBI usually does not open a formal investigation until after an internal investigation is complete. If any evidence of wrongdoing is found, she said, the FBI then can open a formal investigation.

Councilman Jarvis Johnson, who represents District B in northeast Houston, called for a town meeting to discuss the deaths.

He said residents feel deceived by and afraid of police, because police accounts do not match those of witnesses.

"It really puts us in a precarious situation as to how do we tell our citizens that our police force is forthright," he said during a City Council meeting Wednesday. "You're pitting community against police force."

Mayor Bill White said he would support a community meeting. He avoided commenting on on the specific cases but said residents should think twice before threatening police.

"Officers need to be able to protect themselves," he said.

White also expressed support for Police Chief Harold Hurtt, who said both cases would be investigated and corrective action taken if necessary.

"I think people see that we have a professional, productive police force," White said.

Community reaches outOn Wednesday night, dozens gathered for a candlelight vigil where McIntosh was shot.

His mother, Doretta, placed a candle near a cross while attendees sang We Shall Overcome.

Minister Robert Muhammad, of the Nation of Islam Mosque No. 45, said a prayer for McIntosh's family and the Sunnyside community. "Let Brother Robert's death not be in vain," Muhammad said. "And God bless us to return to our homes safely and come out of our homes safely and be with us on Dr. (Martin Luther) King's birthday, so that we may stand up for justice, so that our babies are not taken from us."

Chronicle staffers Robert Crowe and Alexis Grant contributed to this report.

FBI May Investigate Police Shooting Of Handcuffed Black Man (FINDLAW/AP)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A woman who claims she saw a Houston police officer shoot and kill a handcuffed black man testified before a grand jury Wednesday, and federal investigators said they likely will launch a civil rights investigation.

Houston police Officer Leonard D. Smith shot and killed Robert B. McIntosh of Houston during a traffic stop. Police say McIntosh, who was a passenger in the car and fled the scene, was shot after fighting with Smith and shooting him with his police Taser, which uses jolts of electricity to subdue people.

McIntosh's shooting prompted Quanell X, a local activist and frequent critic of the Houston Police Department, to demand a federal investigation, saying McIntosh was the victim of "a cold-blooded murder."

FBI spokeswoman Shauna Dunlap said Wednesday such an investigation likely will be announced soon.

"There is a strong possibility that in the next couple of days, we will open a civil rights investigation," Dunlap told The Associated Press.

In the past, federal authorities in Houston have prosecuted Houston police for civil rights violations when a local grand jury declined to indict them in shootings of civilians.

Harris County District Attorney Chuck Rosenthal said a grand jury heard testimony Wednesday from Yolanda Perry, who said she saw the officer shoot McIntosh after he was already in handcuffs.

"We went to the grand jury on that today because we had an eyewitness who said she saw something completely different than what everybody else saw," Rosenthal said.

Rosenthal said investigators also have statements from other witnesses who back the police officer, saying they heard the shots and then saw Smith handcuffing McIntosh.

Perry has not returned telephone calls from The AP.

Jury Takes Break In Texas Smuggling Case (HC/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, January 11, 2007

HOUSTON — A truck driver facing a possible death sentence for a smuggling attempt in which 19 illegal immigrants died locked in his sweltering tractor-trailer will have to wait until at least next week to learn his fate.

The jury deliberating whether to sentence Tyrone Williams to death for what became the nation's deadliest human smuggling attempt is taking a five-day break, U.S. District Judge Lee Rosenthal told attorneys Wednesday.

Jurors decided to wait until Tuesday to resume their deliberations because the judge was scheduled to be out of town Thursday and Friday and the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday is Monday.

Jurors deliberated for about eight hours Wednesday without reaching a verdict. They have deliberated a total of about 14 hours since Tuesday.

The jury is deciding whether to sentence Williams to death or life in prison without parole, or to let Rosenthal issue a sentence that could range from no incarceration to life in prison without parole.

Williams was convicted last month on 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting immigrants, including 20 counts that were death-penalty eligible.

During the 2003 smuggling attempt from South Texas to Houston, more than 70 immigrants were packed inside Williams' airtight trailer. After the immigrants succumbed to the deadly heat, Williams abandoned the container near Victoria, about 100 miles southwest of Houston. Nineteen died from dehydration, overheating and suffocation.

Defense attorney Craig Washington told jurors Williams never intended for the immigrants to die and questioned why his client is the only defendant in the case facing the death penalty.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez told jurors Williams deserves to die because he knew the immigrants were dying and did nothing to help them.

During the retrial's punishment phase, Williams' relatives told jurors he was a kind person and asked them to spare his life. Relatives of the 19 victims asked for justice but didn't specify whether that meant a death sentence.

Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen who lived in Schenectady, N.Y., is one of 14 people charged in the case.

In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury couldn't agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the verdict, saying the jury failed to specify his role in the crime.

Judge Says Arizona Can't Seize Western Union Money Transfers (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

The state of Arizona has no authority to seize thousands of Western Union Co. money transfers to Mexico that originated outside of Arizona, a state court has ruled.

The finding, which was filed Tuesday, is a victory for Western Union, Englewood, Colo., which relies on electronic money transfers to Mexico as a mainstay of its business. Such transfers make up about 10% of its money transfers.

The company, which had said the seizures were scaring away Latino customers, expressed relief at the decision. "Western Union is a trusted friend of the Latino community, and we're very pleased with today's ruling," said Christina Gold, the company's chief executive, in a statement. She said the company would continue to cooperate with the state of Arizona "in meeting its legitimate law enforcement needs."

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said he will contest the Superior Court's order halting the state's seizure warrant in the Arizona Court of Appeals. He said he is confident his office can provide evidence that the money transfers, while occurring outside of Arizona, are linked to Arizona crimes, and that Arizona authorities should be allowed to intercept them as part of its battle against illegal human trafficking.

"We believe this is incorrect on the law," he said, adding that nevertheless, seizures will remain halted until the matter is finally resolved. He described the court order as a "roadblock" in "what has been a very effective way of disrupting the coyote smuggling activities," using a common term for the traffickers.

Mr. Goddard, as part of a crackdown on payments to traffickers of illegal immigrants, moved on Sept. 21 to block all Western Union money transfers of at least $500 going to the Mexican state of Sonora, and originating in 29 U.S. states. The states included California, New York, Florida, Illinois and Georgia.

Senders of the funds were given no notice of the seizures, and were required to contact the state to prove the funds were legally obtained before they would be returned.

Western Union quickly filed a motion to challenge the seizures, which were halted pending the outcome of a court ruling. In Tuesday's ruling, a judge in the state Superior Court in Maricopa County found in favor of the company, saying the state's seizure warrant is "invalid" and "unconstitutional" because the state lacks jurisdiction outside of its borders.

Western Union, a force in global money transfers, operates through a network of about 285,000 agent locations in 200 countries.

Arizona Judge Strikes Down Effort To Seize Immigrant Smuggling Money (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jacques Billeaud, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - PHOENIX-A judge struck down the first effort by prosecutors to seize suspected immigrant smuggling money flowing from other U.S. states into Mexico.

The ruling released Wednesday found the effort by the Arizona Attorney General's office was unconstitutional and barred prosecutors from seizing money that was not sent to or received in the state. Arizona is the United States' busiest illegal entry point.

For more than four years, prosecutors had used special court orders that allowed them to seize $17 million (â‚¬13 million) in wire transfers flowing to Arizona that authorities said were payments to smugglers.

Mexico depends heavily on money wired from Mexicans who are working in the United States. Some lawmakers in Mexico denounced the seizure effort.

The efforts were so successful that smugglers began to route their payments from other American states to Mexico, even as traffickers continued to sneak people in through Arizona, prosecutors said. Authorities responded by trying to seize money transfers going into the northern Mexican state of Sonora.

Western Union, the biggest wire transfer company operating in Arizona with more than 1,700 sites, challenged the move and persuaded a judge in September to temporarily put the broader approach on hold. The company argued state prosecutors had no power to interfere with transfers into another country. Prosecutors said the new approach was necessary because smugglers are still using Arizona as their illegal crossing point.

The new ruling concluded prosecutors had not shown they have jurisdiction for the broader approach and had not demonstrated that the Western Union customers in question were involved in crimes. It said the approach violated protections for interstate and international commerce under the U.S. Constitution.

Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard, who planned to appeal the decision, said in a statement that the special court orders were responsible for deterring many illicit money transfers and led to the arrests of more than 100 immigrant smugglers, also known as "coyotes."

"It will not deter our efforts to use all legal means to apprehend 'coyotes' and fight human smuggling in Arizona," said Goddard, whose office has said immigrant smuggling in the state is a $1.7 billion (â‚¬1.3 billion) a year business.

Before a judge put the practice on hold in September, prosecutors were allowed to seize suspected smuggling transfers of $500 (â‚¬385) or more from 28 other American states to 26 locations in Sonora.

Arrests Of World Trade Organization Protesters In 1999 At Issue In Seattle Trial (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gene Johnson, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - SEATTLE-A lawyer for as many as 200 people arrested in an emergency "no protest zone" established during the 1999 World Trade Organization demonstrations asked a federal jury to hold the city accountable for violating the protesters' constitutional rights.

U.S. District Judge Marsha Pechman has already ruled that police made the arrests without probable cause. The protesters are hoping to prove the police had a policy of targeting protesters for their anti-WTO opinions, or at least that the actions of officers were approved by higher-ups; if so, the city could face millions of dollars in damages in a subsequent liability phase of the trial.

"My clients were not throwing bricks. They were not interfering with police," attorney Mike Withey said in his opening statement Tuesday. "The policy was to arrest people based on their viewpoint."

City attorney Ted Buck said the overwhelmed officers didn't care what opinions the protesters held; they simply wanted to keep the downtown core clear so that police, emergency workers, WTO delegates and others would be able to do their jobs.

The week of the arrests, about 50,000 protesters had swarmed Seattle, overwhelming police and closing down the WTO meeting. The mayor imposed a curfew and limited the downtown core to WTO delegates, police and emergency workers, store employees, residents and shoppers.

The area became known as the "no-protest zone," even though shoppers, residents and others allowed in the zone were not exempted from protesting.

The group of demonstrators were arrested when they marched within the zone, where they sat down, chanted and sang.

In pretrial motions, the judge found that police made no effort to determine whether the protesters were residents of the area, shoppers, delegates or had other reasons to be in the zone.

Republicans Seek To Keep Border Agents Out Of Jail (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Republican House members yesterday asked President Bush to keep two U.S. Border Patrol agents out of prison pending their appeal of convictions for shooting a suspected drug smuggler in the buttocks as he fled into Mexico.

"Several discrepancies in the government's case strongly question whether justice has been served, and permitting these men to be incarcerated in the interim puts their lives at risk," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher of California said at a Capitol Hill press conference.

"We're going to find out whose side you're on ... the American people or the side of our enemies," Mr. Rohrabacher said in a reference to Mr. Bush. "If you let these two men go to jail for defending us, then we'll know you're on the side of our enemies."

He was joined by Reps. Duncan Hunter of California, Ted Poe of Texas, Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Joe Wilson of South Carolina and Tom Tancredo of Colorado.

In lieu of a pardon, a letter petitioning Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales was presented during the press conference asking the Justice Department to direct federal prosecutors not to oppose a motion filed in a Texas court to keep the agents free on bond during the appeals process.

Agents Ignacio Ramos, 37, and Jose Alonso Compean, 28, were sentenced in October in federal court in El Paso, Texas, to 11 and 12 years, respectively, for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A jury convicted the two agents in March after a two-week trial. They are scheduled to report to prison Wednesday. Compean and his wife, Patty, attended yesterday's press conference.

"I urge Attorney General Gonzales to allow these men to go free on bail while the appeals process is under way," Mr. Wilson said. "We must stand with our nation's heroes -- not the criminals who disregard our laws.

"Our border agents risk their lives daily to uphold our immigration laws and defend our borders," he said. "If the conviction of Ramos and Compean is an indication of how our government will repay them, we can be certain good men and women will soon flee the ranks of Border Patrol service."

Last month, Mr. Rohrabacher announced a petition drive calling for the commutation of the sentences for the two agents. His spokeswoman, Tara Setmayer, said yesterday the petition effort has garnered 220,000 signatures so far and will be presented to the president shortly.

Mr. Rohrabacher has called on Mr. Bush to "do the right thing and not allow the lives and families of these fine men to be destroyed."

Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said it would be "inappropriate" to comment on any potential pardons. He directed inquiries to federal prosecutors.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a possible drug case. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned near Fabens, Texas, near the U.S.-Mexico border.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande. Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

Officer's Exoneration In Teen's Death Stirs Calls For Civilian Oversight (LAT)

By Matt Lait And Steve Hymon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

LAPD panel's secret decision to exonerate the officer who shot Devin Brown brings calls for public access to disciplinary hearings.

Angered by an administrative panel's secret decision not to punish the Los Angeles Police Department officer who fatally shot a 13-year-old boy, City Council members and community leaders called Wednesday for increasing civilian oversight of misconduct cases and reopening them to public scrutiny.

"People are always going to have different views on how cops should be punished for shootings, but all the facts should be out in the open and there ought to be accountability for the ultimate decision-makers," said Councilman Jack Weiss, head of the city's Public Safety Committee.

Weiss said he would hold a joint hearing with the Police Commission in upcoming weeks to discuss ways to make LAPD discipline "more transparent."

Other city officials, including Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, also said they were disappointed to learn that an internal LAPD disciplinary panel meeting held behind closed doors this week rejected the civilian Police Commission's findings that Officer Steven Garcia should be punished for the Feb. 6, 2005, shooting of Devin Brown.

"I supported the Police Commission decision in this matter," Villaraigosa said. "That should tell you my feelings about this."

Some city leaders were even more outraged that the decision was shrouded in secrecy.

"This lack of public disclosure deepens suspicion in the African American community that the LAPD is more interested in protecting officers than in curbing police abuse," said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, president of the Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable.

Councilman Bernard C. Parks, who led the LAPD from 1997 to 2002, said holding disciplinary hearings in private undermines confidence in the Police Department.

"After 30 years of progressive efforts to make the public aware, we've had a complete reversal," Parks said. "This is unraveling decades of hard-fought battles."

Although disciplinary hearings have historically been open to the public, police officials changed department policy late last year in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that restricted access to law enforcement personnel records in a San Diego case.

Parks said the LAPD is going beyond what the court decided in that case — Copley vs. Superior Court — noting that the ruling "specifically says it does not address meetings."

Police Chief William J. Bratton and Police Commission President John Mack said they support greater public openness, but were compelled to close hearings because of legal advice from City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo, who has interpreted the court's ruling as giving officers broad privacy protections. A spokesman for Delgadillo's office declined to discuss the advice, saying such matters were confidential.

Even though Bratton and commission officials touted their desire to provide greater public access, in many ways they have been more secretive about police conduct than past LAPD leaders.

Last year, for example, the Police Commission changed a decades-old policy and began issuing public reports without the names of officers involved in shootings. At that time, state Sen. Gloria Romero (D-Los Angeles) offered to sponsor legislation to ensure that names would not be struck from public police records if commission members had concerns about potential court restrictions.

On Wednesday, Romero said she had not heard from commission officials since the court decision.

"My offer still stands," Romero said. "If the city of Los Angeles, from the mayor to the City Council to the commission, want help, I can carry the legislation…. It's a sad day for those of us who believe that policing should be done in the public."

Romero said the developments in the Brown case also show that the commission needs greater power over officer discipline. Under the City Charter, the commission has the authority to set broad policy, but cannot independently impose discipline.

"On paper, there is civilian oversight, but this illustrates that the commission has no teeth. Its teeth got kicked out inside a closet."

Several council members said they would support any legislative remedy to reopen boards to the public, whether by state legislative action or a change in the City Charter.

"Boards," Parks said, "should always be open."

DOJ_NMG_0115467

Councilman Greig Smith, a reserve LAPD officer, was one elected official who believed that the disciplinary panel was right to exonerate Garcia.

"The Police Commission is the one that erred," Smith said.

Smith also supported closed discipline hearings, saying it protects the rights of the innocent.

"I understand their concerns," Smith said after hearing Hutchinson's comments. "But these are the same people who have been criticizing the Police Department for as long as I can remember, and no matter what we do they will not be satisfied."

Two years ago, when the Brown shooting occurred, community activists accused Garcia of using excessive force.

The officer mortally wounded Brown near 83rd Street and Western Avenue in South Los Angeles as the boy backed a stolen Toyota Camry toward a police car after a brief car chase. Police said Brown was driving erratically and that they suspected him of drunk driving.

Garcia, who was unaware at the time that the vehicle was stolen, fired 10 shots, hitting the youth seven times. The Police Commission, in a 4-1 vote, determined that the shooting violated department rules, saying that evidence showed Garcia was outside the path of the vehicle and in no danger at the time he opened fire. Commissioners said they expected Garcia to be punished. The city also agreed to pay $1.5 million to settle a wrongful-death lawsuit brought by Brown's family.

Although police sources confirmed to The Times that the LAPD administrative panel found that Garcia's actions were justified, the rationale for the decision remains secret.

On Wednesday, as elected officials voiced concern over the panel's vindication of Garcia, residents in South Los Angeles expressed disappointment but were less surprised.

"This is so unfair," said Mollie Bell, a local activist. "In this profession, they never mess up. They never make a mistake. Every day you hear about lawyers or politicians. They make mistakes on the job. They screw up. Doctors get fired for malpractice. Everybody gets punished except the police. They always come out on top."

Ed Brimmer, a 69-year-old retired LAPD detective who was awarded the department's Medal of Valor in 1971, saw the incident through the eyes of a veteran police officer.

"It's sad, it's very tragic," said Brimmer of the shooting. "But I don't think the officer got up that day and said, 'I'm going to go kill a black child.' Police officers are afraid too. They have to protect themselves too."

Rod Wright, a former assemblyman, said he's seen cases like this before.

"In this case everybody loses," he said. "The Police Commission said the shooting was out of policy, the council approved a settlement, the police chief said it was justified and now there's no punishment. Who's in charge?"

University Of Michigan Drops Affirmative Action For Now (WP/AP)

By David N. Goodman, Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

School Will Continue Its Legal Fight Against a Ban on the Practice, However

The University of Michigan announced Wednesday that it will comply with a new voter-approved ban on affirmative action and immediately stop considering race and gender in admissions.

The move came in the middle of the admissions process for next fall's freshman class. The university has already begun sending out acceptance and rejection letters.

The state constitutional amendment approved by the voters in November banned the use of race and gender preferences in public university admissions and government hiring and contracting.

After it passed, the university put its admission process on hold and asked the courts that it be given until summer to comply with the ban, saying it would be too disruptive to change its policies now. But a federal appeals court said no.

"We cannot sustain any further delay in our admissions process without harming our ability to enroll a class of students for the 2007-08 academic year," said Teresa A. Sullivan, executive vice president of academic affairs.

The university will continue its legal challenge of the measure in the meantime, Sullivan said.

"This is a big step forward, there's no doubt about it. It's good news," said Terence Pell, president of the Center for Individual Rights, a group that sued to force immediate compliance with the ban. "It's a watershed moment."

The university said that it would use other criteria that are not explicitly race- or gender-based to achieve diversity. Those include geographic diversity, the level of education completed by students' parents, and whether students attended a disadvantaged school.

Michigan: University To Comply With Ruling (NYT)

By Tamar Lewin

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

The University of Michigan acceded to a federal appeals court decision and said it would immediately comply with the state's new ban on affirmative action in public education, employment or contracting. The Michigan ballot initiative banning preferences based on race or gender passed overwhelmingly in November and was to go into effect on Dec. 23. But the University of Michigan, together with Michigan State University and Wayne State University, went to court seeking a six-month delay, on the ground that they were midway through an admissions cycle. A federal district judge granted the delay on Dec. 19, but on Dec. 29, a federal appeals court ordered immediate compliance.

Florida Adopts Plan For Mentally Ill Inmates (NYT)

By Christine Jordan Sexton

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

TALLAHASSEE, Fla., Jan. 10 — About 300 mentally ill inmates in county jails throughout Florida will eventually be moved to psychiatric hospitals and residential centers for treatment after state lawmakers agreed on Wednesday to an emergency spending measure.

The Legislative Budget Commission, a panel of the Florida Legislature meeting in an emergency session, voted unanimously to spend nearly $19 million before July 1 to provide 373 more psychiatric beds for mentally ill inmates and more community services for mentally ill people at risk of being jailed.

The decision comes after a state circuit judge charged Lucy Hadi, the former secretary of the Department of Children and Families, with indirect criminal contempt for keeping mentally ill inmates in jail longer than state law allows. Ms. Hadi, who resigned last month, was fined $80,000.

State law requires the department to move inmates found incompetent to stand trial from county jails to psychiatric hospitals within 15 days of receiving a commitment order. The number of inmates found incompetent has increased by 16 percent over the last two fiscal years. As of Tuesday, nearly 250 mentally ill inmates had waited more than 15 days for treatment. In all, nearly 300 inmates are waiting for treatment.

"The state has not sat idly by," said Bob Butterworth, the new secretary of the Department of Children and Families, a Democrat chosen by Gov. Charlie Crist, a Republican, to head the beleaguered agency. "We've taken action. That's all we can do."

The extra beds will cost $16.6 million and be scattered across the state at private centers and state-run hospitals. One hundred secure beds, where patients are constantly supervised, will be available in South Florida by May, said Don Winstead, deputy secretary of the Department of Children and Families. The state plans to have a total of 1,822 secure and residential beds by June.

Lawmakers also approved spending $3.1 million more to provide other services for the mentally ill, like housing, medication stipends and outpatient mental health services.

To continue to provide the additional beds and support services beyond June, however, the Legislature will need to appropriate an additional $54.5 million, state budget analysts say. Mr. Crist said the Legislature had a duty to provide the additional money.

State Senator Stephen R. Wise, Republican of Jacksonville, said the state should try to save money by providing more residential treatment beds, which are less expensive than the secure beds.

"I don't want to be able to buy a Ferrari," Mr. Wise said, "but I want to have the option of being able to buy a Prius or a Buick or something less expensive than a Ferrari."

The Michael Nifong Scandal (WSJ)

By Dorothy Rabinowitz

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

No one could have imagined, when the story began last March, how soon and completely that bit of shorthand -- "the Duke University scandal" -- would be transformed.

Scarcely 10 months after, the term is now almost universally understood as a reference to the operations of Michael Nifong, the Durham County district attorney (pictured nearby), whose abandonment of all semblance of concern about the merits of the rape and assault accusations against three Duke University students was obvious from the first. So was his abundant confidence while broadcasting comments on the guilt of the accused. He seemed a man immune to concerns for appearances as he raced about expounding on the case against the accused lacrosse players and calling them hooligans. He would hear nothing by way of concern from Duke administrators (seven months into this affair, the university president did find an opportunity to mention the accused students' right to a presumption of innocence) -- and certainly none from the politically progressive quarters of the Duke faculty who lent their names to an impassioned ad thanking everyone who had come out to march in protest against the rape and assault of the exotic dancer; 88 faculty members signed it, among them such Duke luminaries as Alice Kaplan, author and student of fascism, and Frank Lentricchia, literary critic.

Unable to take part in the ad signing, Duke's administrators nonetheless found ways to identify with its spirit. Soon after news broke of the Duke athletes' alleged brutish sex crimes against a black woman, the administration undertook a well-publicized campaign targeting the entire lacrosse team for offensive behavior. President Richard Brodhead was, it seems, barely able to recover from the shock of his discovery that a party thrown by male jocks could occasion heavy drinking. And related loutish behavior. Not to mention a stripper. Lacrosse was suspended for the season, and the team coach, Mike Pressler, was shortly after forced to resign. Mr. Brodhead in due course reinstated the team, but on probation, and with conditions, i.e., no underage drinking and disorderly conduct, and no harassment. The members of other Duke organizations, sports teams included, which had sponsored parties where alcohol flowed freely and which had featured strippers -- an informal count reveals at least 20 known to have done so -- no doubt understood that they faced no similar disciplinary action. The reason for the moral-cleansing program devised for the lacrosse team could scarcely have been missed.

Mr. Nifong's confidence that he had nothing to fear from establishment opinion or from the leaders of the great university as he bounded about making hash of the rules of justice -- prime among them the accused's right to a presumption of innocence -- proved justified. And might have remained so longer but for the catastrophic effects of the accuser's unraveling stories.

Mr. Nifong is no anomaly -- merely a product of the political times, a prosecutor who has absorbed all the clues about the sanctified status now accorded charges involving rape, child sex-abuse and accusations of racism. Which has in turn ensured their transformation into weapons of unequalled power. Like others before him, the DA quickly grasped the career possibilities open to him with such a case and proceeded accordingly -- denouncing racism, and the rape and assault of a helpless black woman, and the Duke athletes guilty of these crimes in every media interview available to him (and they were many). * * *

For all the public shock and fury over his behavior, there is little that is new or strange about Mr. Nifong. We have seen the likes of this district attorney, uninterested in proofs of innocence, willing to suppress any he found, many times in the busy army of prosecutors claiming to have found evidence of rampant child abuse in nursery schools and other child-care centers around the country in the 1980s and throughout most of the '90s. They built case after headline-making case charging the mass molestation of small children, and managed to convict scores of innocent Americans on the basis of testimony no rational mind could credit. Law officers who regularly violated requirements of due process in their effort to obtain a conviction, they grasped the special advantage that was theirs: That for a prosecutor dealing with molestation, and wearing the mantle of avenger, there was no such thing as excess, no limits to what could be said of the accused. In court, rules could be bent, any charges presented, and nonexistent medical evidence proclaimed as proof positive of the accusation.

In his role of avenger of a young black woman alleged to have been brutalized by white males, Mr. Nifong proceeded with similar assurance. His was a crusade. Who but enemies of the good would object? Confronted with hard questions about his evidence, whether from the defense or the press, Mr. Nifong answered that these challenges were all designed to intimidate the rape victim. More than once the DA suggested, as criticisms of his case multiplied, that he was himself a victim of the press. He could have had little complaint, last summer, about the New York Times, which provided its own reports on the Duke story. It maintained that that the DA's case had been distorted by the defense and that there was, in fact, a body of evidence that supported the decision to take the case to a jury. A close study of this work's wondrous logic, and of its body of evidence, should provide rich material for students of the press for years to come.

The jury to which Mr. Nifong played -- the black population of Durham -- duly helped re-elect him. This could not prevent his case of rape and abuse against the three Duke students from coming undone, thanks in part to his own heedless behavior but mainly to the accusing dancer herself, whose shifting stories and checkered past could not be hidden.

Mr. Nifong had, of course, nothing like the advantages of nursery school prosecutors: endearing 4- and 5-year-old witnesses clutching teddy bears, who came to court to recite lies they had been cajoled into inventing, about how the accused had raped and stabbed them, cut off the legs of animals -- the kinds of charges mounted, against elderly Violet Amirault of Massachusetts and her adult children Cheryl and Gerald, proprietors of the respected Fells Acres Day School. Many like them were caught up in the era's whirlwind of accusation and sensational trials invariably leading to conviction, on which ambitious prosecutors built careers. Almost all those cases would ultimately be thrown out by appeals courts, most of the time not before those convicted had served long years and paid with the ruin of their lives.

Mr. Nifong's case has come undone long before any trial, fortunately for the three Duke students charged. They have had, nevertheless, a powerful taste of what it means to have been named and despised as perpetrators of abhorrent sexual crimes. I could go to prison for 30 years, Reade Seligmann, one of the accused, told the late Ed Bradley during a "60 Minutes" interview last October -- and "for something that never happened"

Neither Mr. Seligmann nor the other accused Duke students will ever have to contend with a punishment like the one meted out to Gerald Amirault, who was sentenced to a 30- to 40-year term for something that never happened -- atrocious sex crimes that never took place, of which there was no physical evidence, or anything resembling a credible allegation. What did it matter that the child's testimony that resulted in Gerald's conviction had claimed rape with a large butcher's knife -- one that had magically left not the slightest injury? The jury's most important duty was, the prosecutors informed them, to believe the children and show that they honored their testimony. The same young witness also testified that Gerald was accompanied by a green, silver and yellow robot, R2-D2, from "Star Wars."

What did it matter, either, that special judicial hearings about the Amiraults' prosecution had concluded that it was a travesty, that a tough panel of former prosecutors, the Governor's Board of Pardons, had virtually declared Gerald Amirault innocent and voted for commutation of his sentence -- or that he was finally granted parole nearly three years ago, after nearly 18 years' imprisonment? He was almost immediately classified by Massachusetts's Sex Offenders Registry Board as a Level 3 offender. The kind, that is, deemed the most dangerous and most likely to re-offend. This bizarre classification, the board made clear, had to do with the number of counts of sex abuse charged to him -- and the fact, too, that he continued to deny guilt. He now has to wear a large tracking device around his ankle, and obey a curfew confining him to the house from 11:30 p.m. to 6 a.m. every day. He has, not surprisingly, been unable to find a job. He is sustained, as ever, by the unstinting devotion of his family, and he grieves now mainly for the loss of the chance he had dreamed of in prison -- of earning a salary and finally lightening the burden his wife had carried, uncomplaining and alone, during his years in prison. (He has recently been advised of pending legislation that will require him to pay $10 a day for the global positioning tag on his leg, that tracks him.)

The accused Duke students can be grateful that the case against them has collapsed, and that Mr. Nifong now confronts a serious ethics complaint filed by the North Carolina State Bar. They will never have to face anything like the malignant force which descended on the happy and ambitious Amiraults in 1984, and turned their lives to dust. But Reade Seligmann, David Evans and Collin Finnerty have this year had a look into an abyss that has claimed many others, and that is never less than terrorizing. It is a piece of their Duke education they are unlikely to forget.

ANTITRUST:

US Airways Raises Bid For Delta To $10.2 Billion (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

US Airways turned up the pressure yesterday in its hostile takeover bid for bankrupt Delta Air Lines by boosting its offer, setting a February deadline for action and sending its top executive to Capitol Hill to reassure legislators that a merger would not harm consumers.

The push comes as US Airways appeared to have lost some momentum in its effort to entice Delta's creditors to accept its bid. Yesterday, it increased its original offer, about $8.6 billion, to $10.2 billion, including $5 billion in cash and nearly 90 million shares of US Airways stock.

Attorneys representing Delta's creditors committee did not return phone messages or e-mails seeking comment. US Airways chief executive W. Douglas Parker said in an interview that his company increased its bid because he "wanted to remove any doubt as to which proposal offered more money to the creditors."

With creditors considering "the risk of our plan against the risk of a stand-alone plan," US Airways wanted to "make that choice that much easier for them," Parker said.

Analysts yesterday said US Airways' latest offer would probably be taken seriously by Delta's creditors. "While it is likely that a US Airways-Delta merger could take longer to close than Delta emerging from bankruptcy, one cannot ignore the magnitude of the cash component" of the offer, Merrill Lynch analyst Michael Linenberg wrote in a research note.

Parker set a Feb. 1 deadline for creditors to respond to the offer by meeting conditions that would include Delta opening its financial books for review. US Airways is running against a deadline to reap the benefits of combining the carriers while Delta is still under Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection.

With Delta in bankruptcy protection, US Airways could more easily rework contracts and leases for planes and other high-cost items.

DOJ_NMG_0115471

Last month, Delta submitted a reorganization plan to the U.S. Bankruptcy Court that valued the company at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Its chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, said in an interview last month that he wanted Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a stand-alone carrier. He shrugged off suggestions that he would seek partners.

But reports on the Wall Street Journal's Web site yesterday indicated that executives at Delta and another carrier in bankruptcy protection, Northwest Airlines, have been discussing a merger. Representatives of both airlines declined to comment on the reports.

US Airways' original bid for Delta in November sparked speculation in the industry about potential mergers. Continental and United airlines have been talking, according to sources with knowledge of the conversations. And Northwest has asked a bankruptcy judge for permission to hire financial consultants to help it plan for the possibility of a merger.

The merger talk led the Senate Commerce Committee to announce that it would hold a hearing on the issue Jan. 24. Committee Chairman Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii) did not respond to requests for comment.

Delta is based in Atlanta, and Georgia's senators have been critical of the proposed US Airways-Delta merger and sent a letter to the Commerce Committee requesting the hearing.

Calling US Airways a "bottom fisher" for targeting Delta as it attempts to emerge from bankruptcy protection, Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) said in an interview that a merger would hurt consumers because a combined airline would cut flights to small and mid-size markets now served by both carriers.

When US Airways announced its offer, Isakson said he called U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to urge his department to "purse every competitive issue they need to pursue." The Justice Department would analyze a potential merger between the airlines for antitrust violations.

Congressional concerns about a merger prompted Parker to visit a dozen legislators on Capitol Hill this week. He declined to identify the lawmakers but said he looked forward to the possibility of testifying before the Commerce Committee.

"It will give us the opportunity to explain . . . that this is good for consumers and good for our industry," he said.

Some analysts said that a deal would face serious obstacles and that creditors may not be swayed just by the extra cash. The creditors could decide that the money would not make up for the headaches of a potentially grueling regulatory approval process at the Justice Department. Also, executives would have to combine two very different workforces -- one of which is fiercely fighting a merger, the analysts said.

"The creditors are sitting there going, 'It's more money, but will it get done?' " said Helane Becker, an analyst with the Benchmark Co. Delta coming out of bankruptcy protection "is the safer offer because it is the one that gets done sooner rather than later."

Staff researcher Richard Drezen contributed to this report.

US Airways Pumps Up Hostile Bid For Delta (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 11, 2007

The merger plot just thickened at Delta Air Lines.

US Airways bumped up its takeover bid for the Atlanta-based airline by 20 percent Wednesday, to $10.3 billion, adding a Feb. 1 deadline in a move to pressure Delta's bankruptcy court creditors — who have a big say in whether the deal goes through.

Industry analysts said that should give Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways a better shot at persuading the creditors to choose its hostile takeover bid over Delta management's plan to emerge from Chapter 11 as an independent carrier.

But a report also surfaced that Delta and Northwest Airlines, also in Chapter 11 proceedings, have had talks about a possible merger after they both exit bankruptcy.

Citing unidentified sources, the Wall Street Journal reported that the two airlines were talking at various levels of management.

It said Delta and its creditors may see a post-bankruptcy link-up with Northwest as a better alternative to the US Airways bid. The Journal also said Delta and United Airlines have had contacts.

A merger involving Delta and any of those possible partners would create the world's biggest airline. It would require approval of the U.S. Justice Department, which historically has taken a dim view of such large-scale deals.

Delta declined to comment on the report. It could be holding limited talks with other carriers as part of its obligation to creditors. Under bankruptcy law, Delta's management has an obligation to creditors, the ultimate owners of the reorganizing company, to seriously examine options.

Delta executives have rebuffed the US Airways bid — first launched in November — and insist they want to bring the airline out of Chapter 11 on its own. But they have not ruled out later deals. Indeed, CEO Gerald Grinstein has long predicted an eventual industry consolidation.

Delta said in a statement that its board will review the revised US Airways offer. But it added: "On its face, the revised proposal does not address significant concerns that have been raised about the initial US Airways proposal and, in fact, would increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion."

Still, the sweetened US Airways offer and the reported talks with Northwest propelled speculation that Delta will ultimately find itself in a deal.

"Delta was in play before," Anthony Sabino, professor of law and business at St. John's University in New York, said in an e-mail. "Now it's really up for grabs." Sabino predicted US Airways may raise its bid again, perhaps to $11 billion.

"Jerry Grinstein is not getting much sleep these days. He's thinking 'Doug Parker (US Airways CEO) is after me. Who else is going to call?' " said Sabino.

US Airways' fattened offer includes $5 billion in cash to creditors and 89.5 million shares in the merged airline, up from $4 billion cash and 78.5 million shares initially. That boosted the offer's market value to $10.3 billion, from $8.5 billion.

Delta's stand-alone reorganization plan, filed last month, calls for creditors to get stock in the reorganized company, which it says would be worth up to $12 billion. Some analysts have predicted Delta will have to add a cash payment to its plan.

Calyon Securities analyst Ray Neidl said US Airways boosted its odds that it will succeed from 40 percent to 50 percent, saying the new bid will be "very attractive" to creditors.

But creditors still have to worry that the Justice Department may block the merger, he noted. That would not only kill the deal but also could delay Delta's Chapter 11 exit.

The idea of a post-bankruptcy merger of Delta and Northwest "sounds credible," said Neidl. He said it would probably result in Delta's management remaining in charge.

That would negate at least some of the opposition among Delta workers to a US Airways deal, in which the Arizona carrier would be expected to run the new airline and call the shots on the headquarters location.

Neidl also said he thinks a Delta-Northwest deal would pass Justice scrutiny more easily because the two carriers have less route overlap.

But Parker made it clear US Airways isn't giving up.

"Simply stated, it is time for the process to move forward," Parker said in a conference call Wednesday.

He said he expects Delta creditors will agree to support the initial steps of a merger, such as beginning so-called "due diligence" of the proposed combination and asking federal regulators to begin an antitrust review, by the Feb. 1 deadline.

Parker, in an interview with The Atlanta Journal Constitution nine days ago, said, "We don't feel any need to amend the [initial] offer."

He said Wednesday that his airline decided to raise the offer after "more conversations with creditors," including a meeting Monday with retired Continental Airlines CEO Gordon Bethune, recently hired by Delta's unsecured creditors committee to help it evaluate the US Airways bid vs. Delta's stand-alone plan.

Bethune presented his report to the committee Wednesday.

"It was quite clear as we had more conversations that they ... didn't see as clearly as we did that our proposal had so much more value that it justified the risk of going forward with us," Parker said. "We came to the conclusion that we should make the decision much, much easier for them."

Delta's unsecured creditors committee — which includes big suppliers, banks and the carrier's pilots' union — is a key player in determining the outcome of the takeover bid and is quietly evaluating both Delta's stand-alone plan and the US Airways offer.

The committee hasn't given a public reaction to the merger offer so far. Leaders of Delta's pilots' union oppose it.

"We're 100 percent focused on killing this US Airways hostile merger," union chief Lee Moak said Wednesday. He declined to even address the reported talks with Northwest. "Our goal is to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone carrier. We're not even considering anything else."

US Airways Increases Bid For Delta (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115473

ATLANTA -- US Airways increased the pressure on Delta Air Lines' unsecured creditors to take its buyout offer by raising the bid Wednesday nearly 20 percent to $10.3 billion. Whether the deal would survive regulatory scrutiny may be the deciding factor.

The Tempe, Ariz.-based company also set a Feb. 1 deadline for certain conditions to be met or its entire bid would be revoked.

The ball is now in the creditors' court.

The question is whether they want to take the money US Airways is offering and run the risk of a long regulatory fight, or stick with Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a standalone company worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion.

Daniel Golden, a lawyer for Delta's official unsecured creditors committee, did not return several phone calls Wednesday seeking comment. Most of the large creditors on the committee have refused to discuss their position publicly, except Delta's pilots union, which opposes the merger.

An unofficial group of unsecured creditors issued a statement calling on Delta "to provide thoughtful and unbiased consideration" to the enhanced offer. It urged the airline's management to cooperate fully with US Airways' efforts to get information and not to deter alternatives from other companies that could provide stakeholders greater recoveries than under a standalone reorganization. The group represents creditors holding about $2.3 billion in claims against Delta.

Delta management has argued that the combination of US Airways and Delta would not receive regulatory approval because of the overlap of the two carriers' routes. US Airways says there wouldn't be any regulatory holdup.

A Jan. 24 hearing has been scheduled by the Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation on the state of the airline industry and the potential impact of airline mergers.

Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities in New York, said the increased offer will be more attractive to Delta's creditors, but the great unknown is whether regulators would approve the deal.

"In my opinion, that's going to be the main thing," Neidl said, adding that he gives the US Airways bid a 50-50 chance of being successful.

US Airways Group Inc. Chief Executive Doug Parker told analysts Wednesday there's an easy way to know who is right on the regulatory issues.

"Let's just go ask them and find out," Parker said of regulators. Parker was in Washington on Wednesday to talk to lawmakers.

Delta Air Lines Inc. said in a statement Wednesday that its board will do its duty to review the revised offer by US Airways. But, the Atlanta-based airline added, "On its face, the revised proposal does not address significant concerns that have been raised about the initial US Airways proposal and, in fact, would increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion."

Added Kelly Collins, a spokeswoman for Delta's pilots union, "We remain entirely committed to defending our airline from this hostile merger attempt."

US Airways said it would raise its offer by $1.7 billion from its Nov. 15 bid that was currently valued at $8.6 billion.

The decision to increase the offer was reached over the weekend after US Airways officials met to discuss it. On Monday, the carrier's executives met with Gordon Bethune, the former Continental Airlines chief who is working as a consultant to Delta's creditors committee. Bethune urged US Airways to put its best offer forward, according to an official with knowledge of the meeting who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the talks.

US Airways shares rose $1.03, or 1.8 percent, to close at $58.93 in trading Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange, boosting the value of the revised offer.

The increased offer comes just two weeks after Parker told The Associated Press that his company had no intention at the time to increase its bid.

Even so, Parker did not exactly rule out at the time the possibility of changing his mind about the price.

Parker said Wednesday that US Airways was raising its offer to remove any doubt that its bid was worth more than Delta's plan to remain a standalone carrier.

"Right now, we feel very good about our chances of getting this done" despite Delta management's position, Parker said in a conference call with analysts.

Parker said in an interview Wednesday that Delta's official creditors committee did not ask US Airways to raise its offer, but it indicated it was having a hard time reaching a decision.

"We just wanted to make it a much, much easier analysis for them, and today we've done that," Parker said.

US Airways said the increased offer is set to expire on Feb. 1 unless creditors indicate support for the start of the due diligence process, which would open up Delta's books to US Airways. US Airways also wants support by the creditors for postponing a Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing involving Delta's reorganization plan, and it wants the creditors committee to support both companies filing paperwork with the Justice Department that would start the regulatory process.

Parker said "the offer would go away in its entirety" if those conditions were not met.

Parker also suggested US Airways isn't too worried about Delta management's position.

"We would very much like to see Delta management begin to work with us and support this transaction, but that's not what this proposal is about," Parker said.

The increased bid includes 89.5 million shares of US Airways stock and $5 billion in cash. The original offer included 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock and $4 billion in cash.

Based on the Delta's valuation method, US Airways estimated that its increased bid could actually be worth $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion. Those valuation methods were not disclosed.

Delta's official unsecured creditors committee, which will play a key role in deciding the airline's future course, had said prior to Wednesday that it was reviewing both Delta's standalone plan and US Airways' buyout offer.

The committee also has said it would review any offers that came in from other airlines. But as recently as last month, Delta's chief financial officer, Ed Bastian, said there hadn't been any other offers. The Wall Street Journal, citing anonymous sources, reported Wednesday that Delta has been talking with Eagan, Minn.-based Northwest Airlines Corp. about a possible combination. Spokespeople for Delta and Northwest declined to comment.

The Feb. 7 bankruptcy hearing would be to consider approval of Delta's disclosure statement relating to the carrier's standalone reorganization plan.

The disclosure statement includes details on Delta's operations. If the statement is approved, that means Delta can begin soliciting votes on its reorganization plan, which typically takes four to eight weeks.

Parker has said previously that if that hearing were to go forward it could increase the urgency of US Airways' bid because US Airways hopes to consummate its deal to buy Delta before Delta emerges from Chapter 11.

Can Delta Win Battle To Keep Flying Solo? (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

In the two months since US Airways Group Inc. announced its hostile bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., the embattled carrier has mounted a high-octane campaign of grass-roots organizing and fierce political lobbying to try to stay independent -- but all that has succeeded in doing is attracting a higher offer and a potential new suitor.

Yesterday, US Airways increased its bid to $10.3 billion, up 20% from its original proposal, while people familiar with the situation said there have been recurring talks between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. about the two combining when each emerges from bankruptcy later this year. While Delta maintains its insistence that its future is brightest as a stand-alone carrier, the talks with Northwest suggest that Delta executives are grappling privately with how much more the airline can afford to pay to creditors to remain independent. Northwest has emerged as a "promising third option," according to one person familiar with the matter.

Get alerts for breaking news -- such as Fed moves, major world events and big mergers -- delivered straight to your desktop. Alerts will appear in a small window on your screen, much like an instant-messaging window. See a sample and get more information.4

Northwest is expected to file its preliminary plan of reorganization in the next few days, and has been out raising equity capital to help fund the company once it leaves Chapter 11 in the second quarter. Northwest last month hired investment banking and restructuring advisers Evercore Partners Inc. to help it evaluate and possibly implement a merger, acquisition or other business combination.

Delta has also run the numbers on a potential merger with Northwest and continues to update the calculations as the two companies' reorganizations progress, according to a person with knowledge of the matter. Delta's creditors committee has directed its advisers to do the same and will meet with the airline in the coming days, another person said.

An important question for Delta's creditors: Does it make sense to pursue a merger in bankruptcy, which could extend Delta's stay in court protection and hamper business, or would the airline be better off weighing a combination once it emerges in April?

After waiting weeks to mount a counterattack against the original offer, Delta has become relentless in trying to defeat US Airways, using tactics ranging from 40 million e-mails to frequent fliers to "Keep Delta My Delta" buttons worn by airline employees.

US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said the efforts to fan opposition to the takeover haven't tilted the odds against his airline. "I don't believe that's the case at all," he said. Still, Mr. Parker said last week that he wasn't considering increasing the

Tempe, Ariz., airline's initial offer because it was obviously superior to a restructuring plan proposed by Delta last month. But it became clearer since that creditors were "wrestling" with the two offers, he said yesterday.

J.P. Morgan analyst Jamie Baker wrote in a research note last month that Delta's "hard sell" has slightly improved its chances of remaining independent, though he expects the company will eventually succumb to US Airways or another merger partner.

The sweetened offer will test fragile allegiances Delta has been forging with pilots, other employees, customers and political leaders who were squeezed for concessions by Delta as it tumbled into bankruptcy in 2005. If it decides to increase its go-it-alone bid to creditors, Delta might be forced to shrink the amount of equity and profit-sharing that employees stand to get under the airline's current turnaround plan.

US Airways set a Feb. 1 deadline for its latest offer, comprised of $5 billion in cash plus 89.5 million shares of US Airways common stock. That likely will force creditors to start making up their minds sooner than the Feb. 7 bankruptcy-court hearing where Delta had hoped for approval to start asking creditors to vote on its plan. Yesterday, US Airways shares rose $1.03, or 1.8%, to $58.93 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading at 4 p.m., putting the value of the US Airways bid at $10.27 billion.

In a memo to employees, Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said the enhanced offer fails to "address serious concerns," including Delta's claim that the merger would cost thousands of workers their jobs and can't clear antitrust hurdles. The deal also would "increase the debt burden of the combined company by yet another $1 billion," he added.

To regain momentum for independence, Delta must now ratchet up its lobbying and organizing efforts while simultaneously giving creditors what they want most of all: more money. Delta is considering inviting a private-equity firm to invest in the airline, finding deeper cuts as part of its stand-alone restructuring plan or merging with someone other than US Airways, according to people familiar with the situation.

Delta's recent campaign is a sharp contrast with its flat-footed response to the original bid two months ago when Mr. Grinstein heard about it on the radio as he dressed for work. Mr. Grinstein's communications director had recently resigned, leaving behind a thin staff. And while US Airways approached Delta twice before going public with its hostile bid, Delta said little about the surprise offer for several days. Instead, executives kept their daily schedules.

Behind the scenes, Jim Whitehurst, Delta's operating chief, pressed Delta officials to fight toe-to-toe with Mr. Parker, arguing that Delta would win if it engaged creditors and other groups aggressively. Delta soon installed outside media consultant Cynthia Hudson, who helped during bitter pilot-contract negotiations, as temporary head of corporate communications, and turned to crisis-communications firm Kekst & Co. The New York company, which has worked with Delta for several years, helped Walt Disney Co. resist a takeover by Comcast Corp. in 2004.

Since then, Delta executives and lobbyists have been making the rounds on Capitol Hill, with their efforts gaining enough traction to force a Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation hearing Jan. 24 on the merger's potential impact on competition and customers. Mr. Grinstein, who has visited lawmakers personally, is expected to testify.

Meanwhile, a Delta employee group has been using part of its annual funding from the company to finance its "Keep Delta My Delta" campaign, which began the day after the bid.

The group has distributed buttons to 45,000 flight attendants, ticket agents and other Delta employees throughout the world, and the airline waived rules so workers can wear the buttons on their uniforms. The new keepdeltamydelta.org5 Web site solicits signatures for a petition that will be sent to the Justice Department, and Delta supplied an interactive map showing the negative effects it contends would result from a takeover.

The Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta pilots and holds one of the largest bankruptcy claims, has held demonstrations in a dozen cities, including a rally in Delta's home city of Atlanta last month that drew more than 3,000 current and retired employees, members of Georgia's congressional delegation and a day's worth of media coverage.

Delta has even started new service to Charlotte, N.C., and Pittsburgh, two US Airways hubs, as part of a push to project Delta as a vigorous, quickly recovering carrier.

Yesterday, US Airways launched its own takeover Web site called buildingabetterairline.com. In a letter to US Airways employees, Mr. Parker reiterated his pledge that no "frontline" workers will be laid off if the hostile takeover succeeds. Northwest declined to comment on its talks with Delta.

A New Focus On Delta Air As Deal Bait (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

Delta Air Lines, in such dire straits a year ago that its chief financial officer called it “a company I’m not sure we could have given away,” is suddenly in great demand.

US Airways increased its unsolicited bid for Delta by more than 20 percent early yesterday, to about $10.3 billion. Hours later, Northwest Airlines emerged as a potential suitor.

Delta, according to people involved in the talks, is hoping to fend off US Airways, and has been in talks with Northwest for weeks. Both carriers are operating in bankruptcy, with plans to emerge later this year.

A Northwest bid would probably be preferable to Delta managers because the two airlines' route networks overlap less than with Delta and US Airways. A combination with Northwest is therefore likely to lead to fewer grounded planes, if any.

Delta would not comment on the Northwest talks, a spokeswoman, Betsy Talton, said. Roman Blahoski, a Northwest spokesman, also declined to comment.

The growing interest in Delta reflects the improving fortunes of the airline industry, which is starting to post rare profits, and also perhaps the start of a new wave of consolidation.

While the progress of any particular deal is a matter of conjecture, yesterday's events suggested that one or more airline mergers had become likelier than even a week ago.

Airlines, recovering from half a decade of huge losses, remain highly vulnerable to the next economic downturn, and many people see consolidation as a way to reduce costs and strengthen the industry's financial condition. United Airlines and Continental have been engaged in preliminary merger talks. And many analysts expect that a big merger could force one or two more.

US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., first offered $8 billion to buy Delta, of Atlanta, in mid-November. But the effort failed to gain backing from Delta creditors, who will control the carrier after bankruptcy.

Delta management has issued a stand-alone plan it said was superior to the offer from US Airways. A slow-moving series of meetings followed between creditors and representatives of Delta and US Airways, which served to pick apart competing proposals. And it appeared that the proposed big merger might dissolve.

That changed on Monday morning, when the Delta creditors' new consultant, Gordon M. Bethune, the 65-year-old former chief executive who turned around Continental Airlines, met with US Airways' chief, W. Douglas Parker, 45.

They met at the Midtown Manhattan offices of Citigroup, which is advising US Airways, Mr. Parker said. And, through a series of tough questions about the merger proposal, Mr. Bethune made clear that Mr. Parker should increase his bid to overcome creditors' doubts about the risks of the deal, according to Mr. Parker.

"He uses a lot of profanity; he asked a lot of questions," Mr. Parker said of Mr. Bethune in an interview. "It was clear they were still wrestling with our proposal. Was there enough reward to warrant the risk? He was very direct."

Mr. Bethune did not return calls seeking comment. Daniel H. Golden, a lawyer for the creditors' committee, declined to comment.

In the meantime, Delta management has been pursuing its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline and preparing for a Feb. 7 hearing on the plan. And it announced last week that it had agreed to buy 30 new regional jets, a move that flies in the face of Mr. Parker's plan to cut back the combined carriers under the Delta name.

"Those airplanes aren't consistent with our plan," Mr. Parker said.

So, seeing Delta potentially slipping away, he raised his bid, adding $1 billion in cash, for a total of $5 billion, and 11 million US Airways shares, for a total of 89.5 million, valued around $5.3 billion at yesterday's closing price of $58.93 a share. Delta creditors would receive 49 percent of the stock in the combined company.

The bid will expire Feb. 1 unless creditors come out in support of allowing US Airways to conduct due diligence on Delta, support a filing with antitrust regulators to begin a review of the proposed deal, and call for postponement of the Feb. 7 hearing on Delta's stand-alone plan.

Delta management valued the stand-alone plan at $9.4 billion to $12 billion, a range US Airways and some analysts said was based on overly optimistic estimates. Using Delta's valuation method, US Airways said its latest offer would be worth $12.7 billion to $15.4 billion. "The revised offer eliminates any conceivable doubt," Mr. Parker said.

Roger King, an analyst at CreditSights, agreed, saying the Delta management plan was almost certainly dead on arrival. "The entrance of Gordon Bethune is a major positive for" US Airways, Mr. King said.

Delta has said that US Airways' initial bid would not pass antitrust scrutiny because it added too much debt to the companies, and that it would further strain relations with workers. Delta said that it would review the new offer but argued that it raised the same questions.

The union representing Delta pilots said it was opposed to the US Airways proposal. And some union officials representing other US Air workers have expressed reservations about the combination because they had yet to enter into new labor contracts reflecting a merger in 2005 with America West.

Lee Moak, chairman of the Delta chapter of the Air Line Pilots Association, said the group voted yesterday to commit $15 million more to defeat the US Airways bid. "We will do everything we can to kill this merger," Mr. Moak said.

Delta And Northwest Merger Idea Has Its Advantages (AP)

By Joshua Freed

AP, January 11, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS - No one knows if Northwest and Delta airlines will end up together, but the idea strikes some observers as sensible.

Recurring talks between the two carriers have taken place, the Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday, citing anonymous sources. Both airlines declined to comment. Even if managers at the two bankrupt airlines make a deal, creditors would have to approve, too.

But observers pointed out that Delta Air Lines Inc.'s routes have less overlap with Northwest than with US Airways, which has proposed buying Delta. Northwest's domestic routes are concentrated in the Midwest and Asia, while Delta is strong in the South and East and over the Atlantic.

Less overlap could mean less resistance from antitrust regulators, said former Northwest board member and Northwest Capt. Mike Ristow.

"In terms of a global network, they come up with something more attractive" than a Delta-US Airways merger would, said Daniel Kasper, managing director of aviation consulting firm LECG in Cambridge, Mass. LECG has done bankruptcy work for both Delta and Northwest.

The idea of one bankrupt carrier merging with another might seem far-fetched. But bankruptcy allows airlines to slash expenses for things like aircraft leases, debt, and workers. Among the older carriers that were around before deregulation, Delta and Northwest could end up as two of the healthier ones.

That means investors might be willing to put in new money, Kasper said.

It wouldn't be unreasonable for investors "to expect that the deal might be priced in a way that there would be some interesting upside potential coming out of it," he said. "I wouldn't have any trouble at all imagining money going into a deal like that."

Delta had rejected an offer from US Airways Group Inc., but US Airways raised its bid to $10.3 billion on Wednesday. Delta managers have said they want it to emerge as a standalone carrier.

Last month, Northwest disclosed that it had hired Evercore Partners to advise it on merger possibilities. At the time, Northwest Chief Executive Doug Steenland said it was hiring Evercore in case a merger proposal came along for Northwest.

"It remains our intention, and let me emphasize this, our intention to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of calendar year 2007 on a standalone, independent basis," Steenland said in a hot line message to employees on Dec. 11.

The intention to emerge as a standalone carrier was absent from a message to employees on Wednesday in response to the Wall Street Journal story.

"Northwest intends to file its plan of reorganization in its Chapter 11 bankruptcy court prior to January 16, 2007 and to emerge from Chapter 11 in the second quarter of 2007. Northwest is monitoring developments in the airline industry and is committed to acting in the best interest of all of its constituents," the message said.

Northwest spokesman Roman Blahoski declined to comment on the difference between the two statements, or to comment on whether Northwest still intends to emerge as a standalone carrier.

Ristow said managers at Northwest and Delta talk to each other routinely about code-sharing and marketing partnerships.

"They don't talk about the competitive stuff because that's illegal, but they certainly have a real good idea of how each other operates, and whether they're compatible, and whether they make sense" as a merged operation, he said.

"It would be ridiculous to think that they haven't at least had some preliminary discussions."

Monsanto Expects DOJ Review To Delay Delta And Pine Merger (BZJRNL)

St. Louis Business Journal, January 11, 2007

Monsanto Co. said in a regulatory filing Tuesday that its proposed $1.5 billion acquisition of cotton seed breeder Delta and Pine Land Co. might be delayed past its mid-February targeted closing due to U.S. Department of Justice approvals.

In its quarterly regulatory filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Monsanto said that the deadline for the merger, initially announced in August, is Feb. 14, subject to an automatic extension of up to six months to complete regulatory reviews. The company said in the filing that it anticipates the regulatory process might extend beyond that date, invoking the automatic extension.

The merger has been approved by the boards of both company's and Delta's shareholders approved the deal Dec. 21. The transaction is being reviewed by federal and state authorities, including the Department of Justice.

DOJ_NMG_0115478

To make the deal more acceptable to regulators, Monsanto pledged in August to divest its Stoneville cottonseed business and is looking for potential buyers for that business.

Monsanto had agreed to buy Delta in a deal valued at $1.9 billion when it was first announced in May 1998, but the deal was aborted the next year after Monsanto couldn't reach a deal with regulators over antitrust concerns.

A Public Pension Fund Sues Directors Of Caremark Rx (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

A public pension fund in Louisiana has sued the directors of Caremark Rx, contending that their unanimous backing of the company's $21 billion merger with CVS over a rival $26 billion bid from Express Scripts improperly benefits Caremark executives at the expense of shareholders.

Among the benefits Caremark executives and directors will receive if the CVS deal goes through, the fund's lawsuit contends, are positions at the combined company and indemnification from penalties and fines that may result when criminal and regulatory investigations into possible stock option backdating by Caremark officials are concluded.

Yesterday, Express Scripts filed suit to block the CVS deal, arguing that the terms deal supported by the Caremark board prevents its directors from executing their fiduciary duties to shareholders.

The lawsuits, filed in Delaware Chancery Court, will once again bring the fiduciary duties of directors in the post-Enron world to the forefront. Delaware is where most major United States companies are incorporated.

Caremark accepted the CVS bid on Nov. 1, even though the stock-for-stock deal offered no premium to Caremark's market price at the time.

Caremark's directors have recommended that company shareholders approve the deal at a meeting that is expected to occur before March 16.

On Monday, Caremark rejected the $26 billion bid made on Dec. 18 by Express Scripts, saying that it would "result in a highly leveraged and weakened business" if it was approved by shareholders. The Express Scripts offer of $58.50 a share is approximately 15 percent higher than the CVS bid.

The lawsuit filed by the Louisiana Municipal Police Employees' Retirement System contends that the CVS deal is unfair to Caremark shareholders not only because its price is significantly below the rival bid.

The pension fund's lawyers also argue that Caremark directors improperly accepted deal protection provisions in the CVS bid that act to deter other bidders, effectively making the deal a fait accompli even before the shareholders vote.

First, there is the $675 million breakup fee to be paid by Caremark in cash to CVS, if the target walks away. Then, there is a so-called last-look provision, which gives CVS the chance to come back and top any rival bid.

"Any potential third-party bidders will be loath to invest the time and resources necessary to pursue a superior bid while knowing full well that CVS retains control of the bidding," the pension fund's lawsuit says.

The Louisiana fund accuses the Caremark board of supporting the deal to benefit Edwin M. Crawford, the company's chief executive, and other executives.

Under the terms of the deal, nine Caremark executives will join the combined company and Mr. Crawford will become chairman of its board and receive an estimated $48 million in exit pay. While he would probably receive a similar amount if Caremark sold out to Express Scripts, Mr. Crawford might not be asked to join the combined company under the terms of such a deal.

The Louisiana pension fund also noted that the CVS deal guarantees a job at the merged company for Mr. Crawford's son, Andrew. A Caremark proxy filed last year described the younger Mr. Crawford as senior vice president for industry analysis and underwriting.

The merger with CVS would also allow an unspecified number of Caremark directors — perhaps all of them — to get lucrative seats on the combined company's board.

In its offer, CVS has also agreed to cover any costs associated with stock option backdating at Caremark, practices that are under federal investigation and the subject of another civil suit filed against the company in Tennessee. That lawsuit has challenged 4.6 million options granted to Mr. Crawford as having been possibly backdated. Stock sales covered by those options generated $262 million for Mr. Crawford, the Tennessee lawsuit contends.

"The inequities could not be more apparent," said Gerald H. Silk, a lawyer at Bernstein, Litowitz, Berger & Grossmann, one of the firms representing the Louisiana fund. "Shareholders get a coercive, zero-premium deal while Crawford gets a $48 million payout, jobs for himself and his son and complete indemnification for his alleged option backdating transgressions."

DOJ_NMG_0115479

A Caremark spokesman called the pension fund's lawsuit meritless and said the company would defend against it vigorously.

As for the Express Scripts suit, he said it was a "frivolous" attempt to interfere with the CVS merger.

"Contrary to allegations made by Express Scripts, the provisions of the CVS merger agreement are lawful and appropriate," the spokesman said.

To be sure, many of the terms in the CVS bid for Caremark — the no-shop provisions and last-look opportunity — are common in the merger world.

But the suit filed in Delaware, comes at a time when directors' actions as fiduciaries for their shareholders are under increased scrutiny.

As a result, the case, which is being heard by Chancellor William B. Chandler III, provides an opportunity for him to opine on the matter of directors' duties broadly and whether the Caremark directors exercised those obligations in particular.

This is familiar territory for Chancellor Chandler, who oversaw the Disney case of 2005. In that case he chastised the company's directors for essentially rubberstamping a contract struck by Michael D. Eisner with Michael S. Ovitz that resulted in a $140 million severance payout after Mr. Ovitz was terminated a short time later.

Chancellor Chandler has asked for a hearing on the issues before Caremark's shareholders vote on the CVS bid, now scheduled to take place in mid-March.

In a Dec. 29 meeting with the parties in the case, Chancellor Chandler said that while he was certain Caremark would argue forcefully that its directors exercised their duties of care and loyalty to the company's owners, he also concluded that "there is a tenable argument on the other side, and nonfrivolous claims here on the other side, that at least need to be tested against a fuller record."

Caremark, Express Scripts Try To Sway Shareholders (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Simison And Catherine Larkin

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- Express Scripts Inc. urged Caremark Rx Inc. shareholders to vote against a proposed $22.3 billion buyout by CVS Corp. while Caremark's chief blasted Express Scripts' $24.3 billion offer.

Rejecting the CVS deal would clear the way for Caremark's board to ``give proper consideration to any other offer which it receives, including our proposal'' in stock and cash, Express Scripts said today in a proxy statement. Caremark Chief Executive Officer Edwin ``Mac'' Crawford told investors the Express Scripts bid is hurting his ability to line up new contracts.

At the center of the dispute are competing proposals for restructuring the way Caremark handles a portion of the $251.8 billion in prescriptions distributed each year in the U.S. on behalf of employers and insurance companies. Buying Caremark would make Express Scripts the nation's largest manager of drug benefits. CVS, the second-largest U.S. drugstore chain, wants Caremark to gain power to negotiate medicine prices.

``This is a very, very powerful combination,'' Caremark CEO Crawford said at an investor conference in San Francisco today. ``I'm not going away. We're committed to making this work.''

Express Scripts sued Caremark today in Delaware Chancery Court in Wilmington, asking a judge to rule that a $675 million breakup fee if the CVS deal fails is ``unreasonable, unlawful and invalid.''

Seeking Injunction

The complaint seeks an injunction to bar the CVS merger and a Caremark shareholder meeting until ``directors properly review and fully inform the Caremark shareholders of Express Scripts' offer.'' Caremark directors rejected the bid on Jan. 8.

CVS, in a statement today, called the Express Scripts lawsuit a ``desperate attempt'' to derail its merger with Caremark, which CVS said has the backing of both companies' boards and strong support from customers and employees.

St. Louis-based Express Scripts said Dec. 18 that it offered $58.50 in cash and stock for each Caremark share. Express Scripts shares have fallen almost 5 percent since then, lowering the value of its offer to about $24.3 billion, based on today's closing price and data compiled by Bloomberg citing 426.5 million shares of Caremark outstanding as of Oct. 31.

Express Scripts fell 79 cents today, or 1.2 percent, to $65.27 at the close of Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. Shares of Nashville, Tennessee-based Caremark were unchanged at $55.55 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Value of CVS Offer

Woonsocket, Rhode Island-based CVS agreed Nov. 1 to exchange each Caremark share for 1.67 CVS shares. That deal is now valued at $22.3 billion, based on today's CVS closing price of $31.32 on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0115480

CVS announced after the close of markets that it had raised its quarterly dividend 26 percent to 4.875 cents, its largest-ever increase. John Heinbockel, an analyst at Goldman Sachs in New York, said in a note that the move may close the gap between the perceived value of the two offers and boost Caremark shareholders' confidence in CVS's growth prospects.

Express Scripts took steps to advance its offer yesterday by buying 591,108 shares of Caremark and saying that it planned to nominate four directors to the Caremark board. Express Scripts is seeking proxies from Caremark shareholders for the right to cast their votes in its favor.

Express Scripts told Bloomberg News it included certain types of stock options in the value of its offer, which would increase the deal's value to $24.9 billion according to Bloomberg calculations.

At today's investor conference, Caremark's Crawford said an Express Scripts takeover wouldn't provide strategic or financial benefits while creating the risk of government antitrust sanctions and hurting sales.

Contracts at Risk

Caremark may lose contracts that would generate more than $8 billion in revenue because of the threatened proxy fight as uncertainty makes customers less willing to sign new contracts for managing drug benefits, Crawford said.

``We are already being shut out by decision-makers" because of the possibility that Express Scripts may take over Caremark, Crawford said. ``They like us and our pricing, but they can't take the risk that we won't be in charge."

He cited a ``very large health plan" that may switch to Medco Health Solutions Inc., the No. 1 drug-benefits manager; ``a very large state" contract generating more than $1 billion that may be in jeopardy because of a lawsuit against Express Scripts, and a health plan in upstate New York. ``The list is long," Crawford said.

An antitrust delay in completing a takeover by Express Scripts ``will destroy the 2007 selling season and perhaps the 2008 selling season," Crawford said.

`Out of Thin Air'

Crawford accused Express Scripts of setting out to disrupt the planned combination with CVS and of making an estimate of $500 million in savings that was ``plucked entirely out of the air." A similar projection of savings from a CVS combination reflects a detailed assessment, he said. Caremark said the Express Scripts bid ``would result in a highly leveraged and weakened business."

Caremark said in a filing with the New York Stock Exchange yesterday that shareholders of record Jan. 15 will be eligible to vote on the CVS merger. Caremark hasn't set a date for the shareholder meeting. Express Scripts left the dates blank in its preliminary proxy statement.

``We urge you to send the company's board a clear message that a sale to CVS for little or no premium is not a desired outcome, and that they should take all necessary steps to maximize shareholder value," Express Scripts said in the proxy statement.

Express Scripts also asked the Delaware court to rule that its law firm, Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, isn't conflicted because it once represented AdvancePCS, which Caremark bought.

Equity Office May Be In Play (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Expectations were building last night that rival bidders might soon materialize to challenge the $20 billion buyout of Equity Office Properties Trust by Blackstone Group.

Top real-estate and private-equity investors were buzzing that a competing offer could come within a matter of days, possibly from an investment team led by real-estate maven Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital Group Global LLC and Neil Bluhm of Walton Street Capital. The two were seriously considering an offer last night, said one person briefed on their plans. The two still haven't completed financing for an offer. One possible funding source could be Cerberus Capital Management, a New York-based financial conglomerate, people familiar with the matter said.

A competing bid would set off what would be the most high-stakes and high-profile bidding war since the contest for RJR Nabisco nearly two decades ago. And it would be a potent indicator of the intensity of the competitive rivalry to buy companies. So far, buyout firms have observed an unstated gentleman's agreement not to top, or "jump" in Wall Street parlance, signed merger deals. But real-estate firms aren't party to that understanding.

The interest comes at a time when the debt markets are happy to throw money at mega deals. Borrowers have been able to attract capital at cheap rates, and what they can borrow as a percentage of the total value of assets is also high. Moreover, any buyer would likely split off some of the trophy assets to help pay for the deal -- part of Blackstone's plan.

One major impediment to a rival bid are the matching rights enjoyed by Blackstone that allow the firm to match any price offered by a rival. A rival would also be under time pressure, given that the Blackstone deal is expected to close within three weeks.

Measured by current rental income, Blackstone's offer for the country's largest office-building owner and manager is already richly valued at some $36 billion, a figure that includes $16 billion of debt. But by at least one other important measure -- the price needed to replace the buildings in Equity Office's portfolio -- the deal doesn't look impossible to top.

A spokeswoman for Equity Office declined to comment. A spokesman for Mr. Sternlicht declined to comment. Mr. Bluhm didn't return calls for comment. Mark Neporent, Cerberus's chief operating officer, said that the firm "had no intention of submitting a bid." But Cerberus would be willing to provide debt financing to bidders.

Samuel Zell, Equity Office's founder and chairman, said in a previous interview with the Journal that it agreed in its negotiations with Blackstone not to seek competing bids. But he said a process was in place for the board to consider unsolicited offers.

Until the past few days analysts were unsure whether any bidders would be willing to go above the $49.50 per share needed to top Blackstone's price and cover the termination fee. Blackstone's offer was an 8.5% premium to the price of EOP's closing price on the day prior to the merger announcement on Nov. 20. And Blackstone's price was a 7.2% premium over Equity Office's net asset value of $45.25 per share estimated by Green Street Advisors, a Newport Beach, Calif., research firm.

Equity Offices' proxy filed to the Securities and Exchange Commission on Dec. 14 stated that Blackstone originally wanted a termination fee of $275 million, which was negotiated down to $200 million. Green Street Advisors described the termination fee as "modestly lower than we would have expected" and pointed out that in another recent deal involving another REIT, SL Green Realty Corp., the fee was about 3% of the initial value.

Cerberus May Bid For Equity Office REIT (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

Cerberus Capital Management is considering making an offer worth more than $38 billion for Equity Office Properties Trust, the real estate investment trust that is controlled by Samuel Zell, people involved in the discussions said last night.

If Cerberus bids for Equity Office, the nation's largest owner and manager of office buildings, it would seek to top a deal reached in November to sell the company to the Blackstone Group for $36 billion.

Last night, executives of Cerberus were preparing their bid, these people said. It remains possible, however, that Cerberus could decide against making an offer.

It is unclear whether Cerberus would bid in concert with other partners. In recent weeks, the firm has held talks with Barry Sternlicht of Starwood Capital, who created Starwood Hotels, people involved in those talks said.

Spokesmen for Cerberus and Mr. Sternlicht declined to comment.

A Cerberus offer could result in a bidding war for Equity Office, pitting two of the most powerful financial firms in the nation against each other for a deal that would be the largest leveraged buyout in history, surpassing the $33 billion that a consortium of private equity groups paid for the health care company HCA Inc. in August.

A bid by Cerberus would also be one of the first instances of a private equity firm's trying to top another firm's deal after an agreement had been struck.

When Blackstone reached its deal with Equity Office, the purchase price — $48.50 a share — was instantly derided by some shareholders as too low. James S. Corl, the chief investment officer for the real estate firm Cohen & Steers, the largest shareholder in Equity Office, criticized the deal publicly and suggested that another bidder should emerge.

Under the terms of Equity Office's agreement with Blackstone, Equity Office can continue to solicit offers from rival bidders. A shareholder vote on that deal is scheduled for Feb. 5. If Cerberus were to top Blackstone's offer, Blackstone would be entitled to a breakup fee of $200 million.

Speculation about a rival offer has been increasing in recent weeks. Yesterday, Jonathan Litt, an analyst at Citigroup, wrote in a note to investors that he expected a "topping bid" of $50 to $52 a share.

Shares of Equity Office closed at $48.75, above Blackstone's offer, in anticipation of a bid from Cerberus.

Kroes Threatens Antitrust Action To Break Up Power Groups (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115482

Neelie Kroes warned yesterday that she could use her powers as European Union competition commissioner to break up the region's large, integrated energy groups, opening up a potential new front in the broader regulatory crackdown on groups such as Eon, RWE and GdF.

Ms Kroes is a long-standing critic of gas and electricity suppliers that also control crucial transmission infrastructure, such as pipelines. She argues that integrated groups have used their grip on the networks to freeze out new entrants and stifle competition.

"Ownership unbundling" - the break-up of integrated energy groups - through new legislation would take years, and is certain to face stiff opposition from some member states.

But Ms Kroes stressed that a break-up could be imposed on individual companies as part of an antitrust decision, for example as a punishment for violating EU competition rules. Asked whether forced unbundling was an option as part of an antitrust investigation, the commissioner replied: "Absolutely."

The news is of special concern for Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF of France, Eni of Italy and OMV of Austria, since they are the subject of a Commission antitrust probe. The groups' offices were raided in May, following suspicions they had excluded rivals from wholesale markets and infrastructure and of "possible collusion between incumbents in the form of market sharing", Ms Kroes said.

The Commission acquired the power to break up companies that violate competition rules only in 2004 but has so far never used it.

The latest warning by Ms Kroes came as she revealed the findings of a 16-month investigation into the EU markets for electricity and gas. As reported in the Financial Times last week, the report painted a bleak picture of competition in the sector and the poor level of market integration.

"[The report's] disappointing conclusion is that, more than a decade after having launched the drive for liberalisation, we are still far from having a single, competitive and well-functioning European energy market," Ms Kroes said. "As a result, Europe's consumers, businesses and the economy as a whole are still not benefiting from the full advantages that should flow from the opening up of European energy markets in terms of lower prices and better choice of services."

The Commission probe found that many of Europe's national energy markets continued to be dominated by former monopolies. Thanks to their entrenched positions at home, the former incumbents had little incentive to venture abroad or to invest in upgrading domestic infrastructure, since this would make it easier for rivals to enter the market.

"The report reveals that the energy prices for commercial users vary significantly from member state to member state. These differences are not eroded through import competition. One of the reasons is that incumbents stick to their home markets," Ms Kroes said yesterday.

The report also criticised the excessive length of many gas and power supply contracts, as well as the tight grip that some companies have on pipeline and interconnector capacity. These contracts, it argued, served to further reinforce the power of the dominant groups.

European Union Proposes Greater Competition In Energy (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, January 11, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 10 — European Union officials on Wednesday challenged governments to loosen their grip on national energy sectors, calling for a fresh wave of competition and investment in infrastructure and technology to ease dependence on powerful exporters like Russia and to combat global warming.

The region needs a new “postindustrial revolution,” said the European Commission’s president, José Manuel Barroso, announcing a number of energy proposals. “We have already left behind our coal-based industrial past. It is time to embrace our low-carbon future.”

The package of proposals is one of the largest ever presented by the commission, although it reflected changes by France and Germany, which oppose the breakup of their national electricity companies.

European Union officials also backed away from earlier, more ambitious targets for cutting emissions after energy-intensive industries and labor groups warned of threats to profits and jobs — especially if competitors in the United States and elsewhere did not follow suit.

Many of the proposals, which also aim to encourage the use of renewable fuels for cars and to improve the energy efficiency of buildings and home appliances, are to be debated by European Union leaders at a summit meeting in March. If they approve the package, many of the measures would still require the commission to draft formal legal proposals.

The plan, called an Energy Policy for Europe, sought to echo the postwar integration of important industrial sectors, namely coal and steel, that eventually grew into the union’s single market. But it fell far short of proposing a unified power market, one that could be overseen by a single regulator, operate on a common grid and benefit from a common front in dealing with energy suppliers.

Christian Egenhofer, a senior research fellow at the Center for European Policy Studies in Brussels, said it would be unrealistic to unify energy policy in a trade bloc of 27 disparate countries, some rich, some much poorer. France, for instance, relies on nuclear power for 80 percent of its electricity, while others, like Poland, depend almost entirely on coal for electricity.

In another sign that the vision of transforming the way Europe consumes energy is meeting resistance, commission officials also backed away from earlier recommendations to require that emissions be cut to levels that environmental experts say are critical to keeping down rising temperatures.

Under pressure from industries like steel, where executives fear losing business if Europe adopts stricter regulations than the rest of the world, the union recommended cutting emissions by 20 percent from 1990 levels by 2020, rather than the 30 percent sought by its environment commissioner.

The commission pushed ahead with proposals to encourage the "capture," or trapping, and storage of carbon dioxide emissions, including possibly making it mandatory for all new coal-fired power stations after 2020 to incorporate the new, cleaner technologies.

The European Union also highlighted the benefits of nuclear energy as a way to curb carbon emissions. But widespread public skepticism about the safety and price of nuclear technology led the officials to back away from pushing member states to use nuclear power as a primary tool against climate change.

The commission also proposed measures that aim to reduce power consumption by about 20 percent by 2020 as another means of reducing emissions. Union officials said those measures, including better constructed homes and offices, could save consumers $130 billion each year in fuel bills — or from $260 to $1,300 for each household.

EU Seeks Breakup Of Utilities To Boost Competition (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman And Jonathan Stearns

Bloomberg, January 11, 2007

Jan. 10 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators called for a breakup of energy companies to boost competition in the electricity and natural-gas markets.

The European Commission, the EU's regulatory arm, wants to open competition to new entrants. Most incumbent energy companies own both production businesses and the units managing the pipes and power lines. The EU regulator wants separate owners for those businesses, a practice known as unbundling. The recommendations, to be discussed by EU leaders in March, are already meeting resistance from France and Germany.

``We make it clear that our preference is unequivocally in favor of ownership unbundling," European Commission President Jose Barroso told journalists in Brussels today.

As part of the investigation into the region's 250 billion- euro ($325 billion) power and gas industry, the EU also probed utilities including E.ON AG, Gaz de France SA and Eni SpA for possible antitrust violations. The commission said energy companies may be illegally colluding to keep out rivals, calling the practice ``one of the most serious threats to competition."

Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes has threatened to fine energy companies as much as 10 percent of annual sales for failing to open their networks to competitors. Kroes also said she may break up companies if she finds they have illegally restricted competition.

Persistence

``This is a pretty unprecedented set of announcements," said Matthew Levitt, a competition lawyer at Lovells in Brussels. ``The most effective way to get an efficient energy market is through competition and regulatory powers. I don't see the commission giving up on this."

Europe's gas and electricity markets are inefficient, overly concentrated and suffer from a lack of investment, the commission said in a report released today that concluded a 19- month review of the industry.

``The EU's energy blueprint is a very major and welcome step forward," Sam Laidlaw, chief executive of Centrica, the U.K.'s biggest energy supplier, said in a statement.

German utilities E.ON and RWE AG oppose the proposed split. ``A division of network and generation businesses wouldn't be an improvement, but rather would represent expropriation from our shareholders," E.ON spokesman Josef Nelles said. RWE spokeswoman Julia Scharlemann said the company already gives ``non-discriminatory access to all power plants."

French, Italian Reaction

Electricite de France SA, Europe's biggest power generator and owner of the Reseau de Transport d'Electricite grid, said the current system already gives fair access to other power suppliers. Gaz de France declined to comment.

``We are far from where we want to be," Kroes said, referring to the aim of creating a single European energy market.

DOJ_NMG_0115484

Eni said it was one of Europe's first companies to engage in ``pro-competitive'' measures by separating managerial and shareholder structures of Snam Rete Gas SpA, which owns and runs Italy's gas grid and is 50 percent-controlled by Eni.

Fulvio Conti, chief executive officer of Enel SpA, Italy's largest utility, said his company favored competition by selling generation assets with the former monopoly now producing less than one-third of the country's electricity needs.

Away From Russia

The EU's ideas, included in an energy and environmental policy review, address mounting challenges facing the 27-nation bloc. The region wants to diversify its gas and oil imports away from Russia and the Middle East and cut emissions of heat-trapping gases that are blamed for climate change.

The commission also proposed lowering emissions by at least 20 percent by 2020 compared with 1990. That's less than the 30 percent cut the bloc would agree to if there's an accord among all developed nations, it said.

The EU wants to make it more costly for the energy industry to emit greenhouse gases while limiting price rises for consumers.

Existing EU legislation requires energy providers such as E.ON to have a legal separation between production and transmission businesses. Legal unbundling involves an incumbent having separate accounting and management of its transmission and production units.

Kroes said this approach doesn't go far enough because incumbents continue to favor their own distribution companies at the expense of new entrants.

Alternative Option

The commission's preferred option is to break open the market through ownership unbundling. That would involve legislation to force former monopolies to split their production and transmission businesses.

The commission also outlined an alternative approach that doesn't go as far. It would allow companies to remain the owner of their transmission and production businesses and to receive a regulated return on them, while no longer being responsible for the units' operation, maintenance or development.

The commission said it prefers ownership unbundling because ``this would create a level playing field and it would change the incentive structure in the right direction.''

The commission has already applied those practices in two antitrust reviews.

Kroes approved a proposed merger between Suez SA and Gaz de France in November 2006 after the companies agreed to give up control of Belgian grid operator Fluxys NV and divest gas distributor Distrigaz SA. She also forced E.ON to release ``significant volumes'' of natural gas on the market as part of her December 2005 approval of the German company's 2 billion-euro purchase of Hungary's Mol Rt.

Today's ideas will be the basis for future legislative proposals following consultation with EU leaders.

French Industry Minister Francois Loos opposes the proposal, telling lawmakers in Paris today ``our system works and the proof of that is that other producers other than EDF tell us that it is working to their satisfaction.'' German Economy Minister Michael Glos told reporters in Berlin that splitting energy production and transmission would be ``rather difficult.''

Cisco Sues Apple Over Use Of IPhone Name (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Cisco Systems sued Apple Inc. in federal court Wednesday, saying the computer maker's new iPhone violates its trademark.

The lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California, came just a day after Apple CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the Apple iPhone in dramatic fashion at a trade show in San Francisco.

But even while Jobs was trumpeting the product, the matter of the product's naming had not been resolved behind the scenes between two of Silicon Valley's biggest names.

San Jose-based Cisco, the world's largest network-equipment maker, has owned the trademark on the name "iPhone" since 2000, when it acquired InfoGear Technology Corp., which originally registered the name.

Three weeks ago, Cisco's Linksys division put the trademark to use, releasing an Internet phone called "iPhone" that uses the increasingly popular Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP.

But on Tuesday, Jobs unveiled Apple's own iPhone, a "game-changing" touch-screen-controlled cell phone device that plays music, surfs the Web and delivers voicemail and e-mail.

Apple spokeswoman Natalie Kerris said she could not immediately comment on the lawsuit.

Cisco said Tuesday it had been negotiating for several years with Apple over a licensing agreement, but Apple lawyers had not signed and returned the final contract.

DOJ_NMG_0115485

"Cisco entered into negotiations with Apple in good faith after Apple repeatedly asked permission to use Cisco's iPhone name," said Mark Chandler, Cisco senior vice president and general counsel, in a statement. "There is no doubt that Apple's new phone is very exciting, but they should not be using our trademark without our permission."

Cisco is seeking injunctive relief to prevent Apple from copying Cisco's iPhone trademark.

"Today's iPhone is not tomorrow's iPhone. The potential for convergence of the home phone, cell phone, work phone and PC is limitless, which is why it is so important for us to protect our brand," Chandler added.

Cisco Sues Apple Over IPhone Trademark (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, January 11, 2007

When Apple (AAPL) CEO Steve Jobs unveiled the much-hyped iPhone this week, he left one detail hanging: the rights to the iPhone name.

Network equipment giant Cisco Systems (CSCO) owns the trademark. Wednesday, Cisco sued Apple in U.S. District Court, asking for an injunction against its Silicon Valley neighbor.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling calls the lawsuit "silly." He says several companies use the iPhone name for products, though he could not provide examples. Cisco's claims "are tenuous," he says.

NEW PRODUCT UNVEILED: Apple wants to rock your phone | iPhone packed with goodies

Apple has made inquiries about the iPhone name for several years, says Cisco general counsel Mark Chandler. Talks picked up in recent weeks and seemed to be going well, Chandler said Wednesday. But Apple stopped communicating with Cisco at about 9 p.m. PT Monday, he said.

Jobs launched the iPhone — which combines a mobile phone, widescreen iPod and Internet capabilities — with much fanfare Tuesday morning.

Financial terms were not an issue, Chandler said. Cisco primarily wanted two things: clarity over who would use the iPhone name and interoperability between Apple's iPhone and other companies' products, he says. He would not provide specifics.

Cisco is a big advocate of standards that allow different devices to work together. That's because the company makes the networking gear that helps connect them.

In contrast, Apple leans toward products that work best with other Apple products, says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. Apple is afraid that if it makes its products more open, "Somebody can steal their stuff," he says.

Apple's shares, which have been rising lately, jumped 5% to a record $97 during regular trading before the lawsuit was announced.

The iPhone name was first trademarked in 1996 by InfoGear, a maker of Internet appliances. Cisco acquired InfoGear, and the trademark, in 2000.

Cisco sells iPhones designed to place calls over an Internet connection, not a cellphone network, so they do not compete directly with Apple's iPhone. Cisco launched new iPhones in December.

But the name iPhone "has been associated with Apple and the concept of a phone for a couple of years," says Charles Golvin, a tech analyst at Forrester Research. Apple has a line of products with "i" in the name, including the iBook laptop and iPod digital music player.

An Apple claim to the name probably would not stand up in court, Enderle says. After all, Compaq Computer and its successor, Hewlett-Packard, have sold a line of iPaq personal digital assistants and cellphones for years.

Apple has more to lose than Cisco does, Golvin says. The market for Internet phones is much smaller than that for music cellphones, he says, and Cisco doesn't have that much invested in its iPhone brand.

Apple is notorious for vigorously defending its own trademarks. It has sent cease-and-desist letters to several firms that use "pod" in product names.

Former Official Is Said To Be A Focus Of Lobbyist Inquiry (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The former No. 2 official in the Interior Department has been notified by federal prosecutors that he will most likely be indicted for lying about his relationship with the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff, people with knowledge of the investigation said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0115486

A lawyer for the former official, J. Steven Griles, said Mr. Griles was recently told by the Justice Department that he was a target of the investigation as a result of his testimony about Mr. Abramoff to a Senate committee in 2005.

"We are shocked and disappointed at this turn of events," the lawyer, Barry M. Hartman, said in a statement. "No one has suggested that Mr. Griles ever took anything of value from Mr. Abramoff or any other lobbyist, and he never did."

Mr. Abramoff, once one of the most powerful Republican lobbyists in Washington, entered prison last year after pleading guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials.

In his November 2005 testimony to the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, Mr. Griles insisted he had done no special favors for Mr. Abramoff while he was deputy secretary of the interior in President Bush's first term. But Mr. Griles acknowledged that he had been approached about leaving the department to join Mr. Abramoff's lobbying firm. Mr. Griles did not take that job, and now works elsewhere as a corporate lobbyist.

Mr. Abramoff's internal e-mail messages show that he referred to Mr. Griles as "our guy" at the Interior Department, and repeatedly sought to bring pressure on Mr. Griles to do favors for Mr. Abramoff's Indian tribe clients. In a report last year, the Indian Affairs Committee said it could not "definitively conclude what, if anything, Griles did to assist Mr. Abramoff's clients."

Two Bush administration officials who have been briefed on the case said the investigation of Mr. Griles and Mr. Abramoff had also brought scrutiny to a senior Justice Department official, Sue Ellen Wooldridge, an assistant attorney general. She submitted a letter of resignation on Monday and is expected to depart this month.

Ms. Wooldridge, who leads the department's environment and natural resources division and serves as the Bush administration's chief prosecutor on environmental issues, joined the Justice Department from the Interior Department, where she had been a top aide to former Interior Secretary Gale Norton and was close to Mr. Griles.

A Justice Department spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, declined to comment when asked if Ms. Wooldridge's departure was related to the Abramoff investigation.

Others, including the two Bush administration officials, said that while Ms. Wooldridge's ties to Mr. Griles were of interest to the Justice Department, they did not believe she was under active investigation by the grand jury. Ms. Magnuson said that in her resignation letter, Ms. Wooldridge "basically expressed that after six years of federal service, she wants to return to the private sector."

In confirming an article in The Washington Post on Wednesday reporting that Mr. Griles had been told he was being investigated by the grand jury, Mr. Hartman said his client had given the Senate committee his best recollection of his communications with Mr. Abramoff. "Mr. Griles told the committee that he knew Mr. Abramoff, just like he knew many other lobbyists, and in his view, Mr. Abramoff had no special access or relationship to him," Mr. Hartman said.

Mr. Griles "takes this matter very seriously," Mr. Hartman said, "and is optimistic that this will be resolved in an appropriate matter, based on the facts, and that neither political pressure nor news reports will undermine this hope."

There has been no suggestion from Congressional or Justice Department investigators that Ms. Norton, who resigned last year as interior secretary, has come under scrutiny in the Abramoff investigation.

Mr. Abramoff's e-mail shows he made many of his approaches to Mr. Griles through a small advocacy group, the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, and its director, Italia Federici, who has also come under investigation by the Justice Department.

Mr. Griles would be the second former Interior Department official to face charges in the Abramoff investigation. Roger G. Stillwell, who had worked in the department's insular affairs office, pleaded guilty last year to accepting sporting and concert tickets from Mr. Abramoff, whose lobbying clients often sought help from Mr. Stillwell's office.

Energy Lobbyist A Target In Ethics Probe (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Interior Department's former No. 2 official has been told by federal investigators that he is a target in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe.

J. Steven Griles, former deputy interior secretary during President Bush's first term, was notified by letter and told of possible charges at a meeting last week with Justice Department prosecutors, people familiar with the probe said Wednesday, speaking on condition of anonymity because the inquiry continues.

Griles told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in 2005 that Abramoff had no special access to him. Griles' attorney, Barry Hartman, has said that committee's report last September found no evidence that Griles acted improperly. Hartman did not immediately return phone calls for comment Wednesday.

Griles has since resumed his work as an energy lobbyist, which he did before joining Interior. It's those ties that were the subject of a host of internal probes while he was at the department.

Also being investigated in relation to the grand jury probe is Sue Ellen Wooldridge, the assistant attorney general who oversees the Justice Department's environment and natural resources division, one person familiar with the investigation said.

Wooldridge sent in a resignation letter on Monday, saying she wanted to return to the private sector, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said Wednesday. Wooldridge was not commenting publicly.

Before joining the Justice Department in November 2005, she was the Interior Department solicitor and was deputy chief of staff to Interior Secretary Gale Norton while Griles was at Interior.

The Abramoff grand jury has heard from several Interior officials, past and present, in recent days. Roger Stillwell, a former Interior employee who provided Abramoff with information from the department, was sentenced to two years probation and fined $1,000 on Tuesday for failing to report gifts football and concert tickets from Abramoff.

Abramoff is serving about six years in prison for a fraudulent Florida casino business deal and awaits sentencing in a Washington bribery scandal. The Abramoff investigation ensnared its first congressman this fall when former Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, admitted accepting gifts in exchange for government action. Several Capitol Hill staffers and a former Bush administration official also have pleaded guilty or been convicted in the case.

Prosecutors are investigating Griles now for possible criminal charges that include lying to Congress and honest service fraud. The latter is a 1988 law saying citizens are guaranteed a right to the "honest services" of public officials.

The charges involve questions about whether Griles falsely testified in 2005 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee about Abramoff's attempts to hire Griles away from Interior.

The Senate committee's investigation and e-mails detailed numerous contacts with Abramoff and Italia Federici, who was a go-between for Abramoff. Federici headed the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, which she co-founded with Norton.

Federal investigators have been looking at the hundreds of thousands of dollars the group received in donations from Abramoff's Indian tribal clients and from energy and mining companies, including some that were Griles' ex-clients.

Chamber Of Commerce Blames China For U.S. Pollution Woes (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, January 11, 2007

When all else fails, blame China.

That's the novel tack the U.S. Chamber of Commerce is taking in its latest attempt to relieve states and businesses of Clean Air Act burdens.

The lobby group is petitioning the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to make it easier for states, counties and cities to discount dust and smog that drifts across their borders from places as far-flung as China and Africa from their pollution levels in order to remain compliant with federal air-quality standards.

It is well-documented that large plumes of particles and pollutants blow across the ocean. And the Clean Air Act clearly allows for their subtraction when they arrive from such foreign sources.

But the Chamber asserts that EPA guidance on the issue is so "limited, deficient and complex" that states are at a loss as to how to get the relief, and so are failing to attract cement, steel and power companies that could create jobs.

"When an area is in non-attainment [of the Clean Air Act], no manufacturer in the U.S. will work there and companies already there leave the state: They go to China," William Kovacs, who heads up environmental lobbying for the Chamber, said.

To date, no state or region has appealed successfully to the EPA to discount the foreign-born pollution, though the agency temporarily waived its standards in the wake of 1998 Mexican forest fires that caused soot levels to spike in New Mexico and Texas.

The Chamber argues that a clear mechanism for presenting evidence to obtain relief is urgent in light of the EPA's new stricter standards for particulate matter. The agency tightened the standards in November, throwing 100 additional counties into non-attainment such that most of the West Coast is now in violation of the Clean Air Act.

Last month the lobby group sent its petition for a rulemaking on the matter straight to the top of the agency, EPA administrator Stephen Johnson.

Environmental groups are chalking up the move as an artful effort by the business group to help its members evade pollution standards by pointing the finger elsewhere.

"This boils down for me to a pretty patent attempt by the Chamber to shift responsibility for clearing up air pollution from its members to sources offshore," said the director of the Clean Air Program at the Natural Resources Defense Council, John Walke.

He insisted that most of the areas in non-attainment would fail to meet the federal standards regardless of the foreign-born pollution within their borders, an assertion that the Chamber disputes.

DOJ_NMG_0115488

Smog and dust can be fingerprinted and, by the EPA's own estimate, on certain days nearly a quarter of the particles floating above Los Angeles can be traced to China.

At a hearing before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works in July, the commissioner of Georgia's Walker County, Bebe Heiskell, testified that her region's non-attainment status was "almost exclusively due to outside influences," including dust and other particles blown from Alaska, Canada and Africa.

"To be forced into perpetual non-attainment will have a devastating impact on not only our economy, but on the lives of our citizens," she said.

If the EPA finds the Chamber's petition sound, it would open up a period of public comment that would doubtless become an arena for the business and green lobbies to do battle over the issue.

But Kovacs does not have high hopes for a favorable response from the EPA, citing the agency's failure to address the issue on numerous occasions. Instead, the Chamber may have to take it to the courts.

"It's very likely we could sue," he said.

Let There Be 'Blight' (WSJ)

By William R. Maurer

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

SEATTLE -- The city of Burien, Wash., recently decided that a piece of property owned by the seven Strobel sisters that had long housed a popular diner-style restaurant was not upscale enough for the city's ambitious "Town Square" development, which will feature condos, shops, restaurants and offices. Rather than condemn the property for a private developer and risk a lawsuit, Burien came up with a plan -- it would put a road through the property, and the city manager told his staff to "make damn sure" it did. When a subsequent survey revealed that the road would not affect the building itself, but only sideswipe a small corner of the property, the staff developed yet another site plan that put the road directly through the building. A trial court concluded that the city's actions might be "oppressive" and "an abuse of power" -- but allowed the condemnation anyway. The Washington Court of Appeals affirmed, and the Washington Supreme Court refused to hear the case.

Welcome to the post-Kelo world. The U.S. Supreme Court's 2005 decision made clear that the federal courts would not stop local governments across the country from condemning private property for economic development. While the court noted that states were free to provide greater protections for homes and small businesses if they chose, Washington state stands as evidence that a strong state constitution means little if the courts do not enforce it and local governments disregard it.

When Kelo came out, local governments and their lobbyists eagerly explained that ours was not a "Kelo state," and that the legislative efforts to restrict eminent-domain abuse in other states were unnecessary here. The Washington Constitution explicitly provides that "Private property shall not be taken for private use" (except in very limited circumstances). "It can't happen here" became the oft-repeated message used to placate home and small business owners seeking legislative protections for their property.

When it comes to governmental abuse, "it can't happen here" really means "it is happening right now." Local governments are busily using mechanisms in state law to threaten neighborhoods and abuse property owners, and the state Supreme Court has repeatedly let them get away with it.

Shortly after Kelo, the Washington Supreme Court allowed the Seattle Monorail to permanently condemn a piece of property it needed only temporarily for a construction staging area. Once the monorail had completed that legitimate public use, it intended to sell the property at a premium to raise revenue. In this way, Washington courts now allow local governments to condemn more land than is necessary, for longer than is necessary, in the hopes that the government can play real-estate speculator with whatever is left.

The court also ruled that the meetings at which a local government determines which property to condemn could take place essentially in secret, with the only notice for property owners being a posting on an obscure government Web site. The court ignored the fact that computer usage among minorities, the elderly and the poor is significantly lower than in other segments of the population, and that it is these communities that traditionally have been the target of eminent-domain abuse.

Washington courts now defer to even the most extreme examples of governmental exploitation, exemplified by Burien's treatment of the Strobel sisters. So long as the government can manufacture a fig leaf of public use or possible public use for constitutional cover, local governments can take private property to transfer to other private entities or deliberately target properties not upscale enough for the bureaucrats' "vision."

The tools available for trampling constitutional rights are already there. Since the Kelo decision, municipalities have rediscovered Washington's Community Renewal Act, the local incarnation of statutes used to destroy working-class (and often minority) neighborhoods across the country in the 1950s and '60s. The government, under the act, can condemn an entire neighborhood and transfer the property to a private developer so long as the government finds that at least some property in the neighborhood is "blighted." Unfortunately, this statute is so broadly worded that practically every neighborhood in Washington meets the definition of "blight" -- things like "obsolete platting" and "diversity of ownership" constitute "blight." The statute provides all the devices a mildly clever planner needs to pull off a Kelo-style taking.

Working-class neighborhoods are already feeling the pressure. Auburn recently declared much of its beautiful downtown "blighted," and adopted a Community Renewal Plan. One city manager explained that blight "means anything that impairs or arrests sound growth" -- a hugely elastic definition. Similarly, Seattle is considering using the Community Renewal Act in the city's Rainier Valley, one of the most diverse neighborhoods in the nation.

Regardless of strong constitutional protections for private property, governments and courts now view eminent domain as an area where few if any restrictions exist. And not just in Washington. In probably the most appalling example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit let stand a condemnation in which a developer in the Port Chester, N.Y., demanded that Bart Didden give him either $800,000 or a 50% share in Mr. Didden's property, which was slated to be a CVS pharmacy -- or the developer would have the village condemn it. Mr. Didden refused; the next day, the village condemned his property to hand it over to the developer to construct a Walgreens. Tomorrow, the U.S. Supreme Court will consider whether to take the case.

Meanwhile, state and federal courts are turning redevelopment areas into Constitution-free zones, where the government can do what it wants with few or no restrictions. It doesn't have to be this way. Courts could force the government to comply with the state and federal constitutions. Local governments could limit their takings only to legitimate public uses. But until all three branches of government begin taking their constitutional obligations seriously, property owners across the country face the continued threat of eminent-domain abuse, regardless of what the state or federal constitution says.

Ask the Strobel sisters, who are now fighting for just compensation for a property that was never for sale in the first place.

Mr. Maurer is executive director of the Institute for Justice, Washington chapter, and the author of "A False Sense of Security: The Potential for Eminent-Domain Abuse in Washington," recently published by the Washington Policy Center. The Institute litigated the Kelo case and represents Bart Didden in his appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Exxon Softens Climate-Change Stance (WSJ)

Hoping to Shape Policy, Oil Giant Joins Dialogue On Curbing of Emissions

In one of the strongest signs yet that U.S. industry anticipates government curbs on global-warming emissions, Exxon Mobil Corp., long a leading opponent of such rules, is starting to talk about how it would like them to be structured.

Exxon, the world's largest publicly traded oil company by market value, long has been a lightning rod in the global-warming debate. Its top executives have openly questioned the scientific validity of claims that fossil-fuel emissions are warming the planet, and it has funded outside groups that have challenged such claims in language sometimes stronger than the company itself has used. Those actions have prompted criticism of the company by environmentalists and by Democrats in the U.S., who now control the Congress.

· The Situation: Exxon Mobil has stopped funding some groups that challenge global-warming fears and is discussing what a U.S. emissions policy might look like.

· The Background: The company has been a vocal challenger of global-warming science and a lightning rod for environmentalists.

· The Bottom Line: The shift shows U.S. industry is beginning to conclude that government emissions limits are coming.

Now, Exxon has cut off funding to a handful of those outside groups. It says climate-science models that link greenhouse-gas concentrations to global warming are getting more reliable. And it is meeting in Washington with officials of other large corporations to discuss what form the companies would prefer a possible U.S. carbon regulation to take.

Words Are Nuanced

The changes in Exxon's words and actions are nuanced. The oil giant continues to note uncertainties in climate science. It continues to oppose the Kyoto Protocol, the international global-warming treaty that limits emissions from industrialized countries that have ratified it. It also stresses that any future carbon policy should include developing countries, where emissions are rising fastest. (See related article1.)

Still, the company's subtle softening is significant and reflects a gathering trend among much of U.S. industry, from utilities to auto makers. While many continue to oppose caps, these companies expect the country will impose mandatory global-warming-emission constraints at some point, so they are lining up to try to shape any mandate so they escape with minimum economic pain.

Exxon has stopped funding the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a Washington-based think tank that last year ran television ads saying that carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas, is helpful. After funding them previously, Exxon decided in late 2005 not to fund for 2006 CEI and "five or six" other groups active in the global-warming debate, Kenneth Cohen, Exxon's vice president for public affairs, confirmed this week in an interview at Exxon's headquarters in Irving, Texas. He declined to identify the groups beyond CEI; their names are expected to become public in the spring, when Exxon releases its annual list of donations to nonprofit groups.

Myron Ebell, director of CEI's energy and global-warming program, declined to comment about why Exxon didn't fund CEI last year. But he added: "Like any company, they are concerned about both policies and image.

"We're not at the mercy of our funders for what we believe. But we are dependent on them for funding to help promote our programs," he said. "Obviously, we would like to find a lot more funding on energy and global warming than we've had."

More significant are the meetings between executives from Exxon and other companies to discuss the potential structure of a U.S. carbon regulation. Several parallel tracks of discussions are under way, some sponsored by Washington think tanks, including the Brookings Institution and Resources for the Future.

The meetings underscore the view within much of U.S. industry that the science and the politics of global warming are changing. "The issue has evolved," Mr. Cohen said.

Exxon says important questions remain about the degree to which fossil-fuel emissions are contributing to global warming. But "the modeling has gotten better" analyzing the probabilities of how rising greenhouse-gas emissions will affect global temperatures, Mr. Cohen said. Exxon continues to stress the modeling is imperfect; it is "helpful to an analysis, but it's not a predictor," he said. But he added, "we know enough now -- or, society knows enough now -- that the risk is serious and action should be taken."

The question is what kind of action. The economic reality is that some companies will win from a carbon constraint and some companies will lose, depending on how the regulation is written.

Question of a Cap

One question is whether a carbon tax or cap should be imposed upstream -- on producers of fossil fuels -- or downstream, on the industries, and perhaps even the individual consumers, who use those fuels. Another question is whether such a constraint should target just a few industries or should be applied across the economy.

Such questions already are sparking fierce lobbying fights among industries in Europe. There, countries have slapped carbon caps on several heavily emitting industries. Now the countries are toughening those constraints.

A similar zero-sum fight appears increasingly likely in the U.S. California adopted a broad global-warming cap last year, and now it has to decide which companies, and perhaps which consumers, to stick with the responsibility for meeting the targets. Other states say they plan to follow California's lead.

In Washington, meanwhile, Democratic congressional leaders say they will push for some sort of federal carbon constraint.

"By all indications, we'll certainly see much more legislative activity at the state and federal level going forward," Exxon's Mr. Cohen said. Among the broad options being debated, he said, "some look more favorable to us than others."

Exxon wants any regulation to be applied across "the broadest possible base" of the economy, said Jaime Spellings, Exxon's general manager for corporate planning. Exxon says avoiding a ton of carbon-dioxide emissions is, with certain exceptions, less expensive in the power industry than in the transportation sector. Though solar energy remains expensive, reducing a ton of emissions by generating electricity from essentially carbon-free sources such as nuclear or wind energy is cheaper than reducing a ton of emissions through low-carbon transportation fuels such as ethanol.

Exxon, like the U.S. government, also argues that any regulation should take into account rising emissions from developing countries, too. Both Exxon and the federal government oppose the Kyoto Protocol.

The fact that Exxon officials are beginning to lay out even these generalities is significant, said Philip Sharp, president of Resources for the Future. "They are taking this debate very seriously," said Mr. Sharp, a former Democratic congressman long active in energy-policy debates. "My personal opinion of them has changed by watching them operate."

AG Urges Patience In Mexico Drug War (SAEN)

By Mariano Castillo, Express-News Border Bureau

San Antonio (TX) Express-News, January 11, 2007

LAREDO — Despite the Mexican government's inability to crack down on drug cartels responsible for thousands of deaths and kidnappings — some Americans included among the victims — the U.S. government is reserving judgment, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday during a border tour here.

Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, who already has sent troops to aid in the drug war, needs time to show his country's commitment, Gonzales said in brief remarks to reporters at the World Trade Bridge.

Gonzales met with local, state and federal law enforcement officials, some who brought up the issue of trustworthiness of their Mexican counterparts, said Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Laredo, who participated in the briefing via phone.

More than 170 homicides were reported in Nuevo Laredo in 2006, but only a handful of arrests were made, much to the frustration of local U.S. agencies whose own investigations into crimes on this side of the border often lead them to the cartels operating in Mexico.

"Let's give them the benefit of the doubt," Gonzales said of his confidence in Mexico's cooperation. "Let's just wait and see how it goes."

Gonzales also announced $300,000 in additional funds to federal crime-fighting units in Laredo and McAllen. The so-called Strike Force brings federal and state officers together to share information.

The goal is to target "not just the cartels themselves, but the transporters, money launders and smugglers," Gonzales said.

Though the grant isn't a huge amount, Laredo Port Director Gene Garza of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, called the $300,000 a "first step and definitely an important step."

Cuellar, who had invited Gonzales to tour Laredo, said, "Do we need to do more? Yes, and that's where the U.S. Congress needs to play a role."

Gonzales, who was born in San Antonio, also responded to media reports that Middle Eastern terrorists were training to cross the southern border illegally into the United States. The possibility of terrorists sneaking through the Mexican border is a concern, but there's no specific or credible intelligence to say it is happening, he said.

The attorney general flew to Mexico City after his border tour to meet with officials there.

A local group of advocates for Americans kidnapped in Mexico, Laredo's Missing, held posters of their loved ones as his motorcade drove by.

Families of the kidnap victims were upset that the nation's top law official didn't meet with them.

"It was a spit in the face that he would come down to Laredo and not even talk to the victims who can really express the need for action," said William Slemaker, whose stepdaughter Yvette Martinez has been missing since 2004.

Twenty-seven Americans kidnapped in Nuevo Laredo are unaccounted for, Slemaker said, expressing his own frustration with Mexican authorities.

Not a single arrest has been made in any of the cases, he said, asking: "How much time should we give them?" mcastillo@express-news.net

Valley Gets Grant To Battle Crime (KRGV)

KRGV-TV, January 10, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announces federal money to help battle border crime.

Laredo-A large federal grant is headed to the valley to help fight border crime. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez spent Wednesday in Laredo to tour the border, and announce a $300,000 grant to create a strike force. The strike force will be made of members from the DEA, FBI, ICE, ATF, IRS and Texas Department of Public Safety. The agencies will work together to fight border crime more efficiently, as well as working to secure our border against the threat of terrorists sneaking into the country. Gonzalez's visit comes one month after South Texas congressman Henry Cuellar wrote him a letter asking for help to battle the increase in border crime.

Chronicle Calls Federal Case Against BALCO Reporters Flawed (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 11, 2007

(01-10) 13:49 PST SAN FRANCISCO -- The Chronicle told a federal appeals court today that contempt-of-court orders against two reporters for refusing to disclose sources of leaked testimony about athletes and steroids were based on a false premise -- that the leak was a serious crime requiring a grand jury investigation.

In a final round of written arguments to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals challenging prison sentences for the reporters and fines for the newspaper, lawyers for the parent Hearst Corp. disputed prosecutors' position that journalists never have the right to withhold evidence from a grand jury investigating a crime.

A 1972 Supreme Court ruling upholding contempt orders against reporters for refusing to disclose their sources to grand juries involved serious crimes, such as drug trafficking and plots of violence, that can be prosecuted only by grand jury indictments under the Constitution, said Jonathan Donnellan, a Hearst attorney.

By contrast, he said, the current case involves a violation of a secrecy order by U.S. District Judge Susan Illston that she could have investigated herself or referred to a special prosecutor.

Either of those options would have allowed the reporters to claim the right to protect their sources, Donnellan said, and that right shouldn't be diminished by Illston's decision to refer the leak to the Justice Department, which chose to convene a grand jury.

"First Amendment rights cannot rise or fall on the District Court's discretionary choice as to where to steer an investigation," the lawyer wrote. "In cases involving violation of a protective order, at least, a rigid distinction between grand jury and other matters cannot stand."

The court has scheduled a hearing Feb. 12 on appeals by The Chronicle and reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who were held in contempt last September by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White for refusing to testify or provide documents to a grand jury investigating the leaked transcripts.

White sentenced Fainaru-Wada and Williams to up to 18 months in prison, and imposed a $1,000-a-day fine on The Chronicle, but suspended those penalties until the appeals court rules in the case.

Fainaru-Wada and Williams wrote articles in 2004 quoting closed-door testimony by Barry Bonds of the Giants, Jason Giambi of the New York Yankees, sprinter Tim Montgomery and other athletes about their use of drugs supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO.

Five defendants, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution. A separate grand jury is investigating whether Bonds lied by denying he knowingly used steroids.

After the August 2004 article on Montgomery's testimony, Illston, who had ordered all participants in the case to keep the transcripts confidential, told the Justice Department to investigate the leak. The department empaneled a grand jury, which issued subpoenas to the reporters and The Chronicle last May.

In upholding the subpoenas, White said the 1972 Supreme Court ruling established that journalists have no special right to withhold evidence from a grand jury. He said exceptions carved out by some post-1972 rulings -- requiring those who seek reporters' testimony to show that it is essential and unavailable elsewhere -- have not involved grand jury investigations.

Lawyers for the newspaper and the reporters contend a 1996 Supreme Court ruling, allowing psychotherapists to withhold their patients' confidential statements from grand juries, requires federal judges to recognize similar rights for journalists, along the lines of shield laws enacted by California and most other states.

Reporters should be allowed to protect their sources, the attorneys argue, if the value of the news coverage outweighs any harm caused by the disclosure.

43 Alleged Gang Members Indicted In Cleveland (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, January 11, 2007

CLEVELAND (AP) — Forty-three people accused of being gang members who sold cocaine and terrorized a Cleveland neighborhood have been indicted in an 18-month investigation, the top federal prosecutor in northern Ohio said Wednesday.

The indictment of those who investigators say are involved with the "7-Alls" gang was announced by U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White and officials from the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the city of Cleveland.

Officers seized drugs, weapons and $151,000 in the investigation, White said.

The charges include selling cocaine, conspiracy to sell cocaine and weapons counts. The indictments named as coconspirators two men apparently shot and killed by rival gangs during the investigation, White said.

The "7-Alls" name derived from the gang's involvement in violent crimes in 70's-numbered streets east of downtown Cleveland, officials said.

Last year U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced $15 million in federal grants to six areas, including Cleveland, to fight street gang violence. Grants also went to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Milwaukee; Dallas-Fort Worth and the Easton-Lancaster, Pa., corridor.

Feds Indict Thirteen Hispanic Gang Members On Racketeering Charges (TENN)

By Kate Howard, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, January 11, 2007

Thirteen members of the MS-13 street gang have been indicted by a federal grand jury on corruption and racketeering charges, local and federal officials announced today.

DOJ_NMG_0115493

Members of the international gang were charged for corruption and homicide under the RICO act created to fight organized crime, the most severe possible indictment, U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said at a press conference held at the federal courthouse this afternoon.

The suspects are responsible for three homicides and several shootings or assaults in the Nashville area just in the last year and have been collecting dues to send to members in jail, according to the indictment.

All but one of the 13 suspects were already in federal or state custody when the indictments were handed down, Morford said, and the last suspect has since been arrested.

The investigation by Metro police and several federal agencies showed that MS-13 is highly organized and violent for the sake of harming rival gang members, Morford said.

“Unlike a lot of other gangs here, this is not a drug-based gang,” Morford said. “This is a violence-based gang.”

Several Nashville-area MS-13 members have been deported for immigration violations, and the suspects in this case are a mix of legal and illegal residents, Morford said.

Officials said they expect to bring more charges.

Metro Police Chief Ronal Serpas said the charges reinforce the need for members of the Hispanic community to report crimes to the police. The gang members preyed upon members of their own communities, Serpas said.

"This sends a clear and concise message that if you are a victim of crime, the police department is here to help you," Serpas said.

18 Arrested In Hoover For Drug, Immigration Violations (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

HOOVER, Ala. - A joint force of law enforcement officials took 18 people suspected of either drug trafficking or entering the country illegally into custody today in Hoover, said a Drug Enforcement Administration official.

Harold Willis, resident agent in charge of the D-E-A office in Birmingham said 40 or 50 federal, state and local law enforcement officers wearing bulletproof vests were involved in the operation.

The arrests took place in the parking lot of a Lowe's Home Improvement store and stemmed from an investigation that began several months ago, The Birmingham News reported on its Web site today.

Willis said the DEA led the investigation because some of the men were suspected of drug trafficking. Others agencies involved included the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Alabama Bureau of Investigation, several sheriffs departments and city police departments.

Willis said it was not certain whether all the men entered the country illegally. But all have been taken to a federal holding facility in the Etowah County Jail.

Paper: Bonds Blamed Failed Amphetamines Test On Teammate (AP)

AP, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK -- Barry Bonds failed a test for amphetamines last season and originally blamed it on a teammate, the Daily News reported Thursday.

When first informed of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from teammate Mark Sweeney's locker, the New York City newspaper said, citing several unnamed sources.

"I have no comment on that," Bonds' agent Jeff Borris told the Daily News on Wednesday night.

"Mark was made aware of the fact that his name had been brought up," Sweeney's agent Barry Axelrod told the Daily News. "But he did not give Barry Bonds anything, and there was nothing he could have given Barry Bonds."

Bonds, who always has maintained he never has tested positive for illegal drug use, already is under investigation for lying about steroid use.

A federal grand jury is investigating whether the 42-year-old Bonds perjured himself when he testified in 2003 in the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid distribution case that he never knowingly used performance-enhancing drugs. The San Francisco Giants slugger told a 2003 federal grand jury that he believed his trainer Greg Anderson had provided him flaxseed oil and arthritic balm, not steroids.

Under baseball's amphetamines policy, which went into effect last season, players are not publicly identified for a first positive test. A second positive test for amphetamines results in a 25-game suspension. The first failed steroids test costs a player 50 games.

Bonds did not appeal the positive test, according to the Daily News, which made him subject to six drug tests by MLB over the next six months.

"We're not in a position to confirm or deny, obviously," MLB spokesman Rich Levin told the Daily News.

DOJ_NMG_0115494

According to the newspaper, Sweeney learned of the Bonds' positive test from Gene Orza, chief operating officer of the Major League Baseball Players Association. Orza told Sweeney, the paper said, that he should remove any troublesome substances from his locker and should not share said substances. Sweeney said there was nothing of concern in his locker, according to the Daily News' sources.

An AP message for Sweeney was not immediately returned late Wednesday.

The Giants still are working to finalize complicated language in Bonds' $16 million, one-year contract for next season -- a process that has lasted almost a month since he agreed to the deal Dec. 7 on the last day of baseball's winter meetings.

The language still being negotiated concerns the left fielder's compliance with team rules, as well as what would happen if he were to be indicted or have other legal troubles.

Borris has declined to comment on the negotiations. He didn't immediately return a message from the AP on Wednesday night.

Bonds is set to begin his 15th season with the Giants only 22 home runs shy of surpassing Hank Aaron's career record of 755.

Bonds, considered healthy again following offseason surgery on his troublesome left elbow, has spent 14 of his 21 big league seasons with San Francisco and helped the Giants draw 3 million fans in all seven seasons at their waterfront ballpark.

After missing all but 14 games in 2005 following three operations on his right knee, Bonds batted .270 with 26 homers and 77 RBI in 367 at-bats in 2006. He passed Babe Ruth to move into second place on the career home run list May 28. AP NEWS

Report: Bonds Failed Test For Amphetmines (NYDN)

By T.j. Quinn

New York Daily News, January 11, 2007

NEW YORK - Barry Bonds, already under investigation for lying under oath about his steroid use, failed a test under Major League Baseball's amphetamine policy last season and then initially blamed it on a teammate, the New York Daily News has learned.

Under the policy, which went into effect only last season, players are not publicly identified for a first positive test.

But according to several sources, when first informed by the MLB Players Association of the positive test, Bonds attributed it to a substance he had taken from the locker of teammate Mark Sweeney. Sources did not identify the drug in question but characterized it as a serious stimulant.

When asked Wednesday night whether Bonds had an explanation for why he failed the test or if he wanted to issue a denial, Bonds' agent, Jeff Borris, said, "I have no comment on that."

Giants officials did not return calls seeking comment Wednesday night.

Bonds, who has long defended himself against steroid accusations by saying he "never failed a drug test," did not appeal his positive test but was immediately subject to an additional six drug tests by MLB during the next six months.

Sweeney declined comment, but his agent, Barry Axelrod, told The News, "Mark was made aware of the fact that his name had been brought up, but he did not give Barry Bonds anything and there was nothing he could have given Barry Bonds."

Bonds was not punished for his transgression but instead was referred to treatment and counseling. While amphetamines are considered performance-enhancing drugs, they are treated differently than steroids under baseball's drug policy. Had Bonds failed a steroid test, he would have been suspended for 50 games, but under baseball's amphetamine policy no one is publicly identified or suspended until a second positive, which would result in a 25-game suspension. A player is suspended for 80 games for a third positive.

The policy covers a range of stimulants, including the ubiquitous "greenies," or Dexedrine. Benzedrine, ephedrine and the stimulants Ritalin and Adderall, which are used to treat attention-deficit disorder, are among the substances on the policy.

"We're not in a position to confirm or deny, obviously," MLB spokesman Rich Levin said. "A second failed test would mean a suspension."

Sources said Sweeney, a first baseman/outfielder, first heard about the test when Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the players association, called to say the player's name had been dragged into the controversy.

Orza told Sweeney that if he had anything troublesome in his locker, he should remove it and that he should not be sharing substances with other players. Sweeney told Orza that there was nothing in his locker that would be of concern, sources said.

Axelrod would not comment on the conversation between Orza and Sweeney. Orza also refused to comment on what he said to Sweeney or about Bonds' failed test but added, "I can say unequivocally in my 22 years I've known Barry Bonds, he has never blamed anyone for anything."

Sweeney apparently confronted Bonds, and Bonds told him that Orza had misunderstood, that he had not intended to implicate his teammate.

DOJ_NMG_0115495

Bonds has been in the doping spotlight since September 2003, when federal agents raided the BALCO lab and the home of Bonds' personal trainer, Greg Anderson. Bonds testified before a grand jury in the steroid-trafficking case that he had taken substances identified by the government as steroids, but that he believed they were legal supplements. A Daily News reporter overheard part of his testimony that day admitting he had unknowingly used steroids, and a year later the San Francisco Chronicle published extended excerpts from the grand jury transcripts.

The leaks about Bonds' steroid use were not sufficient evidence to allow MLB to test Bonds for cause, but the failed amphetamine test is.

BALCO founder Victor Conte, Anderson and three other men served prison sentences for their parts in the trafficking ring, and Bonds has been under investigation for perjury and tax evasion for more than two years. Anderson is in prison on a contempt charge for refusing to testify against his longtime friend.

Long before steroids took hold in clubhouses in the early 1990s, amphetamines were the performance-enhancer of choice in baseball.

Even when baseball first adopted a steroids policy in 2003, amphetamines were not specifically banned or tested for, although many are illegal without a prescription.

U.S. Defends Anti - Drug Efforts In Haiti (AP)

AP, January 10, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) -- The U.S. defended on Wednesday its anti-drug efforts in Haiti, two days after the Caribbean nation's president accused America and other major drug-consuming countries of failing to adequately fight the narcotics trade.

In a strongly worded speech to Parliament on Monday, President Rene Preval called drug trafficking the main cause of instability in his impoverished nation and said failed efforts by the United States and other countries to stop the trade had made Haiti a "victim."

U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Shaila B. Manyam said Wednesday the United States has undertaken a range of measures to defend Haiti against drug trafficking, including strengthening its weak justice system and training its coast guard.

The U.S. has also contributed more than $40 million to Haiti's national police since 2004, Manyam said.

"The United States shares Haiti's concern about drug trafficking," Manyam said. "Our two countries have a long history of cooperation on combatting this scourge and that cooperation will continue."

Drug traffickers have long taken advantage of Haiti's weak defenses and vulnerable coastline to smuggle in cocaine bound for the United States, Canada and Europe.

Manyam said Preval's comments "indicate the government of Haiti shares our strong commitment to deal with the threats to stability and security posed by drug trafficking."

Preval's cash-strapped government has struggled to contain gang violence sparked by a bloody 2004 revolt that ousted former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, Haiti's first democratically elected leader.

Ransom-seeking gangs have kidnapped dozens of people in recent weeks, prompting criticism that police and an 8,800-strong U.N. peacekeeping force are not doing enough to fight crime.

U.N. troops and police have stepped up patrols in recent days and arrested two suspected kidnappers.

IMMIGRATION:

Chinese Fugitive Ruled Eligible For U.S. Asylum (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, January 10, 2007

A Chinese man who was beaten by officials in his homeland for protesting the forced sterilization of his brother, then fled to the United States, is eligible for political asylum under a law protecting opponents of China's reproductive policy, a federal appeals court ruled Tuesday.

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco overturned an immigration court's ruling ordering the deportation of Li Bin Lin and told the immigration judges to determine whether Lin would face persecution in China. The ruling makes it likely that Lin will qualify for asylum, said his lawyer, Jisheng Li of Honolulu.

Lin lived with his brother, their parents and other relatives in a house in Fujian province on China's southeast coast. When Lin's brother's wife became pregnant with their third child, officials told Lin's brother that he would have to undergo a vasectomy.

DOJ_NMG_0115496

The brother left home to avoid the operation, and birth control officials came to the home in March 1998 to seize and destroy household furnishings, the court said. When Lin tried to stop them, they beat him and called security police to have him arrested, according to his court declaration.

He went into hiding and left two months later for the U.S. territory of Guam, where he still lives. His brother was eventually sterilized.

When U.S. officials moved to deport Lin in 2001, he filed for asylum, relying on a 1996 law that makes immigrants eligible if they have been forced to undergo an abortion or sterilization, or if they have been persecuted for "other resistance to a coercive population control program." The law was intended to protect those who fled China because of its population-control policies.

The Board of Immigration Appeals, whose judges are Justice Department appointees, ruled against Lin, saying he had not shown resistance to the birth control program and had simply been trying to protect household property.

The federal court said Tuesday that Lin's motive was irrelevant under the 1996 law.

"Lin's physical altercation with the birth control officials while the officials attempted to use coercive measures to enforce birth quotas constitutes physical resistance," Judge Stephen Trott said in the 3-0 ruling.

Legislators Introduce Sweeping Agricultural Guest-worker Program (MCT)

By Michael Doyle

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - The introduction Wednesday of an ambitious agricultural guest-worker plan showcases the changed Capitol Hill circumstances that may make 2007 the year for an immigration overhaul.

Some congressional roadblocks are gone. Sympathetic new leaders are in charge. A restored Democratic majority claims new priorities.

"A year does make a difference," insisted Sen. Larry Craig, R-Idaho.

Or so he hopes.

Joined by lawmakers from Florida and California, and backed by hundreds of farm, labor and church groups, Craig is reintroducing a guest-worker plan that's been debated for years. As many as 1.5 million farm workers and their relatives now in this country illegally could gain legal status under the bill.

The legislation, dubbed AgJobs, would also revise an existing guest-worker program that farmers consider inefficient. It's the first big immigration overhaul bill introduced this year, mirroring legislation passed last year by the Senate but not the House of Representatives.

"I happen to believe we have the votes," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. "I believe the bill can move quickly."

Professed optimism is partly tactical, demonstrating momentum. The press conference announcing the bill amounted to a rally, as AgJobs supporters such as Idaho apple grower Kelly Henggeler, United Farm Workers President Arturo Rodriguez and Manuel Cunha, president of the Fresno, Calif.-based Nisei Farmers League, cheered on the lawmakers.

Previous press conferences convened since 2003 were similarly staged, and Henggeler - a third-generation grower from the town of Fruitland - conceded feeling "a little bit (of) deja vu." Still, the optimism may also have some foundation in fact.

The bill is bipartisan, introduced by Republicans Craig and Sen. Mel Martinez of Florida and Democrats Feinstein and Sen. Barbara Boxer of California. Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., helped negotiate the package and introduced an identical bill in the House.

The legislation would grant "blue cards" to illegal immigrants who could prove they had worked in agriculture for at least 150 days in the last two years. They must continue working in agriculture for several years before attaining permanent legal status.

The Republicans who controlled the House last year refused to bring the guest-worker legislation up for a vote. This year, Democrats control the House by a 233-202 margin.

"With the change in the majority party, I think we're going to see a situation where we get something done this year," said Barry Bedwell, president of the California Grape and Tree Fruit League.

Last year's chairman of the House immigration subcommittee, Indiana Republican John Hostettler, staunchly opposed guest-worker bills. Voters ejected him in November. This year's immigration panel chair, California Democrat Zoe Lofgren, supports the agricultural guest-worker legislation.

Likewise, the skeptical GOP chair of the House Judiciary Committee - Wisconsin Republican James Sensenbrenner - has been replaced by a sympathetic Democrat, Rep. John Conyers of Michigan. Lawmakers added Wednesday that Florida Republican Adam Putnam's service as chair of the House Republican Conference brings a sympathetic voice to the GOP's top ranks.

"There's a little bit more impetus with the change of leadership on the congressional side," said Vito Chiesa, a California peach and almond grower.

The Senate will probably move first, since it took the lead last year. As before, the agricultural guest-worker package could be folded into an immigration overhaul plan that extends beyond farm workers. Congressional negotiators have quietly been redrafting such a comprehensive plan.

The broader proposal will be introduced later with its own fanfare. It will extend to millions of illegal immigrants the opportunity to become legal U.S. residents and, eventually, citizens if they can pay fines and cross other hurdles.

As before, both the broader immigration overhaul and the AgJobs proposal will incite vigorous resistance.

"The Senate has already heard a great number of euphemisms about the AgJobs bill, but let's be clear from the start about what we are discussing," Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., warned during earlier debate. "It is amnesty for aliens employed unlawfully in the agricultural sector, and it is amnesty for the businesses that hire and exploit them as cheap labor."

If resistance to a immigration overhaul bill grows too stiff, Berman said, the agricultural guest-worker package could moved as a separate bill.

KPMG Tax-Shelter Probe Nets A Fourth Guilty Plea (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

A California accountant pleaded guilty yesterday to four criminal charges related to the sale of allegedly improper tax shelters and his role in helping a former KPMG LLP executive try to obstruct a government investigation into the products. The admission marks the fourth guilty plea the government has secured in its investigation into shelters designed by KPMG.

As part of a deal with prosecutors, Steven Acosta, of Pasadena, Calif., admitted to conspiracy, tax evasion and two counts of obstruction of an Internal Revenue Service investigation. The 49-year-old faces as many as 16 years in prison but has agreed to testify against former KPMG executives facing criminal charges related to the shelters in a trial scheduled for September.

Mr. Acosta worked briefly for KPMG, but he wasn't among the 19 individuals -- including 17 former KPMG executives -- indicted in November 2005 on criminal charges related to the tax shelters. Mr. Acosta, posing as an independent investment adviser and hedge-fund operator, said he helped David Greenberg, one of the indicted former KPMG executives, to sell shelters.

Mr. Acosta said he didn't have any knowledge or understanding of the transactions he was purportedly providing advice on. In return, Mr. Acosta said, Mr. Greenberg paid him $600,000 for his role. Prosecutors said Mr. Acosta also lied to IRS agents investigating the tax shelters and that his role in the fraud generated $100 million in losses to the government.

The government contends the shelters were designed to create phony paper losses for wealthy individuals in an effort to evade billions of dollars in taxes. While one of the indicted former KPMG executives, David Rivkin, has pleaded guilty, the other 18 individuals facing trial, including Mr. Greenberg, are fighting the charges.

Mr. Acosta was "a small part of a rather large conspiracy," his lawyer, Jim Henderson, said in court.

Leonard Lesser, a lawyer with Simon Lesser P.C. who is representing Mr. Greenberg, yesterday declined to comment on Mr. Acosta's plea.

KPMG itself in August 2005 entered into a deferred-prosecution agreement with the government over the tax-shelter products and agreed to pay a $456 million fine. The government earlier this month agreed to drop the deferred criminal charge against the firm.

Tax Cuts And Consequences (NYT)

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

The tax system in the United States is supposed to mitigate inequality. But a recent report by Congress's budget agency provides fresh evidence that Bush-era tax cuts have done more to reinforce inequality than to redress it.

The agency found that in 2004, the latest year for which comprehensive data were available, the top 1 percent of households pocketed 14 percent of total after-tax income in the United States, up from 12.2 percent in 2003. That increase, the third largest in one year since the agency started keeping track in 1979, works out to an extra $128 billion. And yet despite that hefty gain, the effective federal tax rate of the top 1 percent decreased slightly.

In contrast, the share of after-tax income going to households in the middle of the income distribution fell to 15 percent in 2004, down from 15.4 percent in 2003 — the equivalent of a $29 billion loss. In that time, the share of their income going to federal taxes stayed about the same.

One of the reasons the rich are getting so much richer than everyone else is that investment income is highly concentrated among the richest Americans and has grown robustly through much of the Bush years — unlike wages and salaries. But the rise in investment income hasn't caused rich Americans' income taxes to rise substantially because — thanks to the tax cuts of 2003 — investments are now taxed at about the lowest rates in the code.

Another reason for the after-tax advance of upper-income Americans is that an ever larger share of their salaries escapes the payroll tax that pays for Social Security benefits. The annual amount of income subject to the tax — now $97,500 — has been adjusted upward each year since 1982, in line with the increase in average wages. But as pay raises at the top of the income scale have increasingly exceeded the average wage gain, incremental adjustments in the wage cap have been inadequate. In 1982, only about 10 percent of all wages escaped the tax. Today, that figure is estimated at 15 percent. The administration has yet to call for raising the cap, though doing so is a matter of simple fairness.

Unfortunately, with the administration having abandoned fiscal prudence for the past six years, it's practically inevitable that inequality will worsen. The bill for the deficit-financed tax cuts of the Bush era will arrive in the years to come. It's likely that the costs will be borne by all, even though most of the benefits have accrued to the few.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Judicial Nominees Rankle Democrats (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 11, 2007

As President Bush withdrew four contentious judicial nominees, apparently offering an olive branch to the new Senate majority, he resubmitted a handful of executive-branch nominations that have angered and dismayed senior Democrats.

The White House's acknowledgment that its withdrawn judicial picks would face near-certain rejection in the new Congress won praise from Democrats and their allied interest groups. But the renewal late Tuesday of several agency nominations signals that Bush is not backing away from confrontation with Democrats who have held up many of the appointments and could renew their previous holds.

Several of the re-nominated officials, such as Assistant Secretary of Homeland Security for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Julie Myers and Assistant Secretary of State for Population, Refugees and Migration Ellen Sauerbrey, already are serving in the administration under recess appointments that allowed them to sidestep Senate confirmation votes but expired at the end of the 109th Congress. John Bolton, who became America's ambassador to the United Nations following a recess appointment, opted to step down from the post last month rather than face a bruising Senate battle to win formal confirmation.

Steven Bradbury's nomination to lead the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel was blocked in August by Sens. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) and Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (Ill.) in protest of the administration's denial of security clearances necessary to investigate warrantless surveillance conducted by the National Security Agency (NSA). Though Justice since has initiated an internal inquiry of the NSA program, Kennedy said yesterday he wants more time for oversight before Bradbury is considered.

"Bradbury was deeply involved in defending the president's program, which allowed warrantless surveillance of ordinary Americans," Kennedy said through a spokeswoman. "We need more information and cooperation from the administration — until then, we should not move forward on this nomination."

Another of Bush's resubmitted nominees, Armenian ambassador hopeful Richard Hoagland, sparked the ire of several senior Democrats by publicly questioning the veracity of the Armenian genocide, a flashpoint in U.S. relations with Turkey. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) blocked Hoagland's nomination last September, and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) joined him in a post-election request for Hoagland's outright withdrawal.

"It would serve neither our national interests nor the U.S.-Armenia relationship to expect ambassador-designate Hoagland to carry out his duties under these highly contentious and profoundly troubling circumstances," Reid and Menendez wrote to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Dec. 1.

Bush also renamed Leon Sequeira, a former aide to Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), as assistant secretary for policy at the Labor Department. Sequeira drew holds last year from Colorado Sens. Ken Salazar (D) and Wayne Allard (R), both of whom were concerned about an unheard petition from workers in their state seeking compensation from Labor. The petition continues to languish, setting the stage for another hold.

C. Boyden Gray, founder of conservative interest group Committee for Justice, was serving as ambassador to the European Union under a recess appointment and also resubmitted. Gray was the subject of several reported Democratic holds in 2005 over judicial-nomination issues that may have evaporated after this week's withdrawal of the four disputed nominees.

DOJ_NMG_0115499

Other nominees resubmitted this week that have earned strong Democratic disapproval include Richard Stickler, a coal-industry executive recess-appointed as assistant secretary for mine safety and health at the Labor Department, and Paul DeCamp as wage and hour administrator at Labor.

Minimum Wage Boost Races Through House (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 11, 2007

The House voted to raise the federal minimum wage Wednesday for the first time in a decade, to $7.25 an hour, as majority Democrats marched briskly through their 100-hour agenda at the dawn of a new Congress.

Ebullient Democrats stood and cheered as the final vote — 315-116 — was announced.

"For 10 years the lowest-paid Americans have been frozen out," said Rep. George Miller of California, berating Republicans who had refused for years to allow a vote on a stand-alone minimum wage increase.

"The little guy is not going to be forgotten any longer," said Rep. Bill Pascrell, whose district includes gritty Paterson, N.J. He estimated the increase would mean an additional $4,400 a year for a family of three.

"The small businessmen we are trying to help for the most part are little guys," countered Rep. Howard McKeon, R-Calif. He said Republicans favor an alternative coupling a minimum wage increase with tax breaks for small businesses.

Other Republicans argued that raising the minimum wage would hurt employment chances for the lowest-paid workers.

The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, would raise the current $5.15 minimum to $5.85 effective 60 days after the measure became law. The minimum would go to $6.55 a year later and $7.25 a year after that.

The White House issued a statement of opposition to the legislation as drafted. It called for the increase to be accompanied by "tax and regulatory relief to help small businesses stay competitive and to help the economy keep growing."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., has already signaled that Democrats will accept pro-business changes. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, told reporters that he and other lawmakers are working on between $8 billion and $10 billion in relief over 10 years.

Businesses that bring in less than $10 million a year would receive relief under one of the provisions in the emerging legislation, and the restaurant industry would be favored under another.

By contrast to the partisan debate on the wage legislation, one of the House's most cherished traditions fell without a struggle.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., issued an order banning smoking in an ornate lobby just off the House chamber where tobacco smoke and political intrigue have coexisted for generations.

"We can no longer risk the health of colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby each day," Pelosi said, and by midafternoon, the ashtrays were gone. Not so a portrait of John Nance Garner, cigar in hand, one of many past House speakers whose likenesses preside over the room.

There was distress across the Capitol, when 89-year-old Sen. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, who walks with the aid of two canes, arrived in the chamber too late to cast a vote.

Reid had cautioned senators he intended to run proceedings more efficiently. But Byrd observed that the Senate also "reveres tradition, seniority, debate, deliberation, experience and common courtesy."

The minimum wage bill is the second of six measures that Democrats intend to pass in the first two weeks of the new Congress. Legislation aimed at making the nation safer from terrorist attacks passed easily on Wednesday. The agenda for Thursday includes a measure to permit expanded federally funded embryonic stem cell research, a bill Bush has threatened to veto.

On Friday, the House is expected to pass legislation directing the administration to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices on prescription drugs for Medicare recipients. Republicans said Wednesday they believed Bush would veto that bill, as well, if it reached his desk as drafted.

Democrats have long claimed the measure would result in significant savings, but congressional budget analysts bluntly disputed that. "We anticipate that the (administration) would be unable to negotiate prices across a broad range of ... drugs that are more favorable than those obtained" under current law, said a letter signed by Donald B. Marron, acting director of the Congressional Budget Office.

The remaining measures on the early Democratic agenda would cut the interest rate on student loans and raise taxes on energy companies to pay for an effort to reduce dependence on foreign oil.

All 233 Democrats voted for the minimum wage measure, along with 82 Republicans. All 116 votes in opposition came from Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0115500

Less than a week after Congress convened under Democratic control, the minimum wage bill offered an early challenge of the party's ability to maneuver in an environment shaped by friendly outside interest groups as well as the White House and Republicans who hold 49 votes in the 100-member Senate.

House Democrats insisted that the bill pass without any relief for small businesses, and the AFL-CIO has lobbied Senate Democrats to go along. Several officials said the issue flared in this week's closed-door caucus of the rank and file, when some liberals challenged Baucus and questioned a strategy that called for early concessions to Republicans.

In response, Reid said Democrats did not have 60 votes that would be needed to pass a stand-alone minimum wage increase over a Republican filibuster, these officials added.

The final measure will be worked out in negotiations between the two houses, and it is likely that Pelosi and House Democrats will ultimately have to accept tax breaks for businesses if they are to get Bush's signature on one of their top priorities.

Under budget rules enacted last week, though, no tax legislation that clears the House can increase the deficit — meaning that the minimum wage bill would have to contain provisions to offset the costs of the tax cuts.

Inflation has eroded the minimum wage's buying power to the lowest level in about 50 years in the time since the last increase took effect. According to Labor Department statistics, 479,000 workers paid by the hour earned exactly $5.15 in 2005, the most recent estimate available. They tend to be under 25 and never married and more likely to be women, minorities and part-time workers.

More than two dozen states and the District of Columbia have minimum wages higher than the federal level. The political potency of the issue was evident last November, when proposals to raise statewide minimums passed in all six states where they came to a vote.

Minimum-Wage Increase Easily Clears House Vote (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Legislation to increase the federal minimum wage cleared the House by an almost three-to-one margin, giving Senate Democrats increased confidence that they can win quick enactment together with tax breaks targeted to small business.

Ending years of party resistance, 82 House Republicans joined in approving the increase, raising the minimum hourly wage standard to $7.25 from $5.15 over the next two years. The first of three 70-cent increments would take effect 60 days after the bill becomes law and would be the first increase in the federal standard in almost a decade.

The long gap, under Republican control of the House, both raised the political stakes of the wage issue and diminished its direct impact on the economy. Labor economists estimate that the six million workers directly affected by an increase represent about 4% of the work force, compared with the 9% directly affected when Congress last approved an increase in 1996.

The impact also varies, since more than half the states have raised their own minimum-wage standards, often to a higher level than the new federal requirement.

Nonetheless the symbolism of the 315-116 vote was huge for the new House Democratic majority, which is struggling to stay focused on its domestic agenda as the debate over the Iraq war increasingly dominates Congress. "This is a question of economic fairness...this goes way beyond the dollars and cents of the minimum wage," said House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D., Cal.).

Final passage followed skirmishes over Republican efforts to add tax- and health-related amendments. But Senate Democrats are poised to add a small-business tax package that will require tax-loophole closings to pay for the estimated 10-year cost of $8 billion to $10 billion.

"This will pass," said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D., Mont.), who is moving to attach the tax package to the House-passed bill and thereby pick up the extra Republican votes needed to assure Senate passage. He wants to make permanent the current work-opportunity tax credit for employers hiring low-wage workers. Small-business depreciation benefits could be expanded, and Mr. Baucus said he is looking at a proposal to make it easier for small employers with inventories to still use cash accounting under tax rules.

When Congress last approved a minimum-wage increase in 1996, the attached business-tax benefits approached $20 billion -- or twice what is now envisioned. But Mr. Baucus is reluctant to go further and use up more of his tax offsets, options he will need in the future to pay for Democratic energy initiatives as well as some form of middle-class protection from the Alternative Minimum Tax.

Instead, he and the ranking Republican, Iowa Sen. Charles Grassley, are expected to rely on a small reservoir of tax-shelter changes that the Senate has passed before but were resisted by the House when under Republican control. Among these targets are leasing tax shelters known as sale in and lease out transactions, which have been criticized by the Internal Revenue Service and which Congress has largely outlawed for leases entered into after March 12, 2004.

Given the continued IRS criticism of the shelters, Senate tax writers have argued that even in cases of leases entered into before the 2004 law, the holders of the shelters shouldn't gain future benefits, especially if the lessee is a foreign person or company. Mr. Baucus said companies that rushed to enter leases after he and Mr. Grassley had set a cutoff date in 2003 could be vulnerable.

House, By A Wide Margin, Backs Minimum-Wage Rise (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The House overwhelmingly approved a $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage on Wednesday, in a vote that Democrats hailed as overdue and a symbol of new leadership on Capitol Hill.

The Democrats, who campaigned against Republicans last year for repeatedly allowing Congressional pay raises when they were in the majority and yet refusing for almost a decade to raise the wage floor from $5.15, said the new, three-step increase for hard-pressed employees would be in sharp contrast to Republican tax cuts approved for the affluent.

"This is the day for the people who empty the bedpans, change the bed linens, sweep the floors and do the hardest work of America," Representative Robert E. Andrews, Democrat of New Jersey, said before the 315-to-116 vote.

Several Republicans spoke against the legislation, a centerpiece of the House Democrats' 100-hour domestic legislative agenda, on the ground that it would reduce the number of available jobs and so deny opportunities to those trying to enter the work force. But 82 Republicans joined all 233 Democrats in supporting the bill, unwilling to cast a vote that could have made them appear unsympathetic to Americans trying to get by on a minimum wage that has not been raised since September 1997.

"Let's not trample on the market, but recognize that nine years is long enough," said Representative Zach Wamp, Republican of Tennessee.

The measure would increase the minimum wage to $5.85 an hour 60 days after being signed into law, to $6.55 one year after that, and to $7.25 after an additional year. For a minimum-wage employee working full time, $7.25 would mean about $4,000 a year more than the current floor.

But the House vote is far from the final word. The legislation now goes to the Senate, where members of both parties have indicated that they intend to tie it to tax breaks for small businesses, to help offset any new costs arising from the wage increase. Linking the two is seen by many as a prerequisite to rounding up the 60 votes needed to overcome any filibuster and open the door to negotiations between the House and the Senate over a final bill. President Bush has indicated that he would sign a bill providing for a wage increase with related tax breaks.

"The 110th Congress is going to do the right thing and finally deliver a minimum-wage increase," the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, said Wednesday. "And at the same time, we should help keep jobs available to America's workers by helping small businesses absorb this wage hike."

In recent years, Republicans repeatedly rebuffed Democratic proposals to raise the minimum, arguing that it could slow the economy. Under pressure from Republicans in swing districts, the leadership last year did allow a vote on an increase, but tied it to a repeal of the estate tax. Democrats, backed by organized labor and other interests, blocked that proposal in the Senate.

During the fall campaign, Democrats made inaction on the minimum wage a mainstay of their arguments against Republican control. Breaking an informal agreement with Republicans not to trade partisan charges over Congressional pay, they contrasted the stalled minimum-wage rate and lawmakers' regular cost-of-living increases. Trying to insulate themselves, the Republicans agreed late last year that Congress would get no more pay raises until a minimum-wage increase was approved.

On Wednesday, Republicans criticized Democrats for blocking any efforts to change the House measure by including small-business tax breaks.

"It is troubling that this bill gives no thought to softening the impact on our engines of new job growth," said Representative Wally Herger, Republican of California.

But Democrats were determined to raise the wage floor with no strings attached.

"Can't you just give these workers an increase and be done with it?" Representative George Miller, Democrat of California and the new chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, asked his colleagues.

Despite their longstanding opposition, two mainstays of the Washington business lobby — the United States Chamber of Commerce and the National Federation of Independent Business — made only a perfunctory effort to influence the House vote, sending members letters of opposition but otherwise conceding the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0115502

"It was a foregone conclusion," said Michael J. Donohue, a spokesman for the federation, which represents small businesses. "Our lobbyists assessed that this wasn't the best way to spend their energy."

The vote was celebrated by organized labor, which is seeing its influence in Congress enhanced with the return of a Democratic majority. But John J. Sweeney, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., joined with Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts and a longtime advocate of the wage increase, in urging the Senate to pass the measure without offsetting benefits for businesses.

"Business has enjoyed hundreds of billions of dollars in tax cuts since Bush took office," Mr. Sweeney said in a statement, "while health care, secure retirements and the minimum wage have all been on government's back burner."

On the House floor, meanwhile, Speaker Nancy Pelosi beamed after the final vote as she brought down her gavel and Democrats cheered the lopsided margin.

House Passes Increase In Minimum Wage To $7.25 (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

The House yesterday overwhelmingly approved the first increase in the federal minimum wage in nearly a decade, boosting the wages of the lowest-paid American workers from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour over the next two years.

The 315 to 116 vote could begin the process of ending Congress's longest stretch without a minimum-wage increase since the mandatory minimum was created in 1938. In the past decade, inflation has depleted the value of the minimum wage to the lowest level in more than 50 years.

Senate Democratic leaders promise to press for a vote on their own minimum-wage legislation this month. Unlike the House-passed bill, the Senate's would include small-business tax cuts that Democrats believe are necessary to placate Republicans and the business community and win the 60 votes necessary to break a possible filibuster.

"On Monday, we commemorate the life of a great American, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. And Dr. King once said: 'Equality means dignity. And dignity demands a job and a paycheck that lasts through the week,' " said House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.). "Today, we heed those words."

The minimum-wage vote followed House action on Tuesday approving legislation to implement many of the remaining anti-terrorism recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission. The House launched its legislative blitz last week by tightening rules on lobbying and imposing new controls on deficit spending. In all four tallies, Republicans who held in lock step during their 12 years as the majority party went over in droves to the Democratic side.

Democrats used the minimum-wage issue effectively during last year's midterm campaign, vowing to approve an increase if they won control of the Congress.

Republican leaders, backed by small-business lobbyists and restaurant groups, argued fiercely that raising the minimum wage would cripple the economy and must be accompanied by significant tax cuts for small businesses to lessen the effect on them. Rep. John Kline (R-Minn.) predicted that a wage increase "will leave recent economic growth dead in its tracks."

But with Democrats ascendant, such arguments did not go far -- especially now, when a tight labor market has boosted incomes and rendered the minimum wage almost irrelevant in many states. Eighty-two Republicans joined 233 Democrats to approve the increase. More surprisingly, 54 Republicans abandoned their leadership and voted with the Democrats on a procedural motion that would have forced House leaders to add business tax breaks to the bill.

Under the Democratic measure, the minimum wage would jump to $5.85 within 60 days of enactment. One year later, the wage would rise to $6.55; it would reach $7.25 a year after that. The bill for the first time would also apply the federal minimum wage to the Northern Mariana Islands, a U.S. protectorate that was protected from federal labor laws for years because of the efforts of now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his Republican allies in Congress.

Democrats estimate that a minimum-wage increase will lift the income of 13 million workers -- 5.6 million earning the current minimum wage and 7.4 million just above that level.

"Today we finally release them from being frozen in time, stuck at that wage level when their gas prices are higher, their education prices are higher, when their medical costs are higher," said George Miller (D-Calif.), the House Education and Labor Committee chairman and the bill's author.

But hurdles remain. When the Senate last year brought a simple minimum-wage increase to a vote, it fell well short of passage. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) plans to complete a package of small-business tax breaks by next week that would cost the Treasury up to $10 billion over the next 10 years. Those measures would mainly extend existing tax breaks, such as a tax deduction for the hiring of welfare recipients, generous tax deductions for business investments and breaks for property leases.

Some Senate Republicans are pushing for tax measures worth twice that much, and they could push a controversial measure to allow small businesses to pool together to buy health insurance. The bill, long sought by Republicans and small-business lobbyists, is strongly opposed by Democrats who say it would allow such "pools" to ignore state health insurance mandates.

John J. Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, said that an increase in pay for the nation's lowest-paid workers "should not have to depend on even more payoffs to business."

The White House yesterday released a statement opposing the House's minimum-wage increase and praising the Senate for considering small-business tax breaks. But the statement of administration policy did express the Bush administration's support for a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage and pointedly stopped short of threatening a veto.

House OKs New Minimum Wage (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The House overwhelmingly approved a raise in the minimum wage yesterday, hailing the first increase in 10 years as a principle of basic fairness that will lift millions out of poverty.

"This is a matter of fairness," Rep. John Lewis, Georgia Democrat and civil rights icon, said of the Fair Minimum Wage Act of 2007, the second of the six bills that new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promised her party would pass. "This is a matter of human decency. This is a matter of human dignity."

The bill, approved yesterday on a lopsided 315-116 vote that prompted cheers from the new Democratic majority when the roll call was announced, would raise the minimum wage over two years from the current $5.15 per hour to $7.25, with intermediate steps at $5.85 and $6.55.

Democrats backed the bill by 233-0, while Republicans opposed it by 116-82.

But what Mr. Lewis called matters of fairness and human decency and dignity will not reign over all U.S. soil.

Although the legislation specifically extends for the first time the federal minimum wage to the U.S. territory of the Northern Mariana Islands, it exempts American Samoa, another Pacific island territory that would become the only U.S. territory not subject to federal minimum-wage laws.

"It's ironic to me that one of the first bills they bring up that promises across-the-board fairness for all has an exception," said Steve Forde, Republican spokesman for the House Education and Labor Committee.

Democrats agreed yesterday that pay rates in Samoa should be raised and that the minimum wage should be uniform across all U.S. territories. But, they said, the working conditions in the Northern Mariana Islands are "screaming out" for immediate attention.

The loophole pleases the tuna corporations that employ thousands of Samoans in canneries there at $3.26 an hour -- an industry-specific rate set by the U.S. Department of Labor. They have lobbied Congress for years, arguing that imposing the federal minimum wage on Samoa would cripple the economy by driving the canneries to poor countries that don't require a minimum wage.

One of the biggest opponents of the U.S. minimum wage there is StarKist Tuna, which owns one of the two packing plants that together employ more than 5,000 Samoans, or nearly 75 percent of the island's work force. The other plant belongs to California-based Chicken of the Sea.

StarKist's parent company, Del Monte Corp., is headquartered in San Francisco, which is represented by Mrs. Pelosi.

A spokeswoman for Mrs. Pelosi said yesterday that the speaker has not been lobbied in any way by StarKist or Del Monte.

A spokesman for Rep. George Miller, California Democrat and author of the bill, also said he is aware of no lobbying to exempt Samoa from minimum-wage laws.

Tom Kiley, Democratic spokesman for the Education and Labor Committee, said the Northern Mariana Islands were included in the legislation because "they were building an economy on importing cheap labor where you had worker abuse that was unparallelled in Samoa or anywhere else." He added that the "goal is for there to be a uniform standard" and that lower Samoan wages should be re-evaluated.

Democrats have long criticized Republicans and the government of Northern Mariana Islands for suppressing wages in their garment industry by not applying the federal minimum wage to the territory's standing $3.05 minimum wage. In particular, they charged former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and a lobbyist for the Mariana Islands government -- Jack Abramoff -- for fostering sweatshops.

Republicans are not expected to try to avert the increase, simply insisting that a minimum-wage raise be accompanied, as yesterday's House bill was not, with what the White House called "tax and regulatory relief to help small businesses stay competitive and to help the economy keep growing."

But Democrats and their allies in such groups as labor unions hailed the bill.

"This country doesn't belong only to the giant corporations and the fat-cat lobbyists," John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, said during a press conference with Democrats on Capitol Hill. "You deserve a decent day's pay for a decent day's work. No more excuses. No more delays."

House Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The first increase in the federal minimum wage in a decade passed the House of Representatives on Wednesday, and both the Senate and President Bush voiced support if small businesses get tax breaks.

Democrats, who control the House for the first time since 1994, pushed through the 41% wage increase on a 315-116 vote in a matter of hours. All 233 Democrats voted yes, along with 82 Republicans. Under Democrats, "the little guy's not going to be forgotten any longer," said Rep. Bill Pascrell, D-N.J.

The measure would boost the wage, $5.15 an hour, to $7.25 over two years in three 70-cent increments. It would affect about 5.6 million people, or 4% of the workforce, and there would be ripple effects for about 7.4 million others.

The federal minimum wage was last increased in 1997, the longest gap since it was set at 25 cents in 1938. The $10,712 salary for a full-time worker has the lowest buying power in 51 years.

SMALL BUSINESS CONNECTION: Your thoughts on the wage increase?

"Walk in the shoes of people who work every single day for a living," said Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn. Most members of Congress earn $165,200, and "this Congress in the last session barely worked two days a week here," she said.

Twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia, representing 70% of Americans, have higher minimums, ranging up to $7.93 in Washington state. The law would immediately affect those who live in the South and Midwest.

Gina Walter, 44, a thrift store cashier from Columbus, Ohio, makes $6.25 under her state's minimum wage law, a wage that will rise to $6.85 this month. She brings home $388 every two weeks; her monthly rent is $365. She can't afford health insurance.

"Sometimes I eat one time a day," Walter said Wednesday.

Republicans offered to raise the wage if the increase was accompanied by tax and health care breaks for the nation's 23 million small businesses. Otherwise, they said, up to 1 million people in the restaurant industry alone could lose jobs, and "what we can't count are jobs that are never offered," said Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga.

The GOP plan, which would let companies band together to buy health plans, was rejected by a 2-1 ratio. Then, 40% of Republicans voted for the wage hike alone. "You can't defend not raising it for nine years," said conservative Rep. Zach Wamp, R-Tenn.

John Nicholson, the owner of Company Flowers in Arlington, Va., said a higher wage would stop him from hiring young people new to the job market. "Some of my best customers have come to me and said on occasion, 'Would you hire my daughter or my son?' " he said. "Now I'm not going to be able to."

To pass the Senate, the higher wage probably will be combined with tax breaks for small businesses, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus, D-Mont., said. That action, backed by Bush, could come late next week.

"The administration looks forward to working with Congress to maintain a flexible labor market and provide a complete package that helps both workers and small businesses," a White House statement said.

House Votes To Raise Minimum Wage (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - The House of Representatives voted Wednesday to raise the federal minimum wage from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 by 2009, giving millions of poor Americans who work their best prospects in a decade to earn higher standards of living.

The legislation, which passed 315 to 116, doesn't include tax relief for small businesses, which President Bush says must be part of any increase he signs. Many Republicans say any such wage hike must be matched by incentives for small-business employers, particularly in the restaurant industry, which they say could lose the most when the minimum wage is raised.

Senate Democrats are expected to include some tax breaks in their version of the legislation in coming weeks and to urge House Democrats to go along, despite objections from liberal lawmakers and the AFL-CIO, in order to clear the Senate and win Bush's signature.

"It's very important we pass a minimum wage - it's also important that small businesses thrive in this country," said Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., one of the new crop of moderate-to-conservative Democrats who won election in November.

Americans working full-time jobs at the federal minimum wage would see their salaries rise under the proposed increase from about $11,000 a year to $15,000.

Democrats, back in control of Congress after a dozen years, see the minimum-wage increase as a key statement of their priorities. It's both a symbol to voters of the Democrats' ability to move legislation that Republicans bottled up for years and a reward to labor unions, a key constituency group for their party. It's also an idea overwhelmingly supported by Americans, including higher earners, polls show.

"This is a matter of fairness. This is a matter of human decency. This is a matter of human dignity," said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a noted leader of the `60s civil rights movement. "It is time Congress actually reflects the will of the American people."

Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas, chairman of the Republican Study Committee, said "lucky" workers would see their pay rise to $7.25 an hour, but he predicted, "Many more will have their hours cut, many will have their benefits cut, and many will lose their jobs."

Rep. Wally Herger, R-Calif., called the legislation "detrimental to small-business growth and job creation."

The last time Congress increased the minimum wage was in 1997, and the nation's unemployment rate fell in each of the next three years as the economy boomed.

In the 10 years since the minimum wage was raised, lawmakers increased their own pay by more than $31,000, to $165,200 last year. And more than half of the states have adopted their own minimum-wage increases.

The proposed increase would affect an estimated 5.6 million workers, largely those employed in service industries and likely to vote Democrat: younger Americans, Hispanics, blacks and women.

It also could pressure employers to raise the salaries of more than 7 million other workers earning slightly more than the minimum wage, economists predict.

Democrats noted that Wal-Mart's chairman came out recently in support of the increase, saying the discount chain's customers have too little income.

Anna Burger, secretary-treasurer of the SEIU, a union representing service workers, applauded the House vote, saying, "We are pleased to see the House is listening to working families and acting on the issues that matter most to them."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., said that if minimum-wage increases had kept up with the cost of living, the current minimum wage would be $9.05 an hour.

Crossing The State Line Is Worth It For $7.93 (NYT)

By Timothy Egan

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

LIBERTY LAKE, Wash., Jan. 9 — Just eight miles separate this town on the Washington side of the state border from Post Falls on the Idaho side. But the towns are nearly $3 an hour apart in the required minimum wage. Washington pays the highest in the nation, just under $8 an hour, and Idaho has among the lowest, matching 21 states that have not raised the hourly wage beyond the federal minimum of $5.15.

Nearly a decade ago, when voters in Washington approved a measure that would give the state's lowest-paid workers a raise nearly every year, many business leaders predicted that small towns on this side of the state line would suffer.

But instead of shriveling up, small-business owners in Washington say they have prospered far beyond their expectations. In fact, as a significant increase in the national minimum wage heads toward law, businesses here at the dividing line between two economies — a real-life laboratory for the debate — have found that raising prices to compensate for higher wages does not necessarily lead to losses in jobs and profits.

Idaho teenagers cross the state line to work in fast-food restaurants in Washington, where the minimum wage is 54 percent higher. That has forced businesses in Idaho to raise their wages to compete.

Business owners say they have had to increase prices somewhat to keep up. But both states are among the nation's leaders in the growth of jobs and personal income, suggesting that an increase in the minimum wage has not hurt the overall economy.

"We're paying the highest wage we've ever had to pay, and our business is still up more than 11 percent over last year," said Tom Singleton, who manages a Papa Murphy's takeout pizza store here, with 13 employees.

His store is flooded with job applicants from Idaho, Mr. Singleton said. Like other business managers in Washington, he said he had less turnover because the jobs paid more.

By contrast, an Idaho restaurant owner, Rob Elder, said he paid more than the minimum wage because he could not find anyone to work for the Idaho minimum at his Post Falls restaurant, the Hot Rod Cafe.

"At $5.15 an hour, I get zero applicants — or maybe a guy with one leg who wouldn't pass a drug test and wouldn't show up on Saturday night because he wants to get drunk with his buddies," Mr. Elder said.

DOJ_NMG_0115506

For years, economists have debated the effect that raising the minimum wage would have on business. While the federal minimum wage has not gone up for 10 years, 29 states have raised their wage beyond the federal minimum.

These increases, according to critics like Brendan Flanagan of the National Restaurant Association, are a burden on the small, mostly family-run businesses in fast food and agriculture that employ workers at the lowest end of the pay scale.

"We see the political momentum for this," said Mr. Flanagan, a vice president at the association, "but we cannot ignore what our members are telling us, which is that it will lead to job losses."

But the state's major business lobby, the Association of Washington Business, is no longer fighting the minimum-wage law, which is adjusted every year in line with the consumer price index.

"You don't see us screaming out loud about this," said Don Brunell, president of the trade group, which represents 6,300 members.

"It's almost a no-brainer," Mr. Brunell said, that the federal minimum should go higher. Association officials say they would like to see some flexibility for rural and small-town businesses, however.

Washington's robust economy, which added nearly 90,000 jobs last year, is proof that even with the country's highest minimum wage, "this is a great place to do business," Mr. Brunell said.

During a recession five years ago, the same group had argued that Washington's high minimum wage law would send businesses fleeing to Idaho. The group sent out a news release with a criticism of the law from John Fazzari, who owns a family-run pizza business in Clarkston, Wash., just minutes from the Idaho town of Lewiston.

But now Mr. Fazzari says business has never been better, and he has no desire to move to Idaho.

"To tell you the truth, my business is fantastic," he said in an interview. "I've never done as much business in my life."

Mr. Fazzari employs 42 people at his pizza parlor. New workers make the Washington minimum, $7.93 an hour, but veteran employees make more. To compensate for the required annual increase in the minimum wage, Mr. Fazzari said he raises prices slightly. But he said most customers barely notice.

He sells more pizza, he said, because he has a better product, and because his customers are loyal.

"If you look 10 years down the road, we will probably have no minimum wage jobs on this side of the border, and lots of higher-income jobs," Mr. Fazzari said.

Job figures from both states tend to support his point. While Idaho leads the nation in new job growth, it has a far higher percentage of minimum-wage jobs than Washington. Minimum-wage positions make up just 2.4 percent of the jobs in Washington, while about 13 percent of the jobs in Idaho pay at or less than the proposed federal minimum wage, according to a study done for the state last year.

Part of the difference could be accounted for by a lower cost of living in Idaho and the higher percentage of technology, manufacturing and government jobs in Washington, economists say. Still, it is hard to find a teenager in Idaho who lives anywhere near Washington who is willing to work for $5.15 an hour.

"Are you kidding? There are so many jobs nearby that pay way more than minimum wage," said Jennifer Stadtfeldt, who is 17 and lives in Coeur d'Alene, which is just a few minutes from Washington. She pointed out that Taco Bell, McDonald's and other fast-food outlets in her town were posting signs trying to entice entry-level workers with a starting pay of $7 an hour.

The House today passed a bill increasing the minimum wage, and about 13 million workers would see a pay raise if the Senate and President Bush approve it. Mr. Bush has said he would approve the wage increase so long as concerns of small-business owners were taken into account; the Senate has not yet taken up the bill.

Several studies have concluded that modest changes in the minimum wage have little effect on employment. A study two months ago by an economist at Washington State University seemed to back the experience of Clarkston and other border towns in Washington. The economist, David Holland, said job loss was minimal when higher wages were forced on all businesses. About 97 percent of all minimum-wage workers were better off when wages went up, he wrote.

But other business groups argue that an increase would hurt consumers and workers at the low end.

In a survey released on the eve of the November elections — in which voters in six states considered raising their minimum wages — the National Restaurant Association said restaurants expected to raise their prices and eliminate some jobs if the voters approved the measures. The initiatives all passed.

Here on this border, business owners have found small ways to raise their prices, and customers say they have barely noticed.

"We used to have a coupon, $3 off on any family-size pizza, and we changed that to $2 off," said Mr. Singleton, of Papa Murphy's. "I haven't heard a single complaint."

White House Is Opposed To New Bill On Stem Cells (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

DOJ_NMG_0115507

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — The Bush administration jumped back into the bitter debate surrounding embryonic stem cell research on Wednesday, urging lawmakers to vote against House legislation to expand such research and calling for a new focus on scientific studies that would not harm embryos.

In a White House position paper, officials pressed for consideration of alternative research strategies that would be "free of the ethical violations of embryo destruction." Administration officials said President Bush was also considering an executive order that would call for increased financing for studies that did not involve embryos.

The move came as the House prepared to pass a bill on Thursday that would expand federally supported stem cell research. The legislation, sponsored by Representatives Diana DeGette, Democrat of Colorado, and Michael N. Castle, Republican of Delaware, would permit federal financing of studies on stem cells derived from embryos at fertility clinics that are scheduled for destruction.

The legislation is expected to pass the House with bipartisan support this week and to pass the Senate in coming weeks. Supporters of the House bill acknowledged, however, that they did not expect to have enough votes to override a presidential veto.

Mr. Bush, who vetoed stem cell legislation passed by the Republican-controlled Congress last year, is expected to do so again, and the White House's engagement on the issue on Wednesday appeared to be aimed primarily at limiting the size of the votes in favor of the bill in Congress.

A fierce social, scientific and political debate over embryonic stem cell research rose in several Congressional campaigns last year and exposed deep fissures among Republicans, pitting the president against members of his own party and what polls say is a majority of the public.

Proponents of the studies say they may ultimately provide cures for illnesses like cancer, heart disease, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease. Opponents say the studies violate the sanctity of human life by encouraging the destruction of embryos left over from fertilization procedures.

Supporters of the measure have argued that such embryos would be destroyed anyway.

The White House position paper highlighted research suggesting that adult stem cells may be reprogrammed to function like embryonic stem cells and a new study that says stem cells present in amniotic fluid might ultimately prove to be as flexible as embryonic stem cells.

Tony Fratto, a spokesman for Mr. Bush, said administration officials were also "reaching out" to lawmakers in the House to press the president's position.

"A thoughtful review of the issue would lead most reasonable people to believe this is a line that we don't need to cross," Mr. Fratto said. "This is a vote of conscience for a lot of members. We hope they take the time to review all aspects of it before casting their vote."

Ms. DeGette said that although she supports all types of stem cell research, the alternatives highlighted by the White House remain at a preliminary stage.

"They keep trying to muddle the issue," she said of White House officials. "None of these other types of research are a substitute for embryonic stem cell research."

Mr. Castle, the Delaware Republican, emphasized that the new legislation was urgently needed. "It is time to update the federal policy to enable scientists in the United States to participate in the race for cures and treatments," he said.

Mr. Bush supports limited scientific research involving embryonic stem cells. Under his policy, which he announced on Aug. 9, 2001, the federal government pays for studies on stem cell colonies, or lines, created before that date, so that the government does not encourage the destruction of additional embryos. In the past six years, more than $130 million has been devoted to such research, officials say.

Because the cells have the potential to grow into any tissue or organ in the body, scientists believe that they hold great promise for treatments and cures. But because human embryos are destroyed in extracting the stem cells, the studies draw intense objections from abortion opponents.

Republican opponents of the proposal say the potential medical advances being promised by its backers offer false hope. "To date, embryonic stem cell research has not produced a single medical treatment, and I believe it is morally wrong to create human life to destroy it for research," Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, said Wednesday.

On Stem Cell Legislation, A Reprise With Twists (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115508

The House is expected to pass today, by a substantial margin, legislation that would loosen President Bush's restrictions on human embryonic stem cell research -- a bill identical to the one it passed in 2005.

Next month, the Senate is expected to do the same, as it did last year.

And all indications are that soon after that, Bush will, for the second time, veto the bill.

But the final outcome of this year's emotional fight over the science and ethics of stem cell research is not as predictable as it may seem, said scientists and congressional strategists on both sides of the issue.

Opponents of the research say they have never been stronger, not only because of the ongoing support of the president but also because several recent studies have suggested that non-embryonic cells have significant medical promise that may rival that of embryonic cells.

Proponents, however, have a new ace up their sleeve as well: the political shifts wrought by voters in November. With stem-cell-friendly Democrats in the majority for the first time since the cells were discovered in 1998, supporters of the research will be able to work Congress's complex rules in their favor.

"This is not a 'one bill and you're out,' but a two-year time frame with potentially multiple legislative possibilities," said a research supporter involved in Capitol Hill strategizing, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to comment publicly.

"They can stretch it out," the strategist said, so Bush and his backers in Congress must keep saying no to research that the public says it strongly supports. The research advocates "can make it as painful as possible."

Congressional leaders driving the legislation say they hope to avoid all-out war. Compromise language "is welcome," Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) said Tuesday at a news briefing, conceding that Bush has rebuffed all entreaties so far.

But if it comes to war, members of Congress and aides from both parties said, supporters have many options not available to them last year. They range from subtle moves that could enhance the odds of overriding a veto to heavy-handed tactics such as attaching the bill to must-pass budget legislation.

"I'm confident we'll have a veto-proof bill this time," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), one of three high-powered Republican supporters of stem cell research who attended the Tuesday briefing. In an odd Washington moment, all three seemed briefly grateful that the Democrats were back in charge.

Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who has led the stem cell charge in the Senate along with Specter, agreed. "One way or another, we're going to get this done this year," he said yesterday in a meeting with Washington Post editors and reporters.

At issue are five-day-old human embryos that are about the size of the period at the end of this sentence. Stem cells from those embryos show promise for their ability to treat a wide array of diseases and for the secrets they may reveal about one of biology's biggest mysteries: how a fertilized egg cell can become a fully formed person.

Under a policy initiated by Bush on Aug. 9, 2001, taxpayer dollars can be used to study only those cells derived from embryos that were already destroyed by that date -- about 21 colonies of cells out of almost 400 that exist today.

The new legislation would expand that pool by allowing funding of work on cells from embryos slated for disposal at fertility clinics and donated by parents. It would also impose some of the first federal ethics rules on stem cell research, including a provision banning the sale of embryos.

The bill has the support of 66 senators, say Senate leaders, and more than the 238 representatives who voted for it in 2005.

Opponents, however, call the research an assault on nascent human life and an abandonment of society's most vulnerable, and there were reports last night that they might try to block passage in the House by attaching "poison pill" language that many stem cell proponents would have a hard time supporting.

Recent news about other, less controversial kinds of cells with traits resembling those of embryonic cells has already complicated the legislative push.

Opponents have long argued that "adult stem cells," various kinds of which exist in bone marrow, umbilical cords and other tissue, are suitable substitutes for embryonic cells. The true potential of those cells remains mostly unknown. But this week researchers published some of the strongest evidence yet that non-embryonic cells -- in this case, cells in the amniotic fluid of pregnant women -- might have much the same capacity as embryo cells.

In an unusual move, the White House itself touted the news Monday in a flurry of "In Case You Missed It" e-mails, as did activist groups such as the National Right to Life Committee.

"We applaud the work of those researchers who continue to look for ethical stem cell research alternatives that do not require destroying human life, and we call on Congress to support such ethical alternatives," the group's legislative director, Douglas Johnson, said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0115509

But scientist after scientist said that, attractive as the new findings are, they remain preliminary and unconfirmed. Moreover, the work is eight years behind the progress already made with embryonic cells, which researchers hope to start testing in patients by next year.

Even the scientist who led the amniotic cell study released a letter Tuesday warning against using his work as an excuse to vote against broader stem cell funding.

"I understand that some may be interpreting my research as a substitute for the need to pursue other forms of regenerative medicine therapies, such as those involving embryonic stem cells," Anthony Atala of Wake Forest University School of Medicine wrote in a letter to DeGette and co-sponsor Rep. Michael N. Castle (R-Del.). "I disagree with that assertion. . . . It is essential that National Institute[s] of Health-funded researchers are able to fully pursue embryonic stem cell research."

One strategy being considered by supporters is to add mollifying amendments to the Senate version, Castle said -- an option that was not open to the Senate last year under the arrangement brokered by then-Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Although specific provisions have not been discussed in detail, Castle said senators could add funding for programs that donate unwanted frozen embryos to infertile women, a favorite program of Bush's; require extra ethical oversight for stem cell research; or beef up support for parallel studies of non-embryonic cells.

Procedurally, if a veto does come, supporters would benefit if the Senate first modified the bill. That is because full passage would require a House-Senate conference, and under congressional rules the Senate would then control the bill. That means the first attempt to override the veto would be in the Senate -- where the votes are believed to be within reach -- instead of the House, which was first to vote on an override last year.

The House effort failed and would have a difficult time succeeding this year. But inspired by a Senate override and perhaps appeased by amendments in conference, some members who vote against the bill today could feasibly vote yes after a veto. Even if the override failed there, the bill would have gotten further than last time, aides say.

At that point, several strategies could come into play, including attaching it to a must-pass bill or holding hearings featuring desperate patients, which might embarrass the White House -- all possible because Democrats now chair the relevant committees. Subsequent votes could follow, forcing a string of vetoes.

"There is nothing wrong with this bill," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "We should pass this bill again and again and again and again, until we get a president who will sign it."

Stem Cell Research Bill Resurfaces In Congress (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, January 11, 2007

Congress and the White House begin a political science experiment today as the House prepares to vote on whether to override President Bush's restrictions on federal funding of stem cell research.

In the House, voting will proceed on the Stem Cell Research Enhancement Act of 2007, which is identical to the one that was passed in the House and Senate last year and then vetoed by the president. A Senate version of the bipartisan bill should come up for a vote after committee consideration in coming weeks, says Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, a bill sponsor.

"We want to basically move research forward," said Rep. Mike Castle, R-Del., a co-sponsor of the House bill, at a Tuesday briefing. "We want to help people in medical situations."

On Aug. 9, 2001, Bush limited federal funding of human embryonic stem cell research to cells from colonies, or lines, collected from embryos that were destroyed before that date, calling it a compromise between medical advances and moral concerns raised by the research.

Bush echoed those views in last year's veto of the new bill, which would open federal funding of research to stem cell lines created from excess embryos donated by fertility clinics with their patients' consent.

"The president's policy strikes a balance of supporting funding — federal funding for research into stem cells — while avoiding federal funding that would encourage the destruction of embryos," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Tuesday.

Although the House bill is expected to pass easily, the real question is whether it will attract enough votes, two-thirds of the total, to override another veto, says Rep. Diana DeGette, D-Colo., a bill co-sponsor. Last year, the bill passed 235-193. A veto-proof majority is more likely in the Senate, Harkin said Tuesday.

"It is just a matter of time before the bill passes," DeGette says. "Even if it will be the next president of the United States who signs it."

Human embryonic stem cells are the precursors to almost every type of tissue formed in the body before birth. Since 1998, when stem cells were first isolated by a team led by James Thomson of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, researchers have seen them as a source of rejection-free transplant organs — if they can be safely grown into specialized cell types — to treat diabetes, Parkinson's syndrome and other ailments.

Opponents of such research, such as Richard Doerflinger of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, decry the destruction of days-old embryos that is needed to generate stem cells, equating it to murder.

The National Institutes of Health spent $609 million in 2006 on stem cell research, most of it on animal stem cells; only $39 million went to human embryonic cells. (In comparison, NIH spent $293 million on asthma and $652 million on Alzheimer's research in 2006.)

Under the Bush policy, fewer than two dozen stem cell lines can be studied using federal money, chiefly in efforts to understand their basic biology. "Exponentially more" embryonic stem cell lines would become available for federal research money if the bill becomes law, says spinal cord repair researcher Aileen Anderson of the Christopher Reeve Foundation Research Consortium.

"Absolutely, the impact of overturning the policy would be significant," says researcher Leonard Zon of the Children's Hospital in Boston, if only in relaxing the necessity that scientists who work on new cell lines raise private funds for their work. Passage of the bill would allow researchers to use at no cost facilities and equipment purchased earlier with NIH money.

In July, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll found that a majority, 58%, of Americans disapproved of Bush's veto. Reintroduced last week, the bill is one of the first brought to a vote by the House's new Democratic Party leadership. Many candidates who were newly elected to Congress last year ran on their opposition to Bush's policy.

Conflict Ahead (RC)

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

President Bush is likely to sign onto the first two big-ticket measures coming out of the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but he and the legislative branch are on a collision course on most other issues of national importance this year.

Given the bipartisan efforts on both a minimum-wage hike and a new lobbying and ethics reform measure, it appears unlikely that Bush will have to use his veto power on either bill. But the same can't be said for myriad other issues that Democrats will tackle this year, notably a $100 billion-plus supplemental Iraq War spending bill, judicial nominations, a stem-cell research measure, and legislation to give Medicare officials the ability to negotiate lower drug prices.

"The fact is, there's a reason the president has only vetoed one bill so far, and that's because the Republican Congress gave him everything he wanted," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "That undoubtedly will change, and he'll have to make tough choices about whether to veto bills."

Likewise, House Democrats conceded that if their efforts to work with Bush fail, "We won't let his opposition on any particular issue stop us from doing what we promised to do," said Stacey Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

And Republicans weren't shy about noting that Bush is likely to pad his record of vetoes.

"That's going to be easy for him to do," said Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.). Still, he noted, "I don't think you'll see Republicans in the Senate rolling over on any piece of legislation just because the president is a backstop."

The White House, however, refused to speculate on the president's future use of the veto.

"It's a little too early to make those predictions right now," said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. "The president will make his veto decisions after the final bills reach his desk."

Still, no one disputes that the highest profile fight will be over the supplemental war spending bill, where Democrats are no doubt poised to use their newfound power to try to make good on their election promises to change the way the war has been run.

One Bush administration official conceded that the White House's biggest concern is what Democrats might try to include in the war supplemental, the request for which Bush is expected to send up in early February.

And the White House has cause to be concerned.

"There will be a significant difference in the way supplementals have been handled in the past," said a senior House Democratic aide, alluding to the Democratic charge that Republicans were a rubber stamp for Bush. "This Democratic Congress will scrub this supplemental. We'll use the power of the purse to affect the policy" in Iraq.

While both Reid and House Democratic leaders essentially have ruled out any attempt to completely stop funding the war, Senate Democratic aides noted that there are many other ways to use the supplemental bill as a vehicle to change the policy on Iraq.

By using report language in the bill, Democrats may be able to highlight their concerns about the war and other issues by requiring periodic reports from the Pentagon on Defense contracting abuses and troop readiness, by mandating that the Bush administration write the costs of the war into its annual budgets, by prohibiting funds for the rendition of terrorism suspects to countries that employ torture in their interrogation methods, or even by demanding that Bush reassign combat troops to support and training missions, to name a few proposals that Democrats have pushed for in the past.

Though Senate Democrats plan a test vote on a nonbinding Iraq resolution as early as next week, much of what Democrats do on Iraq in the supplemental depends on the feedback Members receive from constituents regarding Bush's speech Wednesday on increasing troop levels in Iraq. Plus, Democrats cautioned that whatever they do would have to garner a filibuster-proof majority in the Senate, or 60 votes, and would have to be widely supported by the American people.

"The first thing we have to gauge is the reaction of the American people tonight and tomorrow," Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) said Wednesday before the president's speech. He added that anything that would be added to the supplemental would have to enjoy bipartisan support to survive. "We're not in that big a majority. We may have to wait" on looking at sweeping changes to Iraq policy, he said.

In the House, caution also was the name of the game. "It's a bit tricky because it's funding for the troops," said the senior House Democratic aide. Whatever they do "has to be simple, clear cut and compelling," the aide added.

Though the veto power is meaningless when it comes to nominations, another area of contention between the White House and Democrats will come from Bush's judicial nominations. Although Bush decided to drop some of his most controversial picks earlier this week — a move Democrats praised as a sign the White House recognizes the new political realities in the Senate — it is unlikely bipartisanship will prevail for long.

Although none of the nominees at first blush appear to be as controversial as many of Bush's previous selections, there are a few names that jump out on Bush's list that could cause partisan divisions.

Thomas Hardiman, currently a federal district court judge in Pennsylvania, was embroiled in a mini-controversy in 2003 during his confirmation to the district court when, at the urging of former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), he declined to meet with the Allegheny County Bar Association during their review of his nomination. The association subsequently rated Hardiman as "not recommended at this time."

Likewise, Bush's pick for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, Peter Keisler, also is likely to draw partisan fire. A founder of the influential conservative Federalist Society, Keisler was involved in a number of controversial issues while a lawyer in the Reagan White House, ranging from the Iran-Contra scandal to Reagan's handling of the then-unfolding AIDS crisis.

Similarly, Bush's nomination of Norman Randy Smith to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, originally made last year, likely will face significant opposition. Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) in May 2006 announced his opposition, noting that Bush had broken "with the long-standing precedent of filling circuit court vacancies with a nominee from the same state as the judge who created the vacancy" in nominating the Idaho native over a California judge.

And while Republicans no longer can use the threat of the "nuclear" option to try to force a compromise on Democrats, GOP leaders have made it clear they will continue to push for floor votes on Bush's nominees. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) in his opening statement of the 110th Congress last week noted Republicans "expect an up-or-down vote" for Bush's picks, a common refrain for much of the judicial wars of the past six years.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration and Congressional Republicans also are gearing up for a clash over Democrats' plan to give Medicare officials the power to negotiate lower drug prices for beneficiaries. Senate Finance ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) already has threatened to filibuster, but if the bill makes it out of the Senate, it is likely headed for a veto, Grassley said.

"I don't have any doubt that we have enough [votes] to sustain a veto," Grassley said of the 67-vote hurdle proponents of any vetoed bill would have to overcome. "I don't know if we have the votes to sustain a filibuster, though."

Additionally, Bush already vetoed a bill to federally fund stem-cell research that involves the destruction of donated human embryos last year; another veto of a virtually identical measure would not come as a surprise to many.

Other potential measures that could cause heartburn for, and a veto threat from, the White House are a nascent Democratic attempt to revisit a bill that curtailed habeas corpus rights for terrorism suspects and any measure Democrats may devise to deal with the National Security Agency's warrantless wiretapping program.

Experts Fault House Bill On Medicare Drug Prices (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Democrats are fond of citing the Department of Veterans Affairs as evidence that Medicare officials could squeeze lower prices out of drugmakers if the government merely used its negotiating clout. But that comparison ignores important differences between the two systems, experts say.

Unlike Medicare, VA by law receives an automatic 24 percent discount from the average price that wholesalers pay. Its prices are also low because VA, which prescribes medications for 4.4 million veterans annually, has a relatively narrow formulary, or list of approved drugs. The agency secures big discounts from the manufacturers of a few drugs in each class by promising not to offer competing drugs. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) is prohibited by law from adopting such a list for the year-old Medicare drug benefit, in part because seniors enrolled in what is known as Part D want to have a wide range of drug choices.

The legislation that House Democrats hope to pass tomorrow to require the Bush administration to negotiate drug prices for Medicare would neither permit a formulary nor require an automatic discount. It would simply require the secretary of health and human services to pursue negotiations and report back to Congress in six months.

That is part of the reason that many experts do not expect the measure to deliver significant savings even if it overcomes opposition in Congress and escapes a possible presidential veto.

In fact, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office said yesterday that the House bill would have a "negligible effect" on federal Medicare spending because without a formulary the HHS secretary probably could not obtain better drug prices than those negotiated by the many private insurers who offer Medicare drug plans.

"The federal government can get lower prices, but only if it's willing to exclude a certain number of drugs from the formulary," said Robert Laszewski, a nonpartisan health policy consultant in Washington. "And that's a huge political leap that I would be very surprised if this Congress took. I don't think they are going to give CMS any teeth."

"The VA is really a different animal than Medicare Part D," said Robert B. Helms of the American Enterprise Institute, who was an assistant secretary of health and human services in the Reagan administration.

But Democrats and their allies say that the gulf between drug prices under the VA system and those under Medicare is too large to ignore, and that requiring the government to negotiate prices for Medicare would help narrow the gap significantly.

On average, prices are 58 percent higher in Medicare than in the VA system for the 20 drugs most commonly prescribed for seniors, according to a study released Tuesday by the nonprofit advocacy group Families USA. The lowest price for a year's supply of 20-milligram pills of the cholesterol-lowering drug Lipitor, for instance, was $1,120 in Medicare and $782 in the VA system, the report said.

"These high prices are devastating seniors," said Ron Pollack, the group's executive director.

Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Energy and Commerce subcommittee on health, called eliminating the current prohibition on government negotiations a "no-brainer."

"It makes absolutely no sense to say that the administration should not be able to negotiate prices for all these seniors," Pallone said. "There's no way it's not going to save a significant amount of money."

Pallone said Medicare could obtain prices similar to the VA system's even without a formulary. "I have every reason to believe that there is enough persuasion power, with different things that could be implemented by the secretary, that could get down to those levels," he said. He added that Democrats will consider further changes down the road.

Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), lead sponsor of the House bill, discounted the importance of the CBO analysis. "Common sense tells you that negotiating with the purchasing power of 43 million Medicare beneficiaries behind you would result in lower drug prices," he said.

Critics of the VA comparison note that some of VA's costs are buried in overhead. The department employs the doctors and nurses who write the prescriptions, and it operates the mostly mail-order pharmacies through which 76 percent of veterans' prescriptions are distributed. Medicare does not have that kind of infrastructure, and seniors have demonstrated a preference for retail pharmacies, CMS officials say.

CMS officials also note that about a quarter of the 3.8 million Medicare beneficiaries who get VA health-care benefits are also enrolled in Part D, in which the choice of drugs is broader.

"It's apples to oranges," former CMS administrator Mark B. McClellan said of the comparison. "The VA is a closed health-care system relying on mail order and a tighter formulary than Medicare beneficiaries have shown they prefer."

House Set To Vote On Medicare Drug Benefit (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 11, 2007

The debate over legislation amending the Medicare prescription-drug benefit moves to the legislative arena from the campaign trail this week with a vote in the House tomorrow and a Senate hearing today.

So far, congressional Democrats are moving ahead without asking the Bush administration to weigh in, but that hasn't stopped the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) from taking a lead role in pleading the Republican case against Democrats' claims that federal negotiation of drug prices will save money for taxpayers and senior citizens over the deals the private Part D plans are striking with pharmaceutical companies.

The House Democratic leadership may not be allowing its Republican counterpart to offer alternative bills, and Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) may not have invited any administration officials to this morning's hearings, but the GOP message against the Democratic bill is taking shape in advance of the real battle in the Senate set for later this year.

Current law expressly forbids the government from "interfering" with negotiations between the private plans and the drug companies. The House Democratic bill proposes to strike that language and instead require CMS's parent agency, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), to negotiate with drug makers but also prohibit HHS from excluding any drugs from Part D.

The administration's mounting campaign against the Democratic proposal also is accompanied by a more aggressive defense of Medicare Part D by congressional Republicans, most of whom previously had appeared reluctant to claim credit for the creation of the entitlement program expansion despite high approval ratings from beneficiaries.

CMS claims that the private Part D plans are negotiating discounts with drug makers that are good enough to make federal involvement unnecessary.

CMS and Part D's defenders in Congress note that the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) determined in 2004 that federal price negotiations would be ineffective.

In a letter sent to then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in January 2004, then-CBO Director Douglas Holtz-Eakin wrote, "We estimate that striking that provision would have a negligible effect on federal spending because CBO estimates that substantial savings will be obtained by the private plans and that the Secretary would not be able to negotiate prices that further reduce federal spending to a significant degree."

House Minority Leader John Boehner's (R-Ohio) office re-circulated that letter to reporters this week.

But congressional Democrats and their allies contend that CBO's evaluation is wrong, citing the deeper discounts obtained by the Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) for former military-service members.

The liberal advocacy group Families USA this week released a study comparing the VA's prices for the 20 drugs most commonly used by senior citizens with those paid by the five largest providers of Part D benefits. According to the Families USA report, "Among those top 20 drugs, the median difference between the lowest Part D plan price and the lowest VA price is 58 percent."

Although the administration consistently has touted Medicare Part D as a success, most congressional Republicans have been slow to embrace the program.

Democrats made Part D, and federal negotiation of drug prices, a central point of their campaigns during the midterm elections and one of their top priorities at the start of the 110th Congress. Nevertheless, few Republican candidates chose to tout the program on the campaign trail.

But with the House bill speeding its way to the floor and the Senate debate looming in the coming months, congressional Republicans are adopting a more aggressive stance.

This morning, members of the House Republican leadership will be joined by conservative rank-and-file lawmakers at a press conference to rail against the Democratic bill, which is set for a vote on Friday. Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (R-Va.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) headline the event, which also will feature GOP Reps. Paul Ryan (Wis.), Pete Sessions (Texas), Patrick McHenry (N.C.), Tom Price (Ga.) Michael Burgess (Texas) and Phil Gingrey (Ga.).

In the Senate, Finance Committee ranking member Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), one of few authors of the bill that created Part D still in office, has taken on the role of lead attack dog against the Democratic proposals and already has made several floor speeches.

One of Grassley's speeches highlighted the fact that Democratic proposals from the 1990s to create a Medicare drug benefit also included language excluding the government from price negotiations, a talking point also used by House Energy and Commerce Committee ranking member Joe Barton (R-Texas) and other Republicans. Democrats maintain they long ago rejected that position and that these past bills are not relevant to the current debate.

Medicare And The Market (WP)

By Mike Leavitt

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

We all want people with Medicare to get the prescription drugs they need at the lowest possible prices. The issue before Congress this week is how best to do that. Should consumer choice and private-sector competition determine prices -- or should government?

The success of the Medicare prescription drug benefit provides strong evidence that competition among private drug plans has contributed significantly to lowering costs. The average monthly premium has dropped by 42 percent, from an estimated $38 to $22 -- and there is a plan available for less than $20 a month in every state. The net Medicare cost of the drug program has fallen by close to $200 billion since its passage in 2003.

Seniors and people with disabilities like the benefit. Studies consistently show that three-quarters of Medicare beneficiaries are satisfied with their coverage. Individuals like being able to choose the plan that best fits their needs. A single, one-size-fits-all drug plan would have made the choice easier, and Congress did create a standard plan. But fewer than 15 percent of enrollees have selected that standard plan -- opting instead for plans with lower premiums, no deductibles and enhanced coverage.

Despite the success of the benefit, some people believe government can do a better job of lowering prices than a competitive marketplace. Legislation under consideration would require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate and set the prices of drugs. In effect, one government official would set more than 4,400 prices for different drugs, making decisions that would be better made by millions of individual consumers.

There is also the danger that government price setting would limit drug choices. Medicare provides access to the broadest array of prescription drugs, including the newest drugs. But price negotiation inevitably results in the withholding of access to some drugs to get manufacturers to lower prices.

The Department of Veterans Affairs, often cited as an example of how government can negotiate prices, operates an excellent program for veterans, but the VA formulary excludes a number of new drugs covered by the Medicare prescription benefit. Even Lipitor, the world's best-selling drug, isn't on the VA formulary. That may be one reason more than a million veterans are also getting drug coverage through Medicare.

Some observers point to the massive buying power of the federal government as the means to exert clout over drug companies, but the federal government has nowhere near the market power of the private sector. Private-sector insurance plans and pharmacy benefit managers, who negotiate prices between drug companies and pharmacies, cover about 241 million people, or 80 percent of the population. Medicare could cover at most 43 million.

The independent Congressional Budget Office has said that government price negotiation would have a "negligible effect on federal spending." And previous experience with Congress and Medicare regulating drug prices has not been reassuring. Medicare Part B, which covers physician services, outpatient hospital care and other services, sets the prices for some medicines -- notably a number of cancer drugs. It has a history of reimbursing at rates substantially greater than prevailing prices. In 2005, Part B drug spending increased by almost 20 percent.

If the federal government begins picking drugs and setting prices for all Medicare beneficiaries, administrative costs would add a new burden to taxpayers. The Department of Health and Human Services would have to hire hundreds of new employees. Legions of lobbyists would follow, each seeking higher Medicare payments for the drug companies they represent. As a Post editorial noted in November, "having the government set drug prices is a sure way of flooding the political system with yet more pharmaceutical lobbyists and campaign spending."

There is a proper role for government in setting standards and monitoring those who provide the benefit. We should ensure that beneficiaries have access to medically necessary treatments. But government should not be in the business of setting drug prices or controlling access to drugs. That is a first step toward the type of government-run health care that the American people have always rejected.

There are many ways the administration and Congress can work together to make health care more affordable and accessible. But undermining the Medicare prescription drug benefit, which has improved the lives and health of millions of seniors and people with disabilities, is not one of them.

Bush Urged To Extend Healthcare Cover (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

Senator Edward Kennedy called on the White House to follow the lead of state governors and move to extend healthcare coverage to the uninsured.

Mr Kennedy will play a key role as chairman of a congressional committee on health in shaping a debate on broad US healthcare reform that is likely to coalesce around the 2008 presidential elections.

The Democratic party is attempting to devise a politically viable approach to health reform that addresses the high level of anxiety Americans express in polls about economic security and health insurance.

Mr Kennedy said: “Insurance coverage is down. Costs are up. And America is heading to the bottom of the league of major nations in important measures of the quality of care.”

The call for the Bush administration to look to state governments for leadership follows a plan set out by Arnold Schwarzenegger, the Republican governor of California, this week that would extend healthcare to 6.5m uninsured Californians.

Mr Kennedy also cited bipartisan co-operation in his home state of Massachusetts, which is the first state to require all residents to have a health plan.

DOJ_NMG_0115515

Under Governor Mitt Romney, a contender for the Republican presidential nomination, the state introduced a mix of subsidies and penalties to make the insurance more affordable and compel people to buy into plans.

The efforts by state governors to reduce the number of uninsured are likely to be the most far-reaching in the next two years, as Congress focuses on addressing existing loopholes by increasing funding to cover poor families and children who fall foul of income rules.

The proposals presented at Senate hearings convened on Wednesday by Mr Kennedy are more likely to inform Democratic policy going into the next election.

Jacob Hacker, a Yale professor, presented a plan that would compel employers to pay into publicly administered health plans or offer staff comparable private plans. That would leave most large employers' existing plans untouched but would raise payroll taxes by at least 6 per cent for those that did not offer robust coverage. The 32-year-old professor is gaining influence withthe Democratic party and said the plan was designed around existing private and public programmes "to avoid the dismal fate of previous reform campaigns".

The Bush administration's budget next month will include its plans to expand means-testing in Medicare.

Sen. Kennedy Seeks Universal Health Plan (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 11, 2007

The federal government should join the state of Massachusetts in enacting universal health coverage, said Sen. Edward Kennedy, the new chairman of the Senate committee with jurisdiction over numerous health issues.

Kennedy's home state is the first to require everyone to have health insurance, just as drivers must have automobile coverage.

Kennedy has his own version of what universal health coverage would look like. He wants to extend Medicare to all. In his first hearing Wednesday as chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, the Massachusetts Democrat called on 10 witnesses from all over the country to talk about how to make health care more affordable.

"Insurance coverage is down. Costs are up. And America is heading to the bottom of the league of major nations in important measures of the quality of care," Kennedy said.

Kennedy emphasized how Democratic legislators in his home state worked last year with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney in crafting universal coverage there. He wants the same spirit of compromise to take hold in Congress.

However, the hearing also showed that finding agreement won't be easy. While all the witnesses agreed that health care is becoming less affordable every year, they often had very different solutions.

For example, the Business Roundtable renewed its calls to change medical liability laws and for the federal government to give consumers more information about the cost and quality of the care they get, two priorities often cited by the Bush administration.

"High health care costs are affecting job creation, and high health care costs are hurting our ability to compete in global markets," said Larry Burton, the roundtable's executive director.

But Andrew Stern, international president of the Service Employees International Union, called for much more dramatic change. He told lawmakers that it's time to recognize that employer-based coverage "is dead." The statement infers a much more active role for the federal government in funding health care.

Karen Davis of the Commonwealth Fund, which conducts health research, told lawmakers to look at Denmark as a model for the U.S. She said that nation's government pays doctors a capped rate for each of their patients, plus additional amounts when they perform a service. Each doctor handles about 1,500 patients, and they can handle walk-ins and same-day appointments. And Denmark residents love their health care system, she said.

Most of the witnesses agreed on two points:

First, Congress should expand funding for a health insurance program that now provides health insurance to about 5 million children. The children live in families that make too much to qualify for Medicaid, but not enough to afford the monthly health insurance premiums offered through the private sector.

Second, Congress should not get in the way of states trying to grow the number of residents who have health insurance.

The state of Massachusetts employs a combination of subsidies and penalties to make insurance more affordable and to force people to buy it. The law requires employers with 11 or more full-time employees to offer health coverage or be subject to a $295 fee for each employee, as well as face being billed for services their uninsured employees get.

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger this week proposed a plan that would extend health care to 6.5 million uninsured Californians. Under the proposal, all Californians must have insurance, although the poorest would be subsidized.

Some of the committee's Republicans would like the committee to renew its attention to help for small businesses. They support a plan that would let businesses buy insurance through regional or national trade associations. The insurance would be free of many state mandates. That could make it a cheaper alternative, but would also provide scaled-back coverage in some instances.

"My primary interest is to provide health insurance reform for small businesses and working families, and I believe that 1 million more people will be insured if we enacted the (small business health plans)," said Sen. Mike Enzi, R-Wyo.

Also, Wednesday, the Children's Defense Fund called on Congress to provide health insurance for all children in the U.S. About nine million live in families without insurance. The organization said all children in Medicaid or the State Children's Health Insurance Program should be automatically enrolled in one program that provides all medically necessary care.

Children in families with incomes over 300 percent of poverty could also pay premiums that would allow them to participate.

"A child's chance to survive and thrive should not depend on the lottery of geography," the organization said.

Where '100 Hours' Will Hit The Brakes (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

The three rooms on the third floor of the Capitol, steps away from the Senate floor, have a storied past. They are called the LBJ Suite, because they were the domain of Lyndon B. Johnson, who as majority leader famously installed two wet bars and added a bathroom, from which he conducted meetings and issued directives while taking care of his personal business.

The suite's new occupant is a man as anonymous as Johnson was flamboyant, Richard Durbin, the 62-year-old senior senator from downstate Illinois. In the next two years, however, a great deal of the Democrats' fate depends on Durbin. As assistant majority leader, or whip, it is up to him to figure out how to corral enough votes in the narrowly divided Senate to pass at least some of the flood of bills that the energized House Democratic majority will send over.

Durbin recognizes the magnitude of the challenge. "I just spent two years as minority whip," he recalled in an interview the other day, "where I had 45 Democratic votes. And, as you well know, if you can find 41 votes to block cloture" -- the move to cut off debate -- you can prevent the majority from bringing its bills to an up-or-down vote.

"So my job, time and again, was to find 41 stalwarts out of 45. Now, I look at [Republican Minority Whip] Trent Lott, and he has the same job, but he has 49 Republican senators, so he has a larger pool from which to find his 41."

So as the role of the minority whip has become easier, the role of the majority whip has become harder. While Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada leads the policy debates and handles the public relations, the onus is on Durbin to produce the votes at critical moments.

Having served in both the House and Senate over 24 years, he understands the differences between them. "The Senate is designed to stop things," he said, and that poses a challenge to ambitious Democrats.

Ask Durbin what will happen when the flood of bills -- raising the minimum wage and achieving other Democratic goals -- coming out of the House during the ballyhooed "100 hours" reaches the Senate, he laughs and recalls the words of former House speaker Tom Foley to his colleagues: "Remember, the Republicans are the opposition. The enemy is the Senate."

No doubt, Durbin says, House members and perhaps some of the public will be frustrated because "it's going to take us longer, and it will be done differently."

"They will finish their 100 hours with great pride, and then we will begin 100 days," he said.

As he has gotten to know his flock of new senators, Durbin said he is struck by the diversity of the Democratic caucus. "Jon Tester and Bernie Sanders are two different souls," he said, referring to the freshman senators from Montana and Vermont, the first a nonideological rancher, the second an avowed socialist.

"But there's a lot of commonality on the basics," he said, meaning economic, educational and health-care concerns. "Where we're likely to break down is on the bumper-sticker issues" -- abortion, gay marriage, etc.

Durbin said he thinks "the last election was a sobering experience for many Republicans," and he is hopeful of finding support from the other side on at least some issues.

That is particularly true of the Iraq war, which, Durbin said, "overshadows everything else in this session." In a floor speech last week, Durbin listed the domestic programs that could have been financed with what the Iraq war has cost -- and it was a staggering array. He said at least 45 of the 51 Democrats are supportive of beginning a troop withdrawal.

The final complication for Durbin is the number of presidential candidates within his ranks -- probably at least five. Durbin said he notices that "they watch each other a lot," but he hasn't encountered sabotage related to White House ambitions. As time goes on, and they start spending even more time on the campaign trail, "I worry about absenteeism," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0115517

But he credited Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon with a creative solution to that problem. "Ron says we ought to form a designated-driver caucus," Durbin said, "of people who are ready to drive the Senate agenda while their colleagues who are intoxicated with the idea of being president are sitting in the back seat."

Reid Runs Tight Ship, Leaves Byrd Behind (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Just days into his tenure as majority leader, Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) received a tongue-lashing from Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) for a decision to end a vote before the senior statesman had cast his "yea" or "nay."

Byrd, who has served in the Senate since 1958 and is a noted stickler for the rules and etiquette that guide the chamber, was unable to make it to the floor in the 15 minutes allotted for a vote yesterday -- his first missed vote since March.

"The leadership arbitrarily closed the vote before I could get to the floor," Byrd told the Associated Press. "That is not the way legislation is done in a body such as ours."

Had he made it to the floor on time, Byrd would have cast the 17,780th vote of his career. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, played down the controversy, insisting that the majority leader has "nothing but the highest regard for Senator Byrd."

Since the 110th Congress was convened last week, Reid has emphasized his intention to run the body more efficiently, a plan that includes limiting votes, which often have lasted a half-hour or more, to just 15 minutes. An e-mail sent Monday to the offices of Democratic senators reiterated the point.

At 89, Byrd is slowed by a neurological condition known as benign essential tremor and uses two canes to get around the Capitol. On Friday, he tripped while on the Senate floor but was quickly pulled to safety by former senator John Glenn (D-Ohio), who is 85.

Byrd's age and physical condition were an undercurrent in his reelection race in November, though Byrd dismissed its import. The voters of West Virginia agreed and elected Byrd to a ninth term with 64 percent of the vote.

Republicans Come Out Swinging (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

House Republicans have chosen leaders who aren't afraid to attack Democrats to serve in key positions for the 110th Congress, suggesting that the civility on Capitol Hill may not last long.

Republicans say they have every intention of fighting tough to regain power.

For example, Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina, beginning his second term, was recently named to serve as a member of the deputy Republican whip team, typically made up of more senior lawmakers. Considered one of the party's up-and-comers, the 31-year-old is known for his frequent tongue-lashings aimed at Democrats.

"I will not hesitate to point out their hypocrisy and their unwillingness to live by their own campaign pledges," said Mr. McHenry, the youngest member of Congress. "I'll work to get our conservative ideas enacted into law and stop the bad things the Democrats want to do to our country."

Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri held nothing back when he criticized Democrats for not allowing Republican amendments on their "first 100 hours" agenda. He said the new majority party members were being disingenuous when they promised bipartisan spirit.

"Unfortunately, so far, we don't see much of that partnership," Mr. Blunt said Tuesday. "It's a sort of a check-is-in-the-mail approach to the things the American people have been told and what we've been told."

The Republicans are also quick to note Democrats' use of unfair tactics -- such as not subjecting their opening legislative package to committee hearings -- but did not acknowledge that they used the same strategy for years.

"It's a shame that the agenda they campaigned on so publicly is being put together so secretly," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Republicans say Mr. Putnam, 32, has fire in his belly and a hunger to return to the majority. And they say what Mr. McHenry lacks in age he makes up for in energy and bark.

"We will hold their feet to the fire, just as ours were," Republican Conference Vice Chairman Kay Granger of Texas said of the Democrats. "Patrick will be a good messenger for that."

As one of several deputy whips, Mr. McHenry will aid Mr. Blunt and Chief Deputy Republican Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia in helping to track votes on legislation and pushing minority-party legislation.

As for this week, Republicans have adopted a refrain of complaint, saying the opening hours of the 110th Congress have been unfair and smack of political design.

DOJ_NMG_0115518

It was "truly a shame" that Democrats turned the September 11 commission debate into a "partisan political tool," lamented Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida.

Rep. David Dreier of California had some fun as he managed the opposition time on the floor, calling Republicans the "struggling minority."

"I'm loving my role here in the minority, Madame Speaker," he said, later handing the floor to one of his colleagues.

"I yield to the former chairman and future chairman of the committee on appropriations," Mr. Dreier said, hardly able to stifle a laugh as he introduced Republican Rep. Jerry Lewis, a fellow Californian.

Senate-Foiled Dudley Named Bush Adviser (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appointed conservative academic Susan Dudley to an influential new job advising on regulatory policy, at a time the regulatory process could serve as a conduit for the White House to push through any policies opposed by a hostile Congress.

Her appointment came after Congress blocked her nomination to be the White House's regulatory czar last year. Her position as a senior adviser to the White House's regulatory office will enable her to influence policy decisions, although she won't be able to implement them on her own. She could, for example, push for better scientific justification for new rules.

The apparent end run around Capitol Hill angered liberals who object to her criticism of the federal rule-making process, among other things.

Most recently, Ms. Dudley headed regulatory studies at the Mercatus Institute, a market-oriented research center under George Mason University, which has received funding from large Republican donors.

Mr. Bush nominated Ms. Dudley last summer to run the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs, a division of the White House budget office. At her Senate hearing, she got tough questions from Democrats and some Republicans.

The committee didn't vote on her nomination. Mr. Bush has resubmitted her name to the Senate, but she is considered unlikely to be approved. Instead, in her new White House job, she likely will serve some of the same functions as the office director. Environmentalists complained. "The White House is again displaying its contempt for carrying out and enforcing the law to protect the public," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen.

A White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, said Ms. Dudley is "a respected voice who understands that careful research and transparent analysis lead to good regulatory policy. She is exceptionally qualified and will make an outstanding administrator of OIRA."

U.S. Banks Oppose New Capital Rules (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta And Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Citigroup Inc., J.P. Morgan Chase & Co., and two other large U.S. banks brought concerns about pending international capital standards known as Basel II to White House officials as crucial deadlines for the standards approach.

The Jan. 4 meeting represents the most recent -- and perhaps highest level -- attempt by the group of banks, which include Wachovia Corp. and Washington Mutual Inc., to bring substantive changes to the Basel II capital proposal before next year. The Federal Reserve and other bank regulators are still discussing how to implement the standards by next January.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto confirmed the banks met with National Economic Council staff, but he said NEC Director Allan Hubbard didn't attend. The NEC advises the president on domestic and global economic issues.

"We have an interest in it, obviously, but the Fed and the Treasury have been taking the lead," Mr. Fratto said.

Since last year, the four banks have publicly complained that the U.S. Basel II standards aren't in line with the capital requirements that foreign banks will be using under Basel II. They have said this could put U.S. lenders at a competitive disadvantage.

One concern has been that if foreign banks are able to hold less capital than their U.S. competitors, foreign banks might be able to offer lower prices on things such as multimillion-dollar syndicated loans and other products.

Fewer than 20 of the largest U.S. banks are expected to use the new Basel II standards. More than 8,000 other banking companies are expected to be able to use simplified rules known as Basel IA.

In June, the four banks met with officials from the White House's Office of Management and Budget to discuss their Basel II concerns. They have also met several times with U.S. lawmakers on the issue.

Tape Reveals Defiance (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, January 11, 2007

A secretly recorded meeting of researchers working for the Department of Veterans Affairs indicates that the department did not take seriously congressional requests intended to safeguard the personal and medical information of veterans.

The recording, obtained by The Hill from a researcher who attended the meeting, sheds light on a behind-the-scenes struggle between lawmakers and Veterans Affairs officials over the handling of veterans' personal information.

"If you want to know what's the real purpose of the data call, read Machiavelli. It's about power, it's about Congress saying, 'VA, you're accountable to us,'" one Veterans Affairs official, Dr. Joseph Francis, says on the tape. "We're not asking people to do an A-plus job on this report."

Questions on the security of the information rose to prominence last May when a Veterans Affairs employee lost to theft a laptop computer containing the personal information of 26.5 million veterans and military personnel. Although authorities eventually recovered the laptop, the incident sounded alarms on Capitol Hill.

Since then, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee has held eight hearings on the department's information technology. The panel also has asked the department repeatedly to report on the security of its information systems, a task that entails providing information about who had access to sensitive information and how it was stored.

The Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee also asked for reports on what sensitive information is accessible to government contractors.

"We've had multiple requests on where they are and what they're doing," a House Veterans' Affairs Committee source said, adding that department officials failed to provide adequate answers when Congress demanded them. "We've asked that for multiple times, who had access to what, and they still could not tell us at the time."

The source said the department has responded to bipartisan congressional requests very slowly. The source predicted that there would be additional hearings in coming weeks.

But Veterans Affairs research officials with access to millions of medical records thought the congressional requests to be unreasonable and simply an exercise in exerting power.

Francis, the deputy chief of research and development at the department, told researchers at a private meeting held last year in Baltimore that Congress would not get what it was looking for.

"We basically told folks that that was impossible and we were told, 'We know that it's impossible but we were told by Congress to do it,'" Francis told subordinates during the Sept. 6 meeting, referring to higher-ups at the department. "I can tell you we will do the best job we can and it will not be everything we're being asked to look for.

"You're not going to be able to look at every question of every issue between now and Sept. 20," he said. "You're not going to be able to look at every study.

"Frankly, we had a lot of discussions, and there's a lot of guidance that could not be put in writing because it would cost people jobs in Washington," he added. "But there's a lot of people who know how unreasonable this request is."

Francis told the researchers to remember the core mission of the department.

"Take care of veterans, take care of their needs," he said, but he did not seem to believe answering fully Congress's security concerns was the best way to do so.

Veterans Affairs spokesman Terry Jemison defended the department in a statement.

"VA takes information security seriously and is fully committed to continue to work closely with Congress to bolster our data protection," he said. "The purported comments of a single employee do not reflect our culture and pledge to improve control, training, responsibility and accountability in all aspects of data security that put custody of veterans' personal information first."

Francis declined to comment.

One of the researchers secretly recorded the talk and shared it to expose what that person believes is lack of concern for veterans' privacy. Francis is the acting deputy chief research and development officer at Veterans Affairs, handling many of the administrative responsibilities of VA's chief research and development officer, who is in charge of all research at the department.

"This shows the cynicism," the whistleblower said. "Here when Congress does step forward to do something good, the agency takes it very casually and cavalierly. It really illustrates that, to the researchers at the VA, the veterans are guinea pigs and are there to promote the research, which is used in turn to promote researchers' careers."

The source claimed that high-level researchers at the department are not sufficiently concerned about the vulnerability of medical information because of financial stakes tied to their research. The source said that many researchers sign lucrative contracts to work for pharmaceutical companies after leaving the department.

DOJ_NMG_0115520

Forty percent of all VA research involving human subjects is funded by industry, according to Veterans Health Administration directive 2003-031, dated June 13, 2003. The document also states that when simple chart reviews are excluded, industry funds 80 percent of all research VA conducts on human subjects and that "systematic weaknesses" exist "in the human research protection programs, especially in studies funded by industry."

The president of the Alliance for Human Research Protection, Vera Hassner Sharav, criticized Francis's comments when she was told of them.

"Why is he saying it is impossible?" she said. "It is because they don't want to have anyone looking over their shoulders. What it shows is that they don't really give much of a priority to people's personal privileged information.

"The area of research subjects is always shrouded in secrecy. The secrecy in this arena is to protect the researchers and the sponsors, not the subjects, because when people get hurt they don't want to be held responsible."

The House Veterans' Affairs Committee source said that the department knows its data is vulnerable and that securing it poses a significant challenge.

"They must have 250,000 access points that enter into the VA database system at some point or another," the House source said. "There are 230,000-plus employees, and contractors and residents. They [are] in collaboration with 122 medical schools with which they are affiliated."

The House source said lawmakers have tried to find out how many people connected to VA have the same access to personal information as the employee who lost the infamous laptop in May but that VA still can "not completely" answer that question.

The source said if the department followed proper information accounting practices, "you should be able in an hour to find on a data call who has access to what."

But Francis said in his candid comments that the VA has ignored federal legislation directing executive-branch departments to adopt higher cyber-security standards.

"Congress is actually rather angry at the VA because we've been technically breaking the law for a decade," Francis said. "In 1996 legislation was passed called the Clinger-Cohen Act that really set the timing for all agencies to follow certain types of business principles in IT [information technology] procurement and IT management, including cyber security. We've basically ignored that; many agencies didn't."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Speaker's Lobby (HILL)

By Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, January 11, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Wednesday that smoking in the Speaker's Lobby will no longer be permitted.

"The days for smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over," Pelosi said in a press release issued this morning. "I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example. Effective immediately, smoking will no longer be permitted in the Speaker's Lobby."

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), a close ally of Pelosi's, has long been pushing for the smoking ban.

Pelosi said that the dangers of secondhand smoke put the health of "colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby" at risk every day.

At the start of this year, the District of Columbia followed the lead of several other major metropolitan areas by banning smoking in public areas.

The American Lung Association praised Pelosi for eradicating smoking in the Capitol.

"The decision to make the U.S. Capitol, the symbol of our nation's democracy, smoke free is both an important public health victory and a symbolic decision," said John Kirkwood, president and CEO of the American Lung Association. "By making the Speaker's Lobby smoke free, Speaker Pelosi has ended the days of smoke-filled rooms."

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is among many members who regularly smoke in the Speaker's Lobby.

Pelosi Tells Smokers To Butt Out (RC)

By John Mcardle

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

While smoke-free advocates celebrated Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) announcement that Members would no longer be allowed to light up in the Speaker's Lobby as of Wednesday morning, those known to enjoy a smoke break during House votes attempted to shrug off just how much they'd be impacted by the new rule.

DOJ_NMG_0115521

When asked about Pelosi's new ban, Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), who is known for having an ever-present cigarette in hand when doing interviews in the ornate room just off the House floor, said, "That's fine. ... No it won't affect me at all."

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), a well-known cigar smoker, said, "It's not a big deal. If it had come to a vote on it I would have voted against it."

And while Pelosi's announcement made national headlines Wednesday morning, Frank said the subject of where he and his fellow smokers will now go to light up "is way too trivial to get into print. ... I have constituents who have much bigger concerns than how I relax."

But Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), co-chairman of the Congressional Task Force on Tobacco and Health, was quick to rush out a press release Wednesday morning applauding Pelosi's smoke-free policy.

"With so many interns, pages, and young staff looking up to Members of Congress it is important that we be held to a higher standard," Meehan wrote. "I look forward to working with Speaker Pelosi and my colleagues to continue to fight against tobacco use and to save thousands of lives, children and adults."

House Democratic Caucus Vice Chairman John Larson (Conn.) said he expects the Sergeant-at-Arms office will be charged with enforcement of the ban. Also, Democratic sources explained Wednesday that peer pressure will be a main enforcement mechanism.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), also a co-chairman of the tobacco task force and longtime advocate for ending smoking in the House, said he certainly would say something to a colleague if he saw him or her smoking in the Speaker's Lobby in the future.

"I sure would," Waxman said. "But I think Members would respect the rules. ... I'm pleased this finally happed. It was such an outrage to jeopardize the health" of those who work in the Speaker's Lobby each day.

While Meehan noted that "the next step should be to expand this ban to include the entire Capitol complex," Pelosi's new rule will affect only the indoor portions of the Speaker's Lobby. (By early Wednesday afternoon workers from the Architect of the Capitol's office had taken away the four gold ashtrays that decorated the room and put them into storage, according to AOC officials.)

Pelosi did maintain a smokers' refuge on the balcony that Members have access to from the Speaker's Lobby, although Democratic sources said there are no plans to add any new amenities to the few chairs and ashtray pots that adorn the outside space.

Members still are allowed to determine their own policies on whether to allow smoking in their personal offices, and Pelosi is not expected to alter that long-standing tradition. Also House-side smokers are permitted to light up in two designated public areas; Room B-219 of the Longworth Building, which is located adjacent to the Longworth Food Court; and Room B-112 of the Cannon Building, across the hall from the Cannon Carryout. Both smoking areas are enclosed and equipped with ventilation systems. Smokers who go outside to smoke must stay at least 25 feet away from any public entrances or exits to the buildings.

In making her announcement, Pelosi cited the recently enacted Washington, D.C., smoking ban, which outlawed smoking in bars and restaurants in the city as of Jan. 2.

"I applaud the District for joining the dozens of other major cities, including my home town of San Francisco, in recognizing the need to protect the public from secondhand smoke," she said. "As Members of Congress, we must be held to a higher standard. We can no longer risk the health of colleagues, staff, pages, reporters and others who pass through the Speaker's Lobby each day."

On his way into the Capitol on Wednesday afternoon, former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who controlled the policy of the lobby for the past seven years, didn't have much to say about Pelosi's new nonsmoking rule.

"It's certainly her prerogative to do it," he said. He also pointed out that the decision doesn't really affect him. "I don't smoke."

Pelosi Bans Smoking In Lounge Of House (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The days of cutting deals in smoke-filled back rooms in the Capitol are officially over. At least the smoke-filled part, that is.

Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday issued a ban on lighting up in the speaker's lobby, a lounge behind the speaker's rostrum where House members relax between votes, talk to reporters and chat among themselves.

Until Tuesday, the portrait-lined room with its high-backed chairs was often hazy with cigarette and cigar smoke.

"The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over," Pelosi said. "Medical science has unquestionably established the dangerous effects of secondhand smoke."

Pelosi said the ban was effective immediately.

"That's fine," said minority leader and cigarette smoker Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio.

"That's how life is now," said Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Calif., an occasional smoker.

Some members were a little abrupt. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., a cigar aficionado, told reporters asking about the ban to call back "when you have some serious issues you want to talk about," spokesman Steve Adamske said.

Pelosi's decision brings the Capitol closer in step with local laws and a national trend. The District of Columbia banned smoking in workplaces in April and in restaurants and bars as of New Year's Day. Twenty-one states and dozens of cities have banned smoking in workplaces, restaurants and bars.

"We're quite pleased," said Angela Bradbery, co-founder of Smokefree DC, which was behind the recent ban in Washington. "It's about time."

Cynthia Hallett of the California-based Americans for Non-smokers' Rights said, "People in the Capitol deserve the same smoke-free protections as other workers in the District of Columbia. Smoke-free air in the workplace is no longer just a California trend — it is a national expectation."

William Corr, executive director of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, urged members of Congress to follow Pelosi's lead by adopting smoke-free policies in their personal offices.

Pelosi's ban only applies to the lounge area behind the House gallery, said Drew Hammill, her spokesman. Hallways and other public areas were already covered by a ban issued in 1993 by then-speaker Tom Foley. Last year, smoking was banned within 25 feet of entrances to the House office buildings. By tradition, personal office policies are set by the members, and Pelosi is not changing that tradition, Hammill said.

"This is the decision she's made for now. There's no timeline for anything else," Hammill said.

Pelosi's reference to "smoke-filled rooms" has symbolic significance when spoken by the first female speaker of the House, said Muriel Fox, a co-founder of the National Organization for Women.

"In the old days, decisions were made undemocratically between small groups of people, all smoking their heads off," Fox said. "It happens that only men had power in those days."

In Nancy Pelosi's House, It's No Ifs, Ands Or Butts (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats took control of Congress aiming to erase perceptions of lawmakers and lobbyists drafting legislation in smoke-filled rooms. Now they are targeting the smoke-filled room itself.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi used her newly won powers to ban smoking in an anteroom off the House floor where lawmakers can relax and talk during floor debate. The so-called Speaker's Lobby was one of the few remaining havens where smokers could indulge their habit. But under the new Democratic Congress, that tradition is over.

The federal government banned smoking in federal buildings more than a decade ago. In the spring, the District of Columbia outlawed smoking in all workplaces and most indoor public areas. Starting this month, it became illegal to smoke in nearly all bars and restaurants in the nation's capital.

But Congress often exempts itself from the law. Unlike most other employers, members of Congress are exempt from laws governing maternity leave. They may also carry guns on the Capitol grounds, despite a District-wide ban.

In a similar vein, lawmakers were allowed to smoke in certain places on Capitol Hill, primarily in the Speaker's Lobby and in their own offices. The Lobby is an anteroom off the House floor -- behind the podium where the Speaker and the President stand during the State of the Union -- that may be used only by lawmakers, reporters and some congressional staff.

In the lobby, a group of mostly Republicans, led by Minority Leader John Boehner, of Ohio, used to lounge in a set of leather chairs and smoke. On Tuesday evening, the night before Ms. Pelosi issued the smoking ban, Rep. Tom Cole (R., Okla.) was among lawmakers who enjoyed a final cigar in the room.

Smokers say they will either step outside to smoke or light up in their offices, where smoking is permitted.

In the Senate, smoking is allowed only in senators' offices. The smell of cigar smoke often hangs in the air outside the Capitol office of Sen. Robert Byrd (D., W. Va.), while visitors can catch Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill.) sneaking a few puffs outside the building.

The smoking ban, which is effective immediately, is a victory for California Democratic Rep. Henry Waxman's long-running campaign against smoking. Mr. Waxman, the new chairman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, led the effort to ban smoking in the U.S. Capitol and the House's office buildings. Last year he prodded then-Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois to eliminate the smoking section in one House cafeteria. "The smoke didn't respect the old dividing line," he said.

Democrats had made headway in banishing smoking from Capitol Hill before they lost control of Congress in 1994. Former Democratic Speaker Thomas Foley banned smoking in most of the House side, though not the Speaker's Lobby. But when Republicans took control, tobacco-using leaders reversed course. Even Mr. Waxman's ban on smoking in his health and environment subcommittee was reversed by the panel's new chairman at the time, Rep. Tom Bliley, a pipe-smoker from Virginia.

The new ban didn't please all Democrats, several of whom are cigar-smokers. Rep. Barney Frank, the senior Massachusetts Democrat, said: "I'm not happy about it, but there's nothing I can do about it."

House Bans Smoking, And Few Complain (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — Democrats banned smoking inside the House on Wednesday. Then they quickly congratulated themselves, squeezing as much symbolism out of the moment as they could.

“The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over,” the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, declared.

Whether Democrats are any less inclined to make backroom deals than Republicans, the new majority will be remembered for bringing the rules of the House into line with those in the rest of the District of Columbia, numerous states and corporations, several European countries and all major airlines.

And it did so with surprisingly little outcry from the smoking crowd. “I’m O.K. with it,” Representative Mike Simpson, Republican of Idaho, said as he headed out onto an adjoining balcony for a cigarette between votes.

He did, however, glance nostalgically toward the spot where a large ashtray once stood.

“That was the circle,” Mr. Simpson said, referring to the spot where he and other Republicans once gathered around Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the minority leader and a noted chain smoker. “That was where the decisions on the future of the country were made.”

It was also where some of the more geriatric members of the House — including at least one who used an oxygen tank and rode a motorized cart during the last session — came and went during votes. Representative Henry A. Waxman, Democrat of California Democrat and a longtime advocate of the ban, said he had received numerous complaints from members about the second-hand smoke, which wafted onto the House floor and into halls.

“Why should people have to quit their jobs to protect their health?” Mr. Waxman asked, beaming as he talked about the ban. “It was long overdue. It took Nancy Pelosi to put this in place.”

Lawmakers can still smoke in their individual offices, but they can no longer light up in the ornate hallway outside the House chamber known as the Speaker’s Lobby, the spot where lawmakers often gather to talk with each other and with journalists. Most other areas of the Capitol, including the public areas outside the Senate, had already banned smoking.

Now, Mr. Waxman was asked, could he eliminate the phrase “smoke-filled room”?

“I don’t have the power to do that,” he replied. “I only have the power to investigate clichés.”

On a day when Iraq and the minimum wage dominated the news in Congress, few smokers were clamoring to discuss the change. Mr. Boehner — who has been spotted cradling a lit cigarette inside his palm when he darted from the Speaker’s Lobby to the House floor for votes — dismissed a question about the ban, saying it was fine. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who often puffed on a cigar in the lounge, refused to comment on it (his aides recommended calling back with a more serious question).

One lawmaker who was spotted heading out to the balcony for a cigarette — and who did not want his name used because he was “not known to be” a smoker — said he was glad to obey the new rules. And then he pointed at a reporter and said, “It’s a lot healthier for you.”

A Smoking Tradition Snuffed Out By Pelosi (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Some fresh air blew into the Capitol yesterday, after House Speaker Nancy Pelosi banned smoking from the most venerable nicotine haven on the hill -- the Speaker's Lobby outside the entrance to the House floor.

Pelosi, of smoke-free California, is known to detest the tobacco habit. Ever since her ascension as top Democrat with authority over the lobby and most other space in the House, smokers have been bracing for the moment when they'd be ordered to extinguish their butts.

DOJ_NMG_0115524

One of the heaviest smokers, Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who is partial to Barclays, was resigned to the new reality yesterday. As majority leader in the last Congress, Boehner ignored calls to ban smoking from the Speaker's Lobby. But now, as minority leader, he has little choice but to abide by Pelosi's wishes and told reporters he was fine with the ban.

For generations, the Speaker's Lobby has been the most visible space where smokers gather inside the Capitol. It is an ornate space dotted with fireplaces, leather armchairs and chandeliers. Lawmakers relax there between votes and debates, often meeting with staff members, reporters or the public and huddling in informal groups. Cigarette smokers tended to dominate the daytime hours there; at night, the cigar smokers took over.

Pelosi said she was banning smoking from the area to protect the health of the staff, reporters and public who spend time in the lobby. "Medical science has unquestionably established the dangerous effects of secondhand smoke, including an increased risk of cancer and respiratory diseases. I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example," Pelosi said in a statement. "The days of smoke-filled rooms in the United States Capitol are over."

Not quite.

Smoking is still permitted in lawmakers' offices, in two designated smoking rooms in the House office buildings and in a small, concrete room in the Capitol's basement.

And Pelosi's ban took effect a week after the District prohibited smoking from most public spaces, including restaurants and bars.

Yesterday afternoon, two Senate staffers and two Capitol Police officers puffed away inside their basement hideaway, a cramped, room stuck amid maintenance closets and stacks of bottled water. A ceiling-mounted ventilation box drew up their fumes as they ate lunch, smoked Marlboros and worked Sudoku puzzles. "What are you going to do?" one of the staffers shrugged as she considered the dwindling number of places she can smoke. She asked not to be identified, saying it would anger her boss.

Paul Billings of the American Lung Association said that smoking room and others ought to be eliminated, too. "This is a first step, we want to extend smoke-free to all workplaces in the congressional complex," said Billings, whose organization has collected 9,000 signatures on a petition asking Congress to ban all smoking on Capitol Hill.

Pelosi Snuffs Out A House Smokers Haven (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — Throughout the U.S. Capitol are reminders of the days when tobacco was king.

Tobacco-leaf designs decorate walls. Brass spittoons adorn the Senate chamber. A portrait of a former House speaker shows him clutching a cigar.

And until Wednesday, ashtrays could be found indoors just steps away from the House chamber.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Wednesday snuffed out smoking in the speaker's lobby, previously one of Washington's most famous smoke-filled rooms. It is an ornate place where lawmakers for decades have puffed away between votes.

No more, Pelosi declared.

"I am a firm believer that Congress should lead by example," she said, citing the dangers of secondhand smoke.

Hours after the decree, the ashtrays were gone and nary a whiff of smoke sullied the air.

Smokers, already restricted from lighting up in many places, seemed resigned.

"That's fine," said House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), a smoker who along with others will now be forced to light up on an outdoor balcony off the speaker's lobby.

"I'll survive," added Rep. Thaddeus McCotter (R-Mich.), another smoker.

Anti-smoking advocates took a deep breath of relief. "It's just great," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles).

Smoking was banned on the House floor in 1871 and in the Senate chamber in 1914. The Senate has no equivalent to the speaker's lobby, so smoking was not permitted anywhere on the Senate side of the Capitol — though Congress members are allowed to smoke in their offices.

The policy comes about a week after a smoking ban on bars and nightclubs went into effect in Washington, making virtually every workplace in the city smoke-free — except those controlled by Congress.

John Kirkwood, president and chief executive of the American Lung Assn., praised Pelosi's decision, saying it demonstrated to the nation that "Congress is playing by the same set of rules as everyone else."

Bernanke Set To Speak Before Budget Committee (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And David Rogers

DOJ_NMG_0115525

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's efforts to stay out of politically charged fiscal questions will be tested next week as he makes his inaugural appearance before a congressional budget committee.

Mr. Bernanke is to testify on the fiscal and economic outlook before the Senate Budget Committee Thursday, Jan. 18. Committee officials confirmed the appearance Wednesday. President George W. Bush releases his budget on Feb. 5.

Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, frequently testified and commented on budget policy, often generating great controversy, in particular for endorsing Mr. Bush's tax cuts at the Senate Budget Committee in January 2001. Mr. Bernanke, who took office in February last year, has said he does not want to comment on specific tax and spending proposals, saying those are the purview of Congress and the administration.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D., N.D.), who confirmed Mr. Bernanke's appearance, said the Fed chief "doesn't want to get into this specific spending program, this specific revenue program. I think he thinks that's not his purpose."

Mr. Conrad, an outspoken critic of Mr. Bush's fiscal policies, added, "It's entirely reasonable for him to talk about effects on the economy [of] deficits and growing debt, to give us an economic outlook -- that's entirely appropriate."

Mr. Bernanke has shown he's willing to talk in broad terms about fiscal issues. In previous speeches and testimony, he has talked about the need to address a projected surge in spending on Medicare and Social Security as the population ages.

A Sweet Deal For 'Official' Felons (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

James A. Traficant Jr., the former Democratic congressman convicted of racketeering and taking bribes, is wiling away prison time painting colorful pictures but also able to collect a congressional pension of nearly $40,000 a year.

He is one of about 20 former senators and congressmen with felony rap sheets who can receive the taxpayer-financed benefit.

"They have lost their cases, lost all their appeals and still collect the check," said Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, an Illinois Republican who introduced a bill that would stop future congressional felons from pocketing retirement pay.

"Millions of taxpayer dollars have gone to felons," Mr. Kirk said.

A similar measure is being offered by Democratic Sens. Ken Salazar of Colorado and John Kerry of Massachusetts in an amendment to that chamber's ethics reform bill, which is expected to go to a vote tomorrow.

Other recent convicts include former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican convicted of graft and imprisoned last year, and former Rep. Bob Ney, an Ohio Republican convicted last year of corruption charges tied to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Cunningham is eligible for about $36,000 a year, while Ney is in line for a $29,000 annual pension, according to estimates from the National Taxpayers Union (NTU). Other estimates, from groups such as the Congressional Research Service, vary slightly.

Former Rep. Daniel Rostenkowski, an Illinois Democrat convicted in 1996 of mail fraud related to the House post office scandal and pardoned by President Clinton in 2001, this year will collect an estimated $125,000 congressional pension, according to NTU estimates.

Ney and Mr. Rostenkowski could not be reached for comment.

Prison officials said Traficant could not be contacted by telephone at the Federal Medical Center in Rochester, Minn., a prison that provides mental- health services; nor could Cunningham at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, a temporary prison for inmates awaiting placement in the federal penal system.

Currently, only a conviction for treason or espionage results in a forfeiture of the pension.

The average congressional pension is estimated at $50,000 a year.

"The only thing crazier than giving a member of Congress convicted of a crime a federal pension is the fact that we still need a bill to prevent a convict from receiving their pension," Mr. Salazar said. "Any member of Congress who abuses their position of authority for their personal profit deserves a prison sentence, not a government pension."

Bills that would withhold the pensions from members of Congress convicted of major crimes have been introduced in the past and failed. They usually die in the Senate.

"They always worry that somehow they will get caught and lose their pensions," Mr. Kirk said of the senators. "They have always killed this common-sense reform."

The measure's supporters say they are optimistic this time because of the strong push for ethics reforms this session -- a response to voter anger at Washington corruption that is credited in part for Democratic gains in last year's midterm elections.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, promised "serious consideration" of the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0115526

Still, the effort is encountering the usual skepticism among seasoned lawmakers in both chambers and on both sides of the aisle.

"I understand the image," Senate Republican Whip Trent Lott, Mississippi Republican, said of the pension payments. "I think the concept is achievable, but we had better be careful about it."

"It is easy to pontificate and take this great ethical stand, but then you have to ask yourself, 'Well, what about this senator's or this congressman's innocent spouse who still has to live? What about the money that was actually paid into the retirement system?' "

The specter of punishing "innocent spouses" also was raised by Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

"I would think the type of offense committed should have some weight, especially for someone who violates the public trust," he said. "We shouldn't have any different standard than any other part of government."

Honoring Jamestown's Intrepid (WP)

By Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

JAMESTOWN, Va., Jan. 10 -- Danny Schmidt stood in the big hole and talked fast, peeling away the centuries with words just as he and other archaeologists have been doing with shovels and wheelbarrows for the past few years.

Around the rim of the hole stood some of the most powerful people in Virginia, peering down at the curious scars gouged into the hard-packed earth some 400 years ago, uncharacteristically quiet for an assembly of legislators.

This was the place where it all began, the site of the first permanent English-speaking settlement in North America, the point of contact between African, European and Native American cultures.

Wednesday was the highest-profile event so far in a series that began last year to commemorate the settlement of Jamestown. To mark the 400th anniversary, Vice President Cheney addressed members of the General Assembly inside the cramped Memorial Church that was built in 1907, and legislators toured the grounds of the settlement where representative democracy would take hold. The festivities will culminate in a three-day celebration this May and a visit by Queen Elizabeth II.

Inside the hole, Schmidt explained, was one of the shallow pits -- not much bigger than a foxhole and cut like a square -- that probably served as an English colonist's original shelter after the settlers made landfall in May 1607.

And over there were the cobblestone remains of the foundation of the governor's house and the shaft of a well that ran dry.

And way over there, where the James River offered the closest thing to silver that any of the adventurers would ever find in that malarial swamp, were the excavated graves of the first 22 Europeans to die.

One had been a boy, maybe 14, who had been struck in the thigh by an Indian's arrow, said Schmidt, a staff archaeologist with the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities, a nonprofit organization digging at the site of the original fort since 1994.

"Oh my God," Del. Albert C. Eisenberg (D-Arlington) blurted out as Schmidt talked of the death toll. "Remember, they all came here to get rich."

A major theme of yesterday's event was that Virginia's key role in the creation of American democracy has sometimes been overshadowed by New England's. A whoop went up when Cheney noted that the Jamestown colonists had already convened a representative assembly by the time the Pilgrims arrived on the Mayflower.

Another theme, also touched on by Cheney, was that the Europeans' many glowing achievements had been accompanied by more unpleasant realities, such as the enslavement of African Americans and the destruction of Native Americans.

Delegates tramped the grounds on a brisk and gusty day under a bright blue sky, more than a few embarrassed that they had never visited before. And many, like Del. William H. Fralin Jr. (R-Roanoke), felt uplifted and somewhat diminished at the same time by their predecessors' achievements.

"I'd like to think we'd be as hardy and faithful and trusting to fate as these settlers were," Fralin said. "But the reality is, they were a separate breed."

Fralin paused to send a squirt of tobacco juice downwind, mindful that the pinch of Skoal in his lip could be traced, in a way, to the cash crop that rescued the struggling colony. Then he continued, thinking about what it must have been like for the voyagers to leave their homes in England to cross the Atlantic to the New World.

"For most of these guys -- and women -- when they stepped on that ship and saw the land of civilization pass away, they most likely knew they were not going to see that civilization again. That takes a lot of faith and courage," he said.

That was also on the minds of a few tourists who strolled the museum and living history reenactments at the nearby Jamestown Settlement before the security cordons and delegates took over.

"We're so used to our conveniences now," said Lonnie Spielman, 50, an electrician who lives in Hagerstown, Md., and was spending a week in a timeshare with his wife, Debra, 50, an office manager.

"If the electricity goes out for three hours, or we don't have a hot shower for a day, we're inconvenienced," he said.

Cheney Opens Legislature At Jamestown (WT/AP)

By Dena Potter And Bob Lewis

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

JAMESTOWN, Va. -- It was fitting for Virginia to begin its 2007 legislative session at the place where representative democracy in America was born, Vice President Dick Cheney told legislators yesterday.

In a speech that stressed themes of religious faith, sacrifice and personal courage, Mr. Cheney helped open the Virginia General Assembly's winter session at the site where the first English settlement in North America was established 400 years ago.

"It's striking to realize how much of America's story begins with a little three-sided fort raised on the banks of the James River four centuries ago," Mr. Cheney told legislators who packed into the historic Jamestown Memorial Church.

The first meeting of Virginia's legislative body in nearly 350 years at Jamestown was held to mark the start of the anniversary year. The highlight of the commemoration is a scheduled visit in May by Queen Elizabeth II -- retracing the steps she made to Jamestown in 1957 when she visited the site on its 350th anniversary.

Although the first meeting of the House of Burgesses wasn't until 12 years after the settlers landed in May 1607, Mr. Cheney recognized Jamestown's contributions to America.

"Indeed, so much of what defines our country -- its language, legal traditions and institutions -- have roots in the community that rose in this corner of Virginia," Mr. Cheney said.

The Republican vice president entered to cheers by Republican legislators and polite applause from Democrats. His 10½-minute speech, however, was devoid of partisan tinge and often lyrical.

Mr. Cheney's best line came when he said, "The history of our country did not begin on Cape Cod in 1620," and Democrats and Republicans alike cheered the comment. Toward the rear of the chapel, Republican Delegates Chris B. Saxman of Augusta and William H. Fralin Jr. of Roanoke stood and shouted their approval.

During the speech, Mr. Cheney read from a dispatch written by a Jamestown colonist in 1610, after starvation, disease and attacks from Indians during a bitter winter killed nearly three-quarters of the settlers.

"It read, and I quote: 'Be not dismayed at all. Let England know our willingness, for our work is good, and we hope to plant a nation where none before has stood,' " Mr. Cheney said.

"Even across the centuries, it is admirable and inspiring that such hopeful words could be written in the year 1610 amid difficulties that our generation can scarcely imagine. And it's a reminder that no matter how important deeds may be, things of the spirit are first," he said.

As he spoke, a chill wind fanned whitecaps across a milewide stretch of the James River a few feet from the reconstructed log palisades of the original three-sided Jamestown Fort and the rustic brick church.

The session opened with a prayer from Steven R. Adkins, chief of the Chickahominy Indian tribe. It was his ancestors who greeted the first settlers.

He opened the prayer in his native tongue, saying, "Great Spirit, the loving Father of all nations."

The session closed with a prayer by the Rev. Jay Timothy Harrison Sr., a black Baptist pastor. The first Africans brought to America came as servants to Jamestown in 1619, beginning a 250-year legacy of slavery in the state.

The opening-day events -- held about 50 miles southeast of the Capitol in Richmond -- drew bipartisan praise.

Delegate Mamye E. BaCote, Newport News Democrat, said she enjoyed Mr. Cheney's speech and being able to take the time to see where America's form of government began.

"It kicked off the beginning of representative government in America, and it has evolved," Mrs. BaCote said. "This is what we preach when we go out to other countries."

Delegate Phillip A. Hamilton, Newport News Republican, said that he was humbled to be a part of what he called a historic event and that Mr. Cheney was right to recall the horror and privations the original settlers endured.

"It's a great boost to Virginia, and it does reaffirm the role of Virginia in the history of this nation," Mr. Hamilton said.

$200-a-Head Dinner Doesn't Pass Taste Test (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115528

While the Senate began debating stricter ethics rules for its members this week, a fancy dinner planned for some Senate press secretaries tomorrow night in New York, paid for with corporate money, has raised a few eyebrows.

Two dozen flacks will arrive in Manhattan today for an annual excursion to meet with media outlets, a trip sanctioned by the Senate ethics committee as "official" business. This means that the aides pay for costs out of pocket -- Amtrak, W Hotel, chartered bus -- and later request reimbursement from official funds. The itinerary shows the members of the bipartisan Senate Press Secretaries Association with a full schedule of meetings with such organizations as the Wall Street Journal, CBS, NBC, the United Nations and others connected to their work.

But the "gasp" factor, as one corporate executive put it, centers on the $200-a-head closing dinner at the elite Rainbow Room, one of the country's best-known upscale restaurants, sponsored by seven high-profile corporations with business interests before Congress. They include the American Gas Association, Toyota, the Recording Industry Association of America and Microsoft. Because rules limit to $50 what an aide can accept for a meal, and because fried calamari alone costs $35 at the Rockefeller Plaza establishment, one might ask how these folks can justify accepting an invitation to the dinner.

Here's how: Their letter from the ethics committee explains that under the rules, they may accept a free meal if it is at a "widely attended event" -- at least 25 people from outside Congress. This rule, as it turns out, is a real boon to these sponsoring corporations that have each been asked by Dittus Communications, the organizer, to bring five guests to the dinner.

John Reid, president of the Press Secretaries Association and former spokesman for defeated senator George Allen (R-Va.), said the group was meticulous in its commitment to staying within the letter of the law.

But one lobbyist who is not attending the dinner noted that "given the [political] atmosphere right now, appearances matter. . . . Everyone is being very careful about this type of stuff."

As far as the ethics watchdogs are concerned, the dinner doesn't pass the smell test. "This is a kind of access and influence buying that concerns us," said Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause. "Why are these companies doing this? The only answer is for goodwill. They want to be remembered, they want to influence these communicators. Everyone knows press secretaries are very influential."Kerry Stepping Up?

As Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) waits patiently for his Senate colleague John Kerry to get off the fence and reveal his presidential intentions, the 2004 Democratic standard-bearer is adding high-profile operatives who could easily slide into campaign mode. Kerry has brought on as a consultant Erik Smith, onetime communications strategist for former congressman Dick Gephardt (D-Mo.), and Vince Morris, most recently the spokesman for former D.C. mayor Anthony Williams, as his Senate press secretary.

Kennedy said that he would support Kerry in 2008 if he makes another presidential run but that he can't wait forever for his decision. No clue where Kennedy would turn should Kerry not run -- but his best pal is Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), who has ambitions of his own.The Limits of Power

Sources say that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has told the Democratic committee chairmen who were angered by the six-year term limits imposed upon them last week that she would consider revisiting the issue -- but only if they muster the votes to abolish the rule. This raises the question: What ambitious legislator hoping to rise to chairman before being moved into a nursing home is going to oppose term limits? Among those who are sore after having waited 12 years for their turn at the helm: Appropriations Chairman David Obey (Wis.), Oversight and Government Reform Chairman Henry Waxman (Calif.), and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (Mich.).A Very Safe Landing

It can never be said that Conrad Burns (R-Mont.), whose ties to lobbyists cost him his Senate seat last November, is inconsistent. He'll be joining Gage, a Washington lobbying firm that was founded by his former aide, Leo Giacometto. While most Beltway insiders will recall the more than $150,000 that Burns accepted from now-imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his clients, Burns was also excoriated for the tens of millions of dollars in earmarks he steered to Giacometto's clients, which sparked an audit by the Montana legislature. Now, rather than asking Burns for official earmark favors, Giacometto will get to boss around his old boss. Under Senate rules, Burns, hired as a senior adviser, will have to wait one year before he can directly lobby his former colleagues.Final Note

We heard a number of complaints last week because we used the word "catfight" to describe a disagreement between two distinguished members of Congress -- Pelosi and Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.). To those who civilly articulated reasons why the term is inappropriate, we say: Point taken.

Trade Deficit Drops For Third Consecutive Month (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

DOJ_NMG_0115529

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

American companies sold more goods like airplanes, cars and precious metals overseas in November, helping to narrow the trade deficit for a third consecutive month.

Despite the improvement, the United States is still on track to end 2006 with a record trade imbalance, eclipsing the $716.7 billion deficit in 2005.

The Census Bureau reported yesterday that the trade deficit — the amount by which the value of America's imports of goods and services exceeded the value of its exports — fell to $58.2 billion in November, the smallest it has been since July 2005. In October, the deficit was $58.8 billion.

Yesterday's figures surprised many economists, most of whom expected the deficit to widen. Through November, the cumulative deficit for 2006 was $701.6 billion, well within reach of the previous record.

But some economists expect the trade outlook to improve this year as a weaker dollar combined with a slower domestic economy and stronger growth overseas help narrow the disparity between imports and exports.

"The factors that are causing the improvement are really in the case of exports and the strengths of the economies abroad," said Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with the Bank of America. "Japan continues to grow moderately, and emerging Asia is growing at a good clip, led by China. Then Europe also continues to at least outperform expectations. When you put all of that together, that's a boost to U.S. exports."

In November, exports grew to $124.8 billion, from $123.7 billion in October. The increase was fairly broad-based. Exports of consumer goods like jewelry and sporting goods rose, as did exports of heavy duty goods like parts for commercial aircraft.

At the same time, imports are slowing. American businesses imported $183 billion worth of goods and services in November, up $500 million from October. That brought the three-month moving average for imports down to $184.3 billion, the lowest level since June.

The gap narrowed in November in part because Americans bought fewer goods from China, one of the nation's main trading partners. The net deficit with China fell to $22.9 billion in November, down from $24.4 billion in October. Also, the trade gap shrank because of the third monthly decline in petroleum imports, a factor that economists expect to help improve the trade gap this year if oil prices continue falling.

The Chinese government reported its full-year trade figures yesterday as well, posting a record surplus of $177.5 billion with the world as a whole in 2006. China's exports, and its surplus, continue to grow rapidly; the 2006 surplus was 75 percent greater than 2005's. Imbalanced trade with China has become an issue straining relations with the United States.

Top American officials, including the Treasury secretary, Henry M. Paulson Jr., and the chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben S. Bernanke, traveled to China last month to press for a shift in the country's trade and currency policies. China accounts for a larger portion of the deficit than any other country.

A reason that Washington says that trade with China remains one-sided is the exchange rate. China keeps its currency, the yuan, loosely pegged to the dollar and the euro at a level that many economists say is undervalued, making its exports affordable and imported goods more expensive.

But economists expect Chinese imports to have less appeal in the United States as a slowing housing market damps consumer appetites.

"I imagine as U.S. domestic demand growth slows," said Paul Ashworth, senior United States economist with Capital Economics, "the wider trade deficit with China will probably continue to grow, but probably at a slower pace."

Also yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that inventories at American wholesalers accumulated in November at the fastest pace in three months, a sign that imports could slow further.

Surplus Widens in Canada

OTTAWA, Jan. 10 (Bloomberg News) — Canada's trade surplus widened more than expected in November to the largest since March, as exports of cars and energy products rebounded.

The surplus widened to 4.67 billion Canadian dollars ($3.97 billion), from a revised 3.76 billion Canadian dollars in October, Statistics Canada said. Exports rose 2.8 percent, to 38.1 billion Canadian dollars ($32.4 billion).

Surging Exports Brighten Trade Picture (WSJ)

By Jeff Bater

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

For more than a decade, the rapidly widening trade deficit acted as a drag on U.S. economic growth. But surging exports are reversing that trend, buoying the economy at a critical time and starting to pare back the bloated deficit.

The U.S. deficit in trade in goods and services fell 1% in November to $58.23 billion, the third straight monthly decline and the lowest level in more than a year, the Commerce Department said yesterday. Even so, the overall trade gap for 2006 remained on track to hit an annual record. Underscoring the long-term challenges posed by global trade imbalances, China yesterday said its already-huge trade surplus expanded sharply in 2006.

Economists React: See what some economists are saying1 about the data, and what their outlook is for trade and gross domestic product. · Wholesale Inventories Rise2

In the near term, the U.S. trade picture is brightening. The Commerce Department said imports rose only slightly in November to $183 billion, pushed up by holiday demand for foreign-made consumer goods, such as stereos, toys, and apparel. Meanwhile, American exports rose by $1.1 billion to a record $124.76 billion, thanks to increased shipments abroad of semiconductors, civilian aircraft, telecommunications equipment and other U.S.-made capital goods. Overall, the growth of U.S. exports outpaced that of imports in the month.

The data suggest trade has emerged as an important cushion for the economy, as it adjusts to a sizable contraction in housing activity. Trade has for years been a drag on U.S. growth, as weak economic growth abroad, strong consumption at home and a strong dollar held back the nation's exports and boosted imports.

That trend has begun to shift in the past year, as world growth has stayed strong, U.S. consumers and businesses have pulled back a bit, and the dollar's weakness begins to alter the flow of trade by making U.S. exports cheaper abroad and imported goods more expensive for Americans.

David Greenlaw, an economist at Morgan Stanley, estimated the economy expanded at a 2.8% annual rate in the fourth quarter and that a narrower trade deficit contributed 1.5 percentage points of that. He expects trade to contribute to growth in 2007, which would be the first year that has happened since 1995. "With each month of data, it's more and more suggestive that the tide has turned," he said.

In the past, U.S. companies and workers didn't get the full benefit of buoyant consumer spending, because so much of what consumers bought came from abroad. Conversely, the shrinking trade deficit now suggests the burden of cooling of U.S. demand will be borne in part by foreign suppliers -- lessening the impact on domestic businesses.

"It's a mirror image of prior years," said economist Stephen Stanley of RBS Greenwich Capital.

This year's brighter outlook comes against the backdrop of a dim performance overall in 2006. Through November, the trade gap was on pace to break the annual record of $716.73 billion set in 2005, and much of the weakness is due to imbalanced trade with China. The U.S. reported a $22.92 billion trade deficit with China in November, by far its largest with any country. The November gap pushed the year-to-date deficit with China to $213.55 billion, compared with 2005's full-year record of $201.62 billion, according to the Commerce Department.

The U.S. deficit with China for all of 2006 is expected to hit a record of at least $230 billion, heightening bilateral trade tensions. Last month, a delegation of U.S. officials led by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson visited China to discuss the trade imbalance and other economic issues.

China yesterday reported a record trade surplus of $177.47 billion for 2006, up 74% from $101.88 billion in 2005, according to the official Xinhua news agency. China exported $969.08 billion of goods last year and imported $791.61 billion. (U.S. and Chinese estimates of trade don't match because of different methods of accounting for the ebb and flow of goods between the two countries.)

China's huge trade surplus has become a sore point with businesses and workers in other countries that have been displaced by the Chinese-export juggernaut, particularly in the U.S., China's biggest export market and a source for relatively few of its imports. But increasingly, China's surplus also is causing headaches at home and putting pressure on policy makers to respond.

The surpluses are flooding China's banking system with cash, leading to many undesirable effects: rising inflation, bubbles in stock and property markets, and questionable investments by corporations. Chinese policy makers are trying to find a way to contain those effects without harming the broader economy.

Chinese central-bank Gov. Zhou Xiaochuan, speaking this week in Basel, Switzerland, said China can further increase the flexibility of its exchange rate if trade surpluses continue.

The past two years of massive Chinese surpluses differ markedly from previous years. In the past two decades, China's trade balance typically ranged from about 1% to 3% of the economy. The trade surplus for 2006 is close to 7% of the forecast GDP for the year, up from 4.5% in 2005.

Home Prices Seen Rising In '07 (WSJ)

By Campion Walsh

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

U.S. home sales will decline less sharply this year than they did last year, while home-price appreciation is expected to gain steam, the National Association of Realtors said.

DOJ_NMG_0115531

In its latest forecast, the NAR said sales of existing homes are likely to decline about 1.2% this year to 6.42 million, following a sharp drop last year, while sales of new homes are seen falling about 9.7% to 957,000.

Because the market is starting this year at a relatively low point, even a gradual recovery of sales during the year would mean that annual totals for 2007 are likely to show no substantial improvement, according to NAR Chief Economist David Lereah.

"The good news is that the steady improvement in sales will support price appreciation moving forward," Mr. Lereah says.

The Realtors' group, which is running a $40 million ad campaign designed to encourage consumers to contact their local realtors, expects moderate price increases this year. The group forecasts the median sales price for existing homes to grow 1.5% nationally to $225,300, following last year's estimated 1.1% rise. The national median price for new homes will increase 3% this year to $248,900, according to the NAR, after estimated growth of 0.3% last year.

As builders rein in new projects to support prices, housing starts are expected to drop 16.6% this year to 1.51 million, their lowest level in a decade, the NAR said.

Mortgage Bankers Association chief economist Doug Duncan expects home prices to rise 1% to 2% annually for the next couple of years. But some markets could see price declines of 10% to 20% this year, he says, a shift from the last four to five years, when there were "almost no markets where prices were declining."

Home sales will decline 7% to 8% this year, with most of the decline in the first half, adds Mr. Duncan, who expects the market to bottom out in mid- to late 2007.

Meanwhile, the volume of mortgage applications filed with major U.S. banks rose 16.6% on a seasonally adjusted basis last week, compared with the week before, the MBA reported yesterday.

The number of applications -- for both purchases and refinancings -- increased 12%, compared with the same period a year earlier. Application volumes, on a seasonally adjusted basis, fell about 14% just before the holidays.

Applications for loans to buy homes stood at the highest level in nearly a year, according to the MBA. Applications to refinance rose about 28% from a year ago.

The average rate for a 30-year fixed-rate loan fell to 6.13% from 6.22% the previous week, which was the highest rate seen in eight weeks. The average rate for a 15-year fixed-rate mortgage dropped to 5.85% from 5.93% the previous week. The rate for a one-year adjustable-rate mortgage, or ARM, averaged 5.79%, down from 5.84% the previous week, the MBA's data showed.

Why Economists Are Still Grasping For Cure To Global Poverty (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

With intellectual humility, Mr. Johnson, a professor at Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Sloan School of Management, faced a roomful of peers at the annual meeting of the American Economics Association last weekend and said, "Public health had the germ theory of disease. Economics has made great progress, but it's still waiting for its 'germ theory of disease.'" That probably overstates the challenges remaining to public-health warriors -- avian flu, AIDS/HIV, malaria and all -- but not the shortcomings of economic understanding of what poor countries should do to achieve sustained growth.

The U.S. and Europe pulled ahead of the rest of the world in the 19th century, the result of the Industrial Revolution, the evolution of financial markets and the discovery of new drugs and chemicals. With a few remarkable exceptions -- South Korea, for one -- the gap between rich and poor nations persists. The notion that there was something special about "development economics" dates to post-World War II years when mostly poor, mostly rural colonies gained their independence. Says Anne Krueger, an economist who recently finished a stint as No. 2 at the International Monetary Fund: "It was natural that a major objective of...the 'modernizing elite' was to achieve economies and living standards similar to those in the 'developed,' as they were then called, economies." Poor countries had rice patties or coffee plantations; rich ones had factories. The trick, it was believed, was to hasten the industrialization of poor countries, and government had to lead the way.

The prescriptions didn't work out as well as optimistic postwar poverty fighters hoped. Poor countries have had growth spurts punctuated by crises. Rich countries have crises, too, but they bounce back much more quickly, while poor countries often stagnate for years after a crisis, observes Sebastian Edwards, an economist at the University of California at Los Angeles.

Why is that? Why aren't more poor countries catching up faster?

One view, articulated by Ms. Krueger, is that so-called Third World governments and their First World advisers applied sound economic principles incorrectly or without sufficient attention to the reality. Policies to encourage exports and shield embryonic industries from imports until they got rolling sounded good, for instance, but bred corruption, infantilized industries and created politically powerful vested interests that blocked needed change.

Another view is that poor countries got bad advice and paid the price, but that today's experts know much more than their predecessors. "We don't have recipes, or a checklist," Mr. Edwards says. But, he says, we do know the ingredients: educating workers, accumulating capital and investing it widely, improving productivity. Even he concedes economists are better at dissecting success stories -- China, for one -- and identifying particular reasons for each one's success than generalizing to advise struggling countries what steps to take to boost living standards for the masses.

A third view is that earlier economists focused on the wrong thing. Mr. Johnson, among others, argues that what really matters is having solid political, legal and economic institutions -- courts, central banks, honest bureaucrats, private-property rights -- that allow entrepreneurs to flourish. Imposing what seem to be sound economic policies on corrupt, incompetent or myopic governments is doomed. Building strong institutions is a necessary prerequisite. In this camp, there is a running side argument about which comes first: the institutions or the educated people who create them. Was the Constitution key to U.S. success, or was it Jefferson, Madison and Hamilton?

Technological advances and the spread of markets likely will boost the overall income of the world significantly over the next 25 to 50 years. "But," Mr. Johnson warns, "at least half the world's population will likely not participate fully" -- unless his crowd finds better ways to spread prosperity along with better health to poor countries.

Justices Express Support For Limiting Use Of Union Fees (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to uphold a Washington state law that restricts when unions can use fees collected from non-members for political purposes.

The dispute is being watched closely by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation and other anti-union groups, as well as the AFL-CIO.

The case revolves around the Washington Education Association, which bargains for the state's 70,000 teachers. About 3,500 of the teachers have refused to join the union. They are required by state law to pay "agency shop" fees to cover their share of the union's bargaining on behalf of all workers.

Under state law, the fees unions get from a non-member cannot be used for political advocacy — such as the union's lobbying the state Legislature for more school funds — unless that person consents to having his fees used for such purposes.

The teachers union opposes the policy on non-members' fees, saying it is an administrative burden that restricts the union's right to engage in political advocacy. The state's highest court agreed last year. It struck down the law as a violation of the union's speech rights.

Wednesday, many of the justices' queries focused on the rights of teachers who are not in the union.

Most of the high court, including Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy, David Souter and Samuel Alito, expressed some support for the law limiting how non-member fees are used. "It seems to me that Washington acted quite properly in saying we will use this to protect our workers' First Amendment … rights," Kennedy said.

Washington state Attorney General Robert McKenna said the law "serves the state's interest in election integrity" by ensuring that union political activity is funded voluntarily.

John West, representing the teachers union, countered that the law wrongly assumed that non-members would not back the union's lobbying.

Alito responded, "These are teachers who have chosen not to join the (union). Isn't it overwhelmingly likely that they, if you spoke to them and said, 'Would you like to give money to the union to spend on elections,' would say no?"

West said the union believes teachers support its political efforts, including those aimed at increasing teachers' cost-of-living raises and reducing class sizes.

Court Unlikely To Grant 1st Amendment Rights To Union Political Activity (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court appeared ready Wednesday to reject claims that the First Amendment prohibits Washington state from forcing unions to get permission before spending some of the money they collect on political causes.

Most oral arguments at the high court end ambiguously, with the justices leaving small hints about how they'll resolve tricky legal dilemmas.

But once in a while, there are arguments where the only lingering question seems to be who'll write an opinion that reaches an obvious conclusion.

Wednesday's arguments, in Davenport v. Washington Education Association and Washington v. Washington Education Association, fell into that category.

DOJ_NMG_0115533

At issue is how the state's largest teachers union handles the so-called agency fees it collects from school employees who choose not to be union members.

Those fees, under state law, are paid to cover collective bargaining activity that benefits everyone, whether they're union members or not.

But a 1992 law, adopted by voters, prohibited unions in the state from using that money for political activity without first getting permission from the non-members.

The hourlong session Wednesday turned largely on whose First Amendment rights were at stake. Lawyers for the state - backed by the Bush administration - argued that the most important rights in the case belong to employees, who shouldn't be forced to support causes with which they disagree. The state also says the "opt-in" system best protects those rights.

Lawyers for the union say its rights to lobby are being infringed by the Washington restrictions.

The Supreme Court already has said non-members must be able to "opt out" of paying for political activity; the Washington law went further, saying unions must get them to "opt in" before pursuing political causes with their money.

Both the state attorney general and several teachers sued the Washington Education Association, accusing them of violating the 1992 law. The state's highest court ultimately concluded that the law violated the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, essentially because it placed undue burdens on the unions' political speech.

The court agreed that the "opt-in" requirement would create an administrative nightmare for the union in its effort to collect the fees, and that the "opt-out" requirement was a less burdensome alternative that the state should have chosen.

That reasoning clearly fell flat with Chief Justice John G. Roberts and with justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony Kennedy and Samuel Alito.

Justices John Paul Stevens, David Souter and Ruth Bader Ginsburg also hammered the union's lawyer with questions that reflected serious doubt about his arguments.

Justice Stephen Breyer seemed similarly inclined, but less certain. Justice Clarence Thomas, as is his custom, said nothing during arguments.

The justices' response to the union's arguments was best summed by Kennedy.

"States have considerable discretion in determining how to protect federal constitutional rights," he said at one point. "It seems to me that Washington acted quite properly in saying we will use this mechanism in order to protect our workers' First Amendment constitutional rights."

Later in the arguments, he accused union lawyer John M. West of disregarding employees' rights altogether.

"You want us to consider this case as if the First Amendment rights of non-union members were not involved," he said. "That's been your whole argument."

West responded by saying he recognized the employees' rights, but that the state infringed the union's rights by going too far to protect non-members.

"The non-members have the absolute right to prevent the use of their funds not only for . . . any kind of political ideological speech . . . with which they disagree simply by sending in a letter," West said.

Justices Hear Case On Right Of Unions To Use Nonmembers' Dues (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

First Amendment rights are threatened in the state of Washington, the Supreme Court was told yesterday, but it will be up to the justices to decide who needs protection.

The Washington Education Association, the state's largest teachers union, said its freedoms would be endangered by a state law that would increase restrictions on the union's ability to use workers' money for political causes.

On the other side are workers who do not join the union but under state law must pay dues anyway. They say their money should not be used for the union's election causes without their explicit approval.

The issue could be boiled down to a somewhat straightforward question: Is it enough that nonmembers have the chance to opt out of having a portion of their money spent on political activism, or may states put the onus on the unions, forcing them to get explicit approval from each worker?

The issue is somewhat narrow, but the case has drawn special attention from the politically influential AFL-CIO on one side, and from conservative legal groups and national right-to-work organizations that want to limit the power of unions on the other.

The Washington Supreme Court ruled last year that the state's law requiring the union to get affirmative authorization from nonmembers was unconstitutionally burdensome.

"This has the practical effect of inhibiting one group's political speech (the union and supporting nonmembers) for the improper purpose of increasing the speech of another group (the dissenting nonmembers)," the state court ruled.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy seemed to see it just the opposite way yesterday, saying it appeared to him that Washington had acted properly to protect the rights of nonmembers. He told union attorney John West: "You want us to consider the case as if the First Amendment rights of nonunion members were not involved."

West said that was not true, and that the Supreme Court in the past had found that those workers were properly protected by giving them the right to opt out of having their dues spent for political purposes. Those workers can object "simply by sending in a letter," West said.

"So it's a First Amendment right that is waived by failing to make a timely objection," Justice John Paul Stevens responded.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. and Washington Attorney General Robert McKenna (R), who was defending the state law, seemed to agree that nonmembers have already made a statement about the union's political activities when they decided not to join. "They shouldn't be required to say no twice," McKenna said.

The Bush administration also joined the case in opposition to the union's position.

In practice, only about 5 percent of the teachers and other educational personnel eligible to join the Washington Education Association choose not to become members. The state nevertheless requires them to pay dues, and about 75 percent of that money is spent on collective-bargaining efforts. West said the other share spent on political purposes is used to support or oppose ballot issues rather than being used for candidate campaigns.

The consolidated cases the court heard yesterday are Davenport v. Washington Education Association, 05-1589, and Washington v. Washington Education Association, 05-1657.

Rights Of Unions And Nonmembers Vie At Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 10 — A case argued before the Supreme Court on Wednesday about how labor unions must handle the fees paid by nonmembers could turn out to be little more than a footnote to a long line of decisions about the respective rights of labor unions and dissident employees.

Or the case might turn out to be a good deal more consequential, the first step toward a recalibration by the court of the constitutional balance between the two.

Each of these contrasting outcomes appeared plausible during an argument that had a bit of something for everyone: First Amendment law, labor law, election law and an animated performance by the court's newest justice, Samuel A. Alito Jr.

Justice Alito appeared particularly energized by the case, a defense by the state of Washington of a provision of its campaign law that bars unions from spending nonmembers' fees on political activity without first receiving permission.

This "opt-in" provision of the Washington law, adopted by referendum in 1992 as part of a broad campaign finance measure, goes a step beyond the protection for nonmembers that the Supreme Court has found to be constitutionally required. The court has required unions to permit nonmembers to "opt out" of having their fees used for any purpose that is not "germane" to the union's collective bargaining responsibilities.

Under federal labor law, states may authorize "union shop" provisions under which employees who choose not to join the union must pay fees to support the union's collective bargaining.

The Washington Supreme Court held in this case that requiring the union to receive affirmative permission before spending nonmembers' money on election-related activity imposed an unconstitutional burden on a union's right of free speech and association.

The state teachers' union is defending that judgment, while the state and a group of teachers, represented by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, challenged it in separate appeals. The justices consolidated the cases, Davenport v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1589, and Washington v. Washington Education Association, No. 05-1657, for a single argument.

The Bush administration entered the case on the state's side. Solicitor General Paul D. Clement said the Washington Supreme Court had "rigidly constitutionalized an area of labor law" that should be left to the "substantial discretion" of the states and the federal government.

Mr. Clement said that just because "as a minimum constitutional matter, the workers have to have an opt-out right" did not mean that a state could not go further and provide that the union could not spend nonmembers' money on politics unless those workers affirmatively agreed.

That argument seemed to appeal to Justice Alito. "Why should the First Amendment permit anything other than an opt-in scheme?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0115535

That was a "fair question," the solicitor general replied, while at the same time carefully avoiding a full embrace of Justice Alito's suggestion. The opt-in right should be an option but was not constitutionally required, he said.

Later in the argument, addressing the union's lawyer, John M. West, Justice Alito suggested that it seemed only common sense to presume that employees who had chosen not to join the union were likely not to support the union's political activities.

The presumption built into the court's precedents is that nonmembers do support the union's outside activities unless they declare otherwise. "Dissent is not to be presumed" is the phrase the precedents use. So it would be a substantial change in labor law if the presumption were reversed.

"Isn't it overwhelmingly likely," Justice Alito asked Mr. West, that if nonmembers were asked whether they wanted to "give money to the union to spend on elections, they would say no?"

Mr. West said he "absolutely" disagreed, explaining that the union used its political money to campaign for higher taxes to support local school districts and other purposes "that it has every reason to believe is in the interest of the vast majority of teachers."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. sounded unpersuaded. "Well, surely," he said, "you don't get to say, well, this is in your interest, whether you want to spend the money or not."

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy was also critical of the union's position. "You want us to consider this case as if the First Amendment rights of non-union members were not involved," he told Mr. West on two occasions.

Washington is the only state with a campaign finance law that singles out labor unions for special treatment. Mr. West's basic argument was that the law violated the First Amendment by discriminating against speech based on its content. The union is permitted to engage in legislative lobbying, for example, without first getting the nonmembers' permission to use their money, but is barred from campaigning for or against ballot measures.

About 5 percent of Washington's 80,000 teachers have declined to join the union.

Ballot Firm Hits House Democrats (RC)

By Matthew Murray

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

The Nebraska-based electronic voting machine manufacturer at the center of the still-contested Congressional race in Florida's 13th district demanded Tuesday that a court throw out what the company characterized as a threatening letter from House Democrats.

Lawyers for Election Systems & Software filed the motion with Florida appellate Judge Jon Wheeler in response to a letter that House Administration Chairwoman Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Calif.) sent the court last week.

Millender-McDonald wrote that Christine Jennings, the Democratic candidate in the Nov. 7 race to replace former Rep. Katherine Harris (R), has preserved her right to contest the election before Millender-McDonald's committee. So the court, she said, has an obligation to consider all the facts of the case, an apparent reference to a Dec. 29 lower court ruling not to require Election Systems & Software to disclose how its electronic voting machines work.

The machine's "source code," Jennings contends, may reveal why 18,000 individuals in Sarasota County did not cast votes in the Congressional race on Nov. 7. The company contends that such information is proprietary and that releasing it could damage the company financially.

But in court papers, the company claims that the chairwoman is an unrelated party to the case and "has no standing to participate in the review of the trial court's order." Even more, it states, Millender-McDonald's action is little more than a political ploy and an abuse by one branch of government against another.

"The response is a thinly veiled attempt by one member of Congress to intimidate this court and unduly influence its deliberations in order to give [Christine Jennings], a member of Millender-McDonald's political party, an unwarranted advantage in this election contest," wrote Harry Thomas and Jeffrey Frehn, lawyers for Election Systems & Software.

The motion closed: "The fairness of this election will be assured by the due process of law, not by tactics or threats that are intended to interfere with the independence of the judiciary."

Romney Says He Was Wrong On 1994 Issues (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 11, 2007

A 1994 videotape mysteriously posted on YouTube.com prompted Republican Mitt Romney to declare Wednesday, "I was wrong on some issues back then," while also insisting to social conservatives key to his presidential campaign that he is one of them.

DOJ_NMG_0115536

The tape of a Senate debate between Romney and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy showed Romney defending a woman's right to abortion, saying he supported allowing gays in the Boy Scouts and distancing himself from former President Reagan by noting he was a registered independent during the period the conservative icon was leading the nation.

All of the material has been previously published, but its presentation in video form — and on the easily shared YouTube medium — prompted an immediate response from Romney, who formed a presidential exploratory committee last week.

"If you want to know where I stand by the way, you don't just have to listen to my words, you can go to look at my record as governor," Romney said during a late-day appearance on the "Glenn and Helen Show," a radio program featuring Tennessee psychologist Helen Smith and her husband, Glenn Reynolds.

"Frankly, in the bluest of states, facing the most liberal media in the country, I've led the fight to preserve traditional marriage. I've taken every legal step I could conceive of, to prevent same-sex marriage."

A tape of Romney's call was immediately posted on YouTube. Asked whom the campaign suspected of posting the tape, Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said: "It doesn't matter. We used the very same mediums made available to those seeking to attack Governor Romney to set the record straight in his own words with the facts."

In the 1994 tape, Romney is asked about abortion rights and responds: "One of the great things about our nation is we're each entitled to have strong personal beliefs — and we encourage other people to do the same. ... I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country."

Kennedy retorted that while he was "pro-choice," Romney was "multiple choice."

At another point, Romney was asked if he ever publicly opposed the Boy Scouts' exclusion of gay members while he served on its executive board.

"I feel that all people should be allowed to participate in the Boy Scouts regardless of their sexual orientation," Romney replied.

On a third point, Kennedy accused Romney of harboring the same economic philosophy as Reagan and former President George H.W. Bush.

Romney replied: "I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush; I'm not trying to return to Reagan-Bush. My positions don't talk about the things you suggest they talk about; this isn't a political issue."

In recent speeches, however, Romney has wrapped himself in Reagan's mantle.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way," Romney told conservative activists last weekend.

Jim Gilmore For President? It's Not An Easy Sell (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

Article II of the Constitution says that the President of the United States must be a "natural born Citizen" who is at least 35 years old. So far, so good for former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore (R), who announced this week that he is forming an exploratory committee for a possible 2008 presidential campaign.

Having watched former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean run a stunningly effective early campaign in his bid to win the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004, I am trying to remain open-minded early on when considering long-shot candidates for president.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.)? Sure, he's a 10-year Senate veteran who might be able to take advantage of a vacuum on the right in the GOP race. Democratic Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.)? They've been Senators for 26 and 36 years, respectively, so they have earned the right to be treated seriously as Democratic contenders.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R), outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D)? They are or were reasonably popular two-term governors, which means they aren't stuck on Capitol Hill and can run as successful chief executives. Give them a chance to see what they can do.

But Gilmore? I don't think he fits in the same category. Still, let's look at his pluses and minuses before jumping to a conclusion.

Gilmore, 57, holds undergraduate and law degrees from the University of Virginia. He was elected Commonwealth's Attorney in Henrico County — suburban Richmond — in 1987. Six years later he was elected Virginia Attorney General, serving one term in that office before winning the governorship in 1997. He left four years later having successfully divided the state GOP into warring factions during a budget crisis that he helped create — and alienated enough voters that Democrat Mark Warner was elected to succeed him.

Gilmore then served briefly — from January 2001 to January 2002 — as Republican National Committee chairman. Gilmore widely was assumed to have been installed at the RNC because Bush political strategist Karl Rove assumed that the former governor would be little more than a figurehead, while Rove really ran the committee. But Gilmore didn't see things that way. As a former governor, he was accustomed to making decisions and having others defer to him. When Rove realized that he and Gilmore had different views of how the committee should be run, the former governor had to go. "It was a disaster from the start," says one GOP insider familiar with the situation.

Gilmore chairs a commission created by Congress called the Congressional Advisory Panel to Assess Domestic Response Capabilities for Terrorism Involving Weapons of Mass Destruction. He also formed a nonprofit, the National Council on Readiness and Preparedness.

Shortly before Christmas, Gilmore indicated his interest in a 2008 run. He told The Associated Press, "There is not a committed conservative in the field who can put together a national campaign. I am and I can. I have people on the ground right now in Iowa and South Carolina." Veteran Virginia political operative Boyd Marcus and New York political strategist Kieran Mahoney are involved in Gilmore's early planning.

Gilmore's tax-cutting record would be a plus for Republican caucus and primary voters, and the opening on the right in the battle for the GOP nomination could be a lure: The two early Republican favorites, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, aren't exactly movement conservatives.

But caucuses and primaries aren't only about ideology. They also are about candidates, organization and money.

Maybe time has distorted my memory, but I don't remember him as being a dynamic, inspiring conservative speaker. Others I have spoken with remember him much as I do.

Sympathetic Republicans, however, say Gilmore is "very disciplined" and "plain-spoken," and one media professional recently argued that Gilmore has been "terrific" as a "junkyard dog" on TV. That, combined with his ability to play to a partisan crowd, would be a strong asset for Gilmore.

Gilmore never has demonstrated the fundraising muscle that McCain or Romney have, and he also is far, far behind those rivals in lining up activists in the key early states. And there are other obstacles: Despite his service on the weapons of mass destruction commission, Gilmore, like most governors, has no direct foreign policy experience. And few outside of Virginia have ever heard of him.

In other words, Jim Gilmore begins with no name identification, no money and no organization. And that army of vaunted Virginia GOP operatives that once was mentioned as an asset for former Sen. George Allen (R-Va.)? Well, they don't look quite so intimidating now.

Gilmore's chance of winning the GOP nomination would be based on a single scenario: Romney doesn't sell to conservatives, while McCain, for one reason or another, doesn't make it to Minneapolis, Minn. Under those circumstances, lightning could strike anyone who is (or was) a candidate, even Jim Gilmore.

I find it awfully difficult to take seriously a presidential wannabe who left office having divided his own party and alienated voters, and who begins with no major assets except his alleged strategic positioning on the right. Jim Gilmore surely has a better chance of becoming a nominee than Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), but that doesn't make him a major player for '08 in my book.

Democrats' Litmus: Electability (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

WASHINGTON -- For a party long known for subjecting presidential wannabes to a battery of litmus tests, on issues from abortion to trade, Democrats are uniting in raising one big issue for 2008: electability.

Who can win? That question is paramount for many activists, donors and voters, desperate to reclaim the White House. And it's one that poses a big hurdle for both Democratic front-runners, Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Widespread concerns about whether either could get elected -- Mrs. Clinton because she is a woman, and a polarizing figure; Mr. Obama for being African-American, and relatively inexperienced -- potentially prevent either from running away with the Democratic nomination. That, in turn, is what keeps hope alive for about a half-dozen rivals maneuvering for advantage should the leaders stumble. Of that pack, polls and early organization suggest the best-positioned is former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice-presidential nominee. Today Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut officially joins the race with his announcement on the syndicated radio show "Imus in the Morning."

The three Republican front-runners -- Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani -- have the opposite problem of their Democratic counterparts. Each of them is considered electable. The question is whether they can get nominated in a party in which the conservative base demands that the nominee oppose abortion, same-sex marriage and taxes, but believes that each of these men is suspect.

For their part, Democratic activists and voters alike have become more pragmatic than any time in decades, which many in the party attribute to the chastening effect of recent years out of power in Washington and many statehouses. As for the liberals who make up Democrats' base, for all their passion about jobs and global trade, health care, the environment, abortion and gay rights and especially the war, these days the left cares "big time" about whether a candidate can get elected, says Robert Borosage, co-director of the union-supported advocacy group Campaign for America's Future.

Likewise, feminist leader Kate Michelman says that in her travels, "I hear people talking about 'electability' all the time, and Democrats are going to continue talking about it." Even among audiences eager to see a female president, she says, skeptics ask, "Do you think the country is really ready for a woman?" Ms. Michelman is supporting former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards -- not, she says, because she considers the front-runners unelectable but because Mr. Edwards is the best candidate for women's issues, and electable.

Last year's midterm elections, which gave Democrats a majority in Congress for the first time in 12 years, offered a preview of their party's pragmatic bent. Primary voters chose a number of moderate-to-conservative Democrats over liberal stalwarts for the party's nominations, to increase the chances of winning Republican-held suburban and Western seats.

"Primary voters vote with their heads, not their hearts," says Democratic consultant Stephanie Cutter, an adviser to John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. She and some other strategists cite that year for early evidence of Democrats' emphasis on electability, when Mr. Kerry won the nomination over Howard Dean, then the darling of antiwar liberals. "They dated Dean but married Kerry because he was the best positioned to beat President Bush with his military record and proven experience," Ms. Cutter says.

Yet Mr. Kerry wasn't elected. And that has other Democrats, in particular Clinton and Obama advocates, warning against taking the electability test too far. Neither Mrs. Clinton nor Mr. Obama has announced for president, though both are expected to create exploratory committees this month.

"I think both are electable," says Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who has ties to both -- as Mr. Obama's friend and fellow Chicagoan, and as a former top adviser to Mrs. Clinton's husband. "Bill Clinton had an electability problem until the primaries were over" in 1992, Mr. Emanuel recalls, but his strong performance in the primary campaign overrode controversies about his political stands, avoidance of the Vietnam draft and alleged philandering.

Much like her husband 15 years ago, Mrs. Clinton is often seen as too cautious and calculating, leaving many questioning what she stands for. Unlike him, she lacks a compensating charisma. Despite bipartisan praise for her Senate record on issues from education to national security, even admirers lament that she would draw Republican attacks like no other Democrat given conservative activists' loathing for both Clintons. Then there is the fact Americans have never elected a woman -- complicated in Mrs. Clinton's case by her spouse being a former president, suggesting a co-presidency of sorts.

"Anybody who has questions about her electability should look at what she's done in New York," says spokesman Howard Wolfson. He notes that she defied skeptics in 2000 by winning election to the Senate with 55% of the vote, and last year was re-elected in a landslide thanks to greater support from independents and Republicans.

Mr. Obama exudes the charisma, authenticity and optimism that many Democrats find lacking in Mrs. Clinton. Yet while he was raised in Hawaii by his white mother and grandparents from Kansas, his public identity is defined by the African skin and Muslim name inherited from his late father, Barack Hussein Obama, of Kenya. Inevitably Democrats ask: Would Americans elect an African-American, and one whose name rhymes with the terrorist they most revile?

Skeptics also cite the 45-year-old Mr. Obama's inexperience after just two years in the Senate. Days after his return last week from a holiday visit to hometown Honolulu, Hawaii's longtime Democratic Sen. Daniel Inouye was quoted in the city's paper saying Mr. Obama should wait: "He has been in the Senate for, what, two years?"

For eight years previously, Mr. Obama was an Illinois state senator. As a youth, he lived for a time in Indonesia, was the first African-American president of the Harvard Law Review, then a community organizer in Chicago and a constitutional law professor. "People measure experience in different ways," says adviser David Axelrod. "I think we're all an amalgam of all our experiences. And his are extremely varied and rich."

That is chronicled in Mr. Obama's best-selling memoir of struggling with his mixed-race, multicultural background, "Dreams from My Father." Written in 1995 before his political career, the book includes what would be another first for a presidential candidate: Mr. Obama's acknowledged use of "blow" -- cocaine -- as a young man. Strategists in both parties suggest the admission wouldn't be fatal. "I think Americans are at a moment when candor counts for more than the original sin," Democratic pollster Geoff Garin says.

DOJ_NMG_0115539

For all the scrutiny of the front-runners, other aspirants face electability questions as well should they attract more attention. Steve Elmendorf, a veteran of several Democratic campaigns, says such judgments are premature a year before the first primary. By then, he says, performances on the stump and in debates will give voters a better sense of each candidate.

And ultimately, Mr. Elmendorf notes, "how electable you are depends on who you are running against."

Dodd To Enter 2008 Presidential Race (AP)

By Beth Fouhy And Holly Ramer

AP, January 11, 2007

Democratic Sen. Christopher Dodd, a veteran lawmaker who entered Congress in the post-Watergate class of 1974, will announce his bid for the presidency, Democratic officials said Wednesday.

Dodd, 62, will make the formal announcement in an interview Thursday morning on the "Imus in the Morning" radio show — a curious bit of timing since he'll be forced to compete with heavy coverage of President Bush's speech on the Iraq war.

Dodd will travel late Thursday to Iowa, which will host the first presidential nominating caucus next January. He heads to South Carolina, an early primary state, on Sunday.

Kathy Sullivan, the chairwoman of the Democratic Party in New Hampshire, said in an interview that she had spoken to Dodd and he said, "'I'm not going to do the exploratory thing, I'm going to plunge right in.'"

The 26-year Senate veteran enters a growing Democratic field overshadowed by two likely candidates — Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack has already announced his candidacy, as have former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

Throughout his decades-long career in Washington, the Connecticut senator has forged strong ties with labor unions, championed fiscal accountability for corporations and championed education and other children's issues. This month, he became chairman of the influential Senate Banking Committee and is a senior member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Sullivan said Dodd had other attributes that would make him appealing to voters.

"People really like him. He's very smart. He's also very articulate. And I think he might have the sharpest wit of anyone in the field," Sullivan said.

Dodd voted in 2002 to authorize military intervention in Iraq, but has become an outspoken critic of the war and now calls his vote a mistake. He has said he would oppose an escalation of U.S. forces in Iraq and has said Congress should consider withholding funding for such a troop increase.

Dodd has been politically active on behalf of other Democrats, raising money and campaigning for candidates across the country and chaired the Democratic National Committee from 1995-96.

In 1974, he was elected to the House at the age of 30, part of a Democratic tide after the Watergate scandal and President Nixon's resignation. His father, Thomas Dodd, served as a senator for two terms.

Dodd and his wife, Jackie Marie Clegg, have two daughters, ages 5 and 22 months.

Senator Dodd May Be Joining Democratic Race For President (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

HARTFORD, Jan 10 — Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, is to announce on Thursday morning that he is running for president, some of his friends say.

He plans to outline his intentions on Don Imus's nationally syndicated radio and cable television shows, followed by a series of media interviews, they say.

Mr. Dodd was set to file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission this week establishing a campaign committee, his friends said, which would allow him to raise money to compete in what is expected to be a crowded primary field.

Beneva Schulte, a spokeswoman for Mr. Dodd, would not comment on his plans Wednesday evening.

Coverage of Mr. Dodd's announcement would be competing with that of President Bush's Wednesday night speech on Iraq.

Mr. Dodd, although well-known in Washington and his home state, does not have the kind of national name recognition of some other Democrats who are strongly considering entering the race, most prominently Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina and vice-presidential nominee, has spent the last two years building support for his bid and is widely viewed as a strong candidate. And Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa have announced their candidacies. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's candidate in 2004, is also considering joining the race.

Mr. Dodd, 62, who is serving his fifth term in the Senate, is chairman of the Banking Committee and has spent much of the past several months shoring up support in states with early primaries, like New Hampshire, Iowa and South Carolina. From 1995 to 1997, he served as the general chairman of the Democratic party, which could prove helpful in fund-raising.

Some of the most recent presidential polls have left Mr. Dodd off the list, but his supporters say that his experience in the Senate could be a boost and that his personality would be an asset.

Mr. Dodd, who is also a senior member of the Senate Foreign Relations committee, has become a vocal critic of the war in Iraq, saying that his vote to authorize military action in 2002 was a mistake.

He was one of the leading opponents of the appointment of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations.

Hillary's Status As Front-runner Slipping In Key States (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's popularity in Democratic presidential-preference polls has fallen in the nation's first caucus and primary states in the face of increasing support for her chief rivals for the 2008 nomination.

Pollsters said her weaknesses in Iowa and New Hampshire were the result of the growing popularity of two major opponents -- former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama -- and their populist economic messages, as well as a deepening antipathy toward her among Democratic-leaning independents who dislike her support for the war in Iraq and who question her electability.

"I think Hillary strikes these voters the same way Senator John Kerry did in 2004. They would really like to vote for someone they really like this time. Hillary doesn't fit that characterization right now," said pollster Del Ali of Research 2000, who conducted polls in both Iowa and New Hampshire.

His findings mirror more recent polling showing a similar national decline in support. "There's been erosion," said pollster John Zogby. "She's polling in the low- to mid-40s nationally."

The New York Democrat, who has been her party's clear front-runner, came in a distant fourth in an Iowa presidential poll of 600 likely voters conducted Dec. 18 to 20, drawing 10 percent in a crowded field of contenders. Mr. Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice-presidential nominee, and Mr. Obama were tied in first place with 22 percent each, followed by outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack with 12 percent.

In New Hampshire, whose first-in-the-nation primary follows the Iowa caucuses, polls showed Mrs. Clinton in a dead heat with Mr. Obama, who was greeted like a rock star in a whirlwind of standing-room-only appearances across the state last month and has since seen his political support skyrocket nationally.

Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama drew 22 percent and 21 percent respectively late last month, while Mr. Edwards took third place with 16 percent. One month before, Mr. Obama was trailing Mrs. Clinton by 23 points.

Mr. Ali, who interviewed 600 likely voters in New Hampshire, said its electorate was made up of "a lot of independents. These are the same people who loathe [President] Bush, loathe the Iraq war. But deep down, they don't like Hillary Clinton," he told the Concord Monitor.

In a telephone interview with The Washington Times, he said, "Her chief rivals are very much against the Iraq war and prefer that we begin withdrawal. I don't think they trust her, to be honest with you.

"Part of the reason is that among the candidates, she seems the most supportive of the war in Iraq and appears less critical of President Bush than the other candidates," he said.

Mrs. Clinton, who is reportedly planning to announce her 2008 candidacy sometime this month, has yet to campaign in New Hampshire. Democrats in the state say they expect her approval numbers to improve once she begins active campaigning.

"You cannot underestimate Senator Clinton. She has a unique attribute no one else has. She is extremely well-known, has a very good war chest, the ability to raise a lot of money and has a great spouse, Bill Clinton, who will be supporting her," said Jim Demers, a veteran party strategist in the state.

However, Mr. Demers, who intends to support Mr. Obama if he decides to run, said most of the party's activists were "uncommitted and waiting for Senator Clinton to come in before they start making up their minds."

2008 Destination Unknown (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

DENVER -- There's a reason Denver hasn't hosted the Democratic National Convention in almost 100 years: It's just not a union-friendly town.

DOJ_NMG_0115541

That much became evident after the Democratic National Committee (DNC) again postponed its decision on whether Denver or New York will be the venue for its 2008 convention, thanks to a recent labor uprising in the Mile High City.

With all the labor trouble in Denver, Democrats might be tempted to scrap the whole idea and head for New York, but there's trouble in the Big Apple, too. Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg hinted that he doesn't want to host the event, saying that the city was tapped out after hosting the Republican National Convention in 2004.

"The city can't go on the hook for a convention unless they're reasonably sure they can raise the money," he told the Associated Press.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean now says the announcement will be made by the end of January, but nobody's holding his breath. The committee already has missed deadlines calling for a decision in early December, then mid-December, then early January.

It could be worse. A DNC spokesman yesterday rebutted a report on MSNBC that said a decision would be announced in February.

The delay puts Democrats months behind Republicans, who announced in September that their convention would be held in Minneapolis-St. Paul and have even sent out press kits.

It looked as if Denver had clinched the convention bid last fall, when the host committee finally persuaded a local hotel to sign a union agreement. Until then, Denver had no union hotels, a deal-breaker for the Democrats, who count organized labor as a key component of their political coalition.

Enter Jim Taylor, president of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees Local No. 7, who threatened to strike during the convention unless organizers pulled out of the Pepsi Center, the proposed site for most of the convention meetings.

Mr. Taylor says the Pepsi Center is "anti-union," noting that it doesn't contract with organized labor. The Pepsi Center, home to both the Colorado Avalanche hockey team and Denver Nuggets basketball team, is owned by Stan Kroenke, who's married to Wal-Mart heiress Anne Walton.

Although Democrats may be willing to overlook the irony of holding their convention at a facility owned by the Wal-Mart family, widely regarded as the chief scourge of the modern labor movement, it appears that Mr. Taylor isn't.

John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, reportedly has entered the negotiations in hopes of persuading Mr. Taylor to sign a no-strike agreement.

Mr. Taylor has proposed holding the convention a few blocks away at the unionized Colorado Convention Center, but tourism officials say the center is too small for the Democrats' needs. The DNC specifically requested a basketball arena as its main facility.

Raising the money won't be a problem in Denver, say organizers, who are eager to host the city's first national party convention since 1908.

"As much as New York may not want the convention is as much we do want it," said Irene Kamsler, a member of the Denver host committee. "They'll all be welcome here with open arms."

Think Big, Plan Ahead (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 11, 2007

Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.) continues to give serious consideration to running for governor in 2010, as well as for the Senate, should Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) choose not to seek a fourth term.

In preparation for a statewide run, Sanchez — who has had a gubernatorial campaign account open for several months — plans to spend the next few years traveling up and down California to meet with constituent groups. Given the hefty fundraising requirements of running statewide in California, Sanchez anticipates her decision would come no later than November 2009.

In a recent interview, Sanchez said she is “absolutely serious” about running for governor in 2010, when Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) will be termed out of office and the seat will open.

“I wouldn’t discount that, or the Senate seat, if it should open up,” Sanchez said.

The Congresswoman conceded that Speaker Nancy Pelosi’s (D-Calif.) decision to keep the House in session five days a week will crimp her in-state travel plans somewhat, particularly considering her need to pay close attention to her Orange County district, which preferred President Bush over Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), 50 percent to 49 percent in 2004.

But she is optimistic her increased Congressional workload, which includes responsibilities as the No. 2 Democrat on the Homeland Security Committee, will not derail her from laying the groundwork for a statewide run. Sanchez said polling has consistently shown her with the name identification and favorability ratings necessary to launch a campaign in vast, multiple-media market California.

"We've been looking for a long time at the statewide level," Sanchez said. "Polls usually show us to be pretty high in most parts of the state."

Sanchez's gubernatorial campaign account, People for Loretta 2010, had only $1,904 on hand as of the last reporting period ending June 30, after contributions of $27,105 and $43,734 in expenditures. But California law allows any federal campaign funds she raises between now and a prospective gubernatorial run to be transferred into her state account.

Because California's fundraising limits for gubernatorial candidates are $24,100 per primary campaign and $24,100 per general election campaign — for both individual contributors and political action committees — Sanchez would not have to worry about any contribution conflicts if and when she transfers money from her federal account to her state account.

In her post-Nov. 7, 2006, Federal Election Commission report, Sanchez reported banking nearly $650,000 in her Congressional campaign account, after spending $1.86 million on her 24-point victory over stockbroker Tan Nguyen (R).

Some California Democrats have serious questions regarding Sanchez's ability to win a major statewide contest. To get the backing of major party figures — both donors and political operatives — for either a Senate or gubernatorial run, she would have to do some convincing.

But Sanchez also is seen as having some of the innate qualities that breed success, particularly the fact that she is both a woman and a Latina. Roger Salazar, a Democratic operative based in Sacramento, said women tend to do well when they run statewide, in part because not many of them do.

In last year's race for secretary of state, then- state Sen. Debra Bowen (D) beat Bruce McPherson, the moderate Republican incumbent who had been appointed to the position by Schwarzenegger, despite the fact that the governor won his re-election handily over then-state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D). Salazar said Bowen's victory was aided by the fact that she is a woman, which is good news for Sanchez.

"She's done a fantastic job as a Congresswoman. But whether that translates, I don't know," Salazar said. "One luxury we have as Democrats in California is a plethora of talent."

The Republican bench for gubernatorial and Senate candidates in the Golden State is not seen as very deep.

Steve Poizner, a wealthy moderate Republican who won his race for insurance commissioner over then-Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante (D) — he was the only Republican to win a statewide contest in California last cycle other than Schwarzenegger — has to be seen as an early favorite to run for governor.

On the Democratic side, other than Sanchez, potential candidates for governor include Bowen, state Treasurer and former state Attorney General Bill Lockyer, and Attorney General Jerry Brown, who previously occupied the governor's office from 1975 to 1983 and served as mayor of Oakland for the past eight years.

Meanwhile, in the 2010 Senate contest, Schwarzenegger himself is the only Republican being speculated about to run for Boxer's seat regardless of what she does — although most California Republicans believe it is unlikely that he will seek a job in which he would have to share the political stage with 99 other lawmakers.

In addition to being seen as potential gubernatorial candidates, Bowen, Lockyer and Brown could also run for Senate in 2010, although Boxer, who will be 69 that year, could well seek another term. Brown, a three-time presidential contender, unsuccessfully ran for a Senate seat in 1982.

As Johnson Mends, Dakota GOPers Focus On Ending 20-year Drought (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 11, 2007

There's a saying in North and South Dakota politics: The voters send Republicans to the state capitol to be conservative with their money, and they send Democrats to Washington to bring back other people's money.

Whatever their motivations, Dakota voters have indeed split their elections along those lines for many years.

The illness of Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) could open things up again in 2008 for Dakota Republicans, who have long struggled for a breakthrough in their congressional representation. If recent history is any indication, however, it will be hard-fought and expensive to make a dent in Democrats' stranglehold on the Washington delegations.

Democrats have held at least five of the states' six congressional seats for the last 20 years.

"It's a phenomenon that has been going on for years and years and years," said Max Wetz, executive director of the South Dakota Republican Party. "It seems to confound a lot of people."

Republican former state Sen. Larry Diedrich knows what it is like to be on the short end of that tradition. He lost twice in 2004 to Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), first by 3,000 votes in a special election and then in the general.

DOJ_NMG_0115543

"I've always thought that perhaps people see the money that they have in the state as more their own money," Diedrich said. "Whereas, when you look at the federal level — maybe part of it's the fact that we're typically a recipient state — I think people perceive that that issue is more of other people's money. It's always a little more difficult for Republicans with a conservative message to win that argument."

Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) was able to convince voters of his ability to bring home the bacon in his razor-thin, multimillion-dollar victory over then-Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) in 2004, said Steve Hildebrand, who managed Daschle's campaign and Johnson's narrow win over Thune two years earlier.

Analysts are largely undecided about how true the adage is, but Hildebrand said there is "some credence to it."

State-level Republicans in South Dakota have been very successful at attaching all Democrats to the efforts of some to enact an income tax, but on the federal level it's a different frame of reference, he said.

"They believe Democrats are most successful at getting pork back to the states," Hildebrand said. "So they want Democrats in Washington fighting for their pet projects, whether it's disaster relief, farm aid, Medicaid."

Thune was also able to tie Daschle to the Democratic Party that Daschle led in the Senate — a strategy that's been tough to replicate, despite the states' overwhelmingly conservative politics.

His win gave Dakota Republicans their lone standard-bearer in Washington. While Republicans dominate both state legislatures, both governorships and presidential politics, Democrats have occupied at least five of the six congressional seats in the Dakotas since 1987.

The last time the Dakotas voted for a Democrat for president was 1964, when both states voted for Lyndon Johnson. Both gave President Bush at least 60 percent in each of the last two elections.

North Dakota has had an all-Democratic congressional delegation since 1987 and has had a Democrat represent it in the House since 1981. South Dakota last had two Republicans in its delegation in the mid-1980s. Before that, both Washington contingents were dominated by Republicans.

Republicans could have an opportunity to win back three of those seats in 2008 if Johnson is unable to run for reelection.

Herseth is widely considered the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination to replace him, and her candidacy would also create an opening in the state's at-large House seat. North Dakota Republicans are also moving to give Democratic Rep. Earl Pomeroy his first difficult race since 2002 for that state's at-large House seat.

The future of Johnson's seat is in a holding pattern as he recuperates from a brain hemorrhage in December. He was upgraded to "fair" condition this week. State Republicans are moving forward as before in seeking candidates to run for those seats, whatever situation might ultimately arise, Wetz said.

Gov. Mike Rounds (R-S.D.) was reelected in November with 62 percent of the vote and is considered the top contender for the Senate seat. Other possibilities for federal office include attorney Jim Seward and Barb Everist, a former state Senate majority leader.

Herseth was just reelected with 69 percent of the vote, and unless she leaves the seat — she is also mentioned as a possible gubernatorial candidate when Rounds is term-limited in 2010 — that seat will likely prove difficult for Republicans.

Pomeroy breezed to reelection with 66 percent of the vote. But despite a longer tenure, he appears less ensconced than Herseth. He endured several difficult reelection bids in the 1990s and won by four points in 2002.

As in 2002, Pomeroy won't have North Dakota's veteran Democratic Sens. Kent Conrad or Byron Dorgan at the top of the ticket, and a Pomeroy challenger could be bolstered by the presidential race.

Nick Bauroth, a political science professor at North Dakota State University, said the inability to beat the well-liked and scandal-free senators is easier to understand than the fact the Republicans haven't been able to assemble strong challenges to Pomeroy in the last two elections.

"When you have more of a quality challenger, Pomeroy is actually pretty vulnerable," Bauroth said.

Pomeroy will also, for the first time since his first term, be in the majority party, and Republicans say efforts to tie him to national Democrats could prove more fruitful. They are already issuing press releases tying Pomeroy to the actions of the new Democratic majority.

Pomeroy spokeswoman Sandra Salstrom said voters have recognized Pomeroy's effectiveness in eight straight elections: "Through his hard work and influential committee assignments, he will continue to deliver for our state."

Possible challengers include: Attorney General Wayne Stenehjem, Public Service Commissioner Tony Clark, Tax Commissioner Cory Fong, Secretary of State Al Jaeger, and Doug Goehring, who fell to the incumbent Democratic agriculture commissioner. Pomeroy's 2006 challenger, 38-year-old Matt Mechtel, is also considered to have a bright future.

State Republican Party Chairman Ken Karls said efforts to take out Pomeroy have proven frustrating and that convincing the national party to help out in 2008 will be vital to finally cracking back into the state's congressional delegation.

"North Dakota is suffering because we do not have a Republican in Washington representing us," Karls said. "We have to get at least one Republican into Washington. It behooves us to do that as soon as possible."

How Secular Donors Move Church Agenda (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 11, 2007

The National Council of Churches is becoming financially beholden to secular groups with liberal political leanings, according to a report by a religious watchdog organization.

The Institute on Religion and Democracy, a group formed by members of the NCC, says the group accepted the majority of its charitable donations last year from nonreligious organizations and has been pursuing an agenda that does not mesh with the majority of its church members, including support for abortion and homosexual "marriage."

"We found numerous common themes among the dozens of nonchurch entities from which the church council has recently sought or received funding," said John Lomperis, a research associate with IRD who co-wrote the group's report on the NCC.

"These groups have very little demonstrated interest in religion beyond recruiting faith communities to support their favored social and political causes."

Politically affiliated groups who donated to the NCC between 2004 and 2005 include the Sierra Club; the Ford Foundation, which advocated for "reproductive rights"; the United Nations Foundation, which is funded by billionaire media mogul and philanthropist Ted Turner; and the Connect US Network, which has ties to George Soros' Open Society Institute, Mr. Lomperis said.

Mr. Lomperis says the NCC also applied for a $100,000 grant from MoveOn.org, a liberal political-advocacy group that worked to defeat President Bush in the 2004 election, but has not yet received any grant money from the organization.

IRD Vice President Alan F.H. Wisdom says the problem lies not with the NCC accepting such money, but that the groups who are donating it do not reflect the views of the member churches.

"The religious left simply does not have 45 million people in the pews on any given Sunday," he said. "We're very clear that it's not wrong for Christian groups to accept money from foundations and non-Christian organizations."

The NCC was formed in 1950 with its stated goal being to serve as a bridge between Christian faiths and communities. The group claims to represent 45 million American believers through its member churches, which includes 35 Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox, black and historic Christian denominations.

NCC staff member Lindsey Thune showed up at the IRD press conference yesterday to contest some of the group's claims and to question their own fundraising records.

"Not all of us on staff support abortion or gay marriage," Miss Thune said.

Mr. Wisdom acknowledged that the IRD receives about 40 percent of its funding from private foundations, including some that are considered conservative, including the Adolph Coors Foundation and the John M. Olin Foundation.

The IRD says it is less concerned with where the financial support for the NCC is coming from than in how it is influencing the organization's political agenda.

"The considerable financial support now running into the coffers of the NCC from such organizations ... is not being given merely as a form of charity," said the Rev. John M. Reeves, an Orthodox priest.

Christian Groups Trade Barbs On Their Sources Of Funding (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Two influential Christian nonprofit organizations questioned each other's finances yesterday, each suggesting that the other is beholden to big donors with partisan political motives.

The clash between the National Council of Churches and the Institute on Religion and Democracy was a rarity in Washington, where liberal and conservative advocacy groups fight fiercely over issues but seldom dig deeply into each other's funding.

Both groups call themselves nonpartisan and are incorporated as tax-exempt charitable organizations. But the council, a New York-based alliance of 35 Christian denominations, is deeply involved in liberal social causes, such as reducing poverty and making peace; it achieved a long-standing legislative goal yesterday when the House voted to increase the minimum wage.

The institute, a Washington-based think tank, is allied with conservative groups on issues such as same-sex marriage. From its founding in 1981, its primary effort has been to challenge what it calls the "leftist" political positions of mainline Protestant denominations, such as the United Methodist Church and the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). It has worked closely with conservatives in those denominations, including Episcopalians who have broken away from their church since it consecrated a gay bishop in 2003.

Yesterday, the institute released a 90-page report, titled "Strange Yokefellows: The National Council of Churches and Its Growing Non-Church Constituency." It argued that the council in recent years has faced diminishing contributions from its member churches and has made up the shortfall with grants from such "left-leaning" groups as the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, the Ford Foundation and the Sierra Club.

In the fiscal year ending June 2005, the council received $1.76 million from secular foundations and non-church groups, surpassing the $1.75 million it received from member churches and "signaling a radical new development in the council's history," the report said. Noting that the enrolled membership in mainline Protestant denominations has fallen from 17 percent of the U.S. population in 1950 to 7 percent, it said that only six of the council's top 16 funders today are church groups.

"Several of these [non-church] groups that the NCC has turned to for financial and other forms of support are so blatantly partisan that they can be accurately described as . . . the shadow Democratic Party," the report's main researcher, John Lomperis, told reporters.

His co-author, Alan Wisdom, added that the council has abandoned the goal for which it was founded in 1950 -- fostering "Christian unity" -- and does not represent the true views of the 45 million Christians in its member churches, which include several historically black denominations and Orthodox churches.

The first question at the institute's news conference on the report came from the Rev. Leslie Tune, a staff member of the council, who asked where the institute gets its own funds.

James Tonkowich, the institute's president, said that about 60 percent of its roughly $1 million in annual revenue comes from individual donors and about 40 percent from conservative foundations, such as the Scaife, Bradley, Coors and Smith Richardson family charities.

Tonkowich also acknowledged that his organization has made public less information about its funders than the NCC has.

In separate interviews, Lomperis and Wisdom said they wrote the report largely in response to earlier criticism of the institute's funding from the council's general secretary, the Rev. Bob Edgar, a former Democratic congressman from Pennsylvania who is also a Methodist minister. In his 2006 book, "Middle Church," Edgar wrote that the institute's fundraising list "reads like a Who's Who of contemporary conservatism."

Edgar's book was the latest of several articles and books by liberal Protestants accusing the institute of fomenting divisions in their churches. In an article posted last year on the Web site of the Episcopal Diocese of Washington, the diocese's spokesman, Jim Naughton, said the IRD has received at least $4.6 million from conservative foundations since 1985, allowing the institute and a "small network" of fellow conservatives "to mount a global campaign that has destabilized the Episcopal Church."

Edgar, 63, who is stepping down as head of the NCC at the end of the year, did not speak at the institute's news conference. But he stayed afterward to shake hands with the report's authors and to thank them for recognizing that he has turned around the finances of the council, which was running a $5.9 million deficit when he took over in 2000 and has now balanced its budget for five years in a row.

"I was brought in to do three things: raise money, raise money and raise money," he said. "Thank you for highlighting that secular as well as religious organizations now recognize the importance of the National Council of Churches."

Gov. Releases Austere Spending Plan (LAT)

By Jordan Rau And Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, January 11, 2007

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today unveiled a restrained $143-billion state spending plan that eases some of California's chronic fiscal problems in part by restricting welfare payments and denying public transit systems $1.1 billion they were anticipating.

The plan's spending from the state's general fund-where most California taxes go-would be $103 billion, an increase of less than 1% from the current fiscal year, which ends June 1.

Schwarzenegger hailed his plan that would eliminate a multibillion-dollar deficit anticipated for this year and pay off early some of the state's debt incurred during its economic crisis at the turn of the century.

"Our net operating deficit has been reduced to zero," Schwarzenegger said. "It was not easy and our hard work is by no means finished."

Much of the fiscal picture was achieved because the state projected that its revenues will increase by 7.2%, despite the slowing housing market. The plan also leans on a more recent raft of borrowing to pay for long-needed maintenance to state parks and California's levees — spending that in the past had come out of the state's yearly budget.

DOJ_NMG_0115546

The budget also anticipates $506 million from five Indian gambling compacts the administration has negotiated but that so far have not passed the Legislature. Some fiscal experts doubt whether the new gambling venues would bring in that much money if they were permitted.

Republican legislators, who have been trashing Schwarzenegger's healthcare proposal and decrying his general turn to the left, were heartened by the relatively austere budget.

"The governor's budget reflects his commitment to fiscal responsibility," said Senate GOP Leader Dick Ackerman of Irvine. "No new taxes and debt reduction are welcomed by Republicans."

Schwarzenegger's budget is balanced partly with the help of gas tax revenue that now is supposed to go to local bus routes, light rail lines and other public transportation projects.

Transportation officials had anticipated that additional money would come their way because high gas prices had helped fill the state's coffers. Instead, that money would go to pay for school transportation and to pay off some of the state's transportation bonds.

While Schwarzenegger has said he would provide schools with the $56.8 billion required under Proposition 98, teachers would once again not be able to take advantage of a $200-million tax credit intended to offset out-of-pocket expenses teachers incur for classroom supplies.

The administration also shifted into education spending $269 million in child care costs that used to come out of the state's general fund.

The credit has not been available to teachers for three years. Schwarzenegger and lawmakers have suspended it to help balance the budget. Now the governor is proposing to eliminate it.

Schwarzenegger's budget also would reduce the state's welfare budget by $465 million. The savings would come by eliminating a cost-of-living adjustment that was to take effect in July for Cal-Works recipients and by cutting off aid to children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the state illegally and have been receiving such assistance for more than five years.

Some of these proposals met strong resistance from Democrats. They have said they will oppose the welfare reduction.

"Cal-Works cuts are unacceptable at a time when our state is enjoying unprecedented prosperity," said Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez (D-Los Angeles).

He called the budget a mix of good and bad news. "If you ride a bus or a subway, want to take your kids to a state park, or have to pay for your kid's tuition and fees, then this budget will hit you hard," he said. "But it could be worse. Much worse."

Schwarzenegger's budget presentation, with its blunt details about running the basic functions of government, comes after days of lofty inaugural rhetoric about "post-partisan" leadership and plans to fix California's healthcare morass with $43 billion in borrowing, in addition to a continuing, ambitious — and expensive — effort to rebuild the state's foundations. Voters approved $43 billion in bonds in November to pay for school, transportation, affordable housing and levee improvements and building.

The governor's second round of borrowing could be harder to pass because its key components — money for more water storage, courts and jails — were rejected by Democrats when he proposed them last year. Republican legislators support the purposes of much of the package, especially the water storage, but many of those lawmakers are deeply troubled by the notion of putting the state further into debt. Also part of the new round of borrowing would be money for school expansion, prisons and college facilities.

The plan offers a few expansions, such as $2.1 million more for public health safety programs to respond to food-borne bacteria such as E. coli. Outbreaks last year hobbled the state's spinach industry.

The governor's $12-billion healthcare plan — which would require all Californians to purchase insurance — does not directly affect the state budget, administration officials have said, but it is sure to become part of a contentious debate over the state's financial direction. The budget includes $36 million for healthcare expansions.

Schwarzenegger took a few questions from the press this afternoon, the first time he has fielded inquiries this year. Asked about his skiing accident just before Christmas, which resulted in a broken leg, Schwarzenegger said: "It was one of those very unfortunate accidents. The reason I said it was unfortunate is because it happened at a very slow speed."

He said that his ski boot did not pop off and as he fell it put pressure on his artificial hip, breaking his femur. "If I were to have that accident at 50 mph, and many times I've crashed at that speed, nothing happens," he said.

He said he had been very frustrated by the unyielding pain and is "very angry" a lot of the time.

"I don't think I can remember ever having had pain — ongoing pain, 24 hours a day — like after this operation," he said. "So it's really annoying to me, and believe me, there's nothing I hate more than having an obstacle like this. So this is very frustrating to me. It's very tough on my wife."

Schwarzenegger's Bond Sequel (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0115547

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, January 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. -- At this rate, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger may become known as the Bond-inator.

Last year, the former "Terminator" star persuaded California voters to pass a record bond package totaling $42.7 billion to help rebuild the state's aging infrastructure. This year, he is proposing that California go back to the well for an additional $43.3 billion in bonds, to help expand the rebuilding work -- and that is making even Democratic allies of the Republican governor a tad nervous.

"I'm a little taken aback that the governor would go back to the voters before we have even spent the bonds we just got," said Don Perata, the president of the Democratic-controlled state Senate after Mr. Schwarzenegger made the surprise proposal in his State of the State speech here Tuesday night.

'We Must Be Ambitious'

The governor offered up an ambitious agenda for his second term, vowing to take on the problems of health care, climate change, crumbling roads and a host of other difficult issues.

"We must be ambitious to get California to the future," the governor told legislators gathered in the State Assembly chamber. "We are addressing needs that have been ignored for decades."

Mr. Schwarzenegger's office says more borrowing is prudent, because the state is in much better financial shape than when the governor took office in 2003.

Indeed, Mr. Schwarzenegger released a budget proposal for 2007-2008 yesterday that would enable the state to repay 14 years ahead of schedule the billions in bonds it borrowed in 2003 after the collapse of the Internet boom.

The governor's spending plan of $143.4 billion also holds general spending to a relatively tight 1% increase, although as a whole it is up 9.1% over the same time.

It isn't just the size of the proposed bond package, but also the mix of it that concerns some. The governor would ask voters to sign off on $29.4 billion of the bonds, which would be spent on such things as rebuilding and expanding schools and colleges and providing for new dams to store water in the arid state.

But the other $13.9 billion -- much of which would go toward expanding the overcrowded prison system -- would come from lease-revenue and self-liquidating revenue bonds.

State Sen. Denise Ducheny said the lease bonds are more expensive than general obligation bonds, and so wonders if they would be prudent.

Also, added the Democrat -- who Mr. Schwarzenegger will need to work with as she is the incoming Senate budget chair -- voters may become bond weary.

"We have to be a little cautious," said Ms. Ducheny, who represents a district in San Diego.

Still, the governor has regained enough political capital since clashing with Democrats on several fronts in 2005 that even his detractors say they are willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, and work to find common ground.

Conservative Republicans may prove among the toughest to get to sign off another bond deal, since they have complained in the past about excessive spending and borrowing in Sacramento.

Political strategists say that's partly why Mr. Schwarzenegger opted to include a highly controversial plan to build new dams in California that the Republicans generally support while the Democrats don't.

Five-Receiver Set

Indeed, Fabian Nuñez, the powerful speaker of the Democratic-controlled state Assembly, already calls provisions for more water storage a nonstarter, saying those supplies could fall into the hands of profiteers.

The governor probably knows he isn't going to get everything he wants, though, added Mr. Perata, who along with Mr. Nuñez was instrumental in selling the governor's bond package last year.

"His strategy here seems to be, you send five receivers down the field and you throw to one," Mr. Perata said.

Grimacing And Barely Bearing It (NYT)

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 10 — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said Wednesday that he was in pain. A lot of pain.

And, he conceded, he has passed on his woes to his wife, Maria Shriver.

The governor, who rolled out his annual budget to the state house press corps here, broke his right leg skiing just before Christmas. He has hobbled on crutches, meandering rather than his more accustomed strutting, through the daily business of government.

DOJ_NMG_0115548

“I don’t think I can remember having this much pain,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said at a budget presentation that in contrast to his physical condition seemed strong.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican, said that California, which has experienced treacherous budget shortfalls in recent years, faced a gross operating deficit of $1.8 billion this year, but that prepaying state debt and some complex fiscal maneuvers would allow it to enjoy a modest surplus in the next fiscal year.

“You heard me right,” he said, panting slightly after making his way to the lectern in the auditorium of the building housing the office of the secretary of state. The governor has proposed cuts for agencies and restructuring the welfare-to-work system, to save more than an estimated $300 million.

Mr. Schwarzenegger conceded that he chafed at his hampered mobility. He chose to present his health care address, the centerpiece of his second-term agenda, by satellite from Los Angeles on Monday rather than before a live audience here.

“There is nothing I hate more than having an obstacle,” he said.

His injury occurred at “a very slow speed,” Mr. Schwarzenegger said, meaning that his ski did not pop off. As a result, the break occurred where the femur meets the hip, which he said was an artificial one.

California Plans Major Carbon Cut In Its Gasoline (CSM)

By Daniel B. Wood

Christian Science Monitor, January 11, 2007

LOS ANGELES

Now that California is on record as mandating a 25 percent cut in the state's greenhouse-gas emissions by 2020 - a move that made headlines worldwide four months ago - leaders here are starting to lay out how they intend to hit that ambitious mark. First up: requiring transportation fuels sold in California to contain less carbon, a major greenhouse gas.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) announced Tuesday that he will issue, within weeks, an executive order that sets a new "low carbon fuel standard" in the state. Aimed at petroleum refiners and filling stations, the new standard will give them 13 years, until 2020, to cut the carbon content of the fuels they sell for passenger vehicles by 10 percent.

The intent is twofold: to stimulate investment in alternative low-carbon fuels, and to curtail actual carbon emissions from tailpipes, which the governor said account for about 40 percent of the state's total.

"This is going to stir billions in investment - inviting technology companies of all kinds to come up with innovative ideas to reduce carbon emissions," says Eric Heitz, president of the Energy Foundation, a partnership of seven foundations dedicated to advancing energy efficiency and renewable energy. "It puts market forces to work to find the lowest costs and the best methods with a clear environmental goal.... It [also] eases US vulnerability to volatile price fluctuations driven by foreign political events." The entire world community, he predicts, will be watching California's efforts to curb greenhouse-gas emissions, which many scientists say are responsible for global warming.

California is the world's ninth largest emitter of the greenhouse gases that trap heat in the atmosphere. In unveiling the new standard for fuel content, Governor Schwarzenegger said a year-in-the-making white paper showed the importance of addressing the transportation sector.

"Transportation accounts for 40 percent of California's annual greenhouse-gas emissions, and we rely on petroleum-based fuels for 96 percent of our transportation needs," he said. "This dependency contributes to climate change and leaves workers, businesses, and consumers vulnerable to price shocks from an unstable global energy market." Higher prices for consumers?

As California moves to implement the new standard, its effect on consumers and the state economy will be closely watched. Several Republican lawmakers and business leaders have expressed early concern that the state crackdown on emissions will encourage businesses to locate outside California, or will increase their overall costs. Consumers worry that new fuels or fuel additives will raise prices at the corner gas station.

Advocates of the move, though, say California businesses and consumers stand to reap the windfall of technological investment. They say the new standard is expected to replace 20 percent of the state's on-road gasoline consumption with lower-carbon fuels, lead to a tripling of the size of the in-state renewable fuels market, and place more than 7 million alternative-fuel or hybrid vehicles on California roads - a 20-fold increase.

"The impact of this policy on consumers and the economy will likely be positive," says James Winebrake, chairman of the Public Policy Program at the Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT) in New York. "Although these low-carbon fuels may cost a bit more than conventional fuels, they may have a greater domestic content.... Therefore, money spent on low-carbon fuels is less likely to end up overseas and more likely to generate greater economic activity locally. This could have significant benefits to state and regional economies."

Schwarzenegger's announcement included appearances by environmental leaders, scholars, and energy and transportation consultants - all generally supportive of his plan. Industry's view

DOJ_NMG_0115549

Conspicuously absent were representatives of oil producers and carmakers. Conoco Phillips, in a written statement, said it "is supportive of and invests in technology development to produce and enable the use of low-carbon fuels and recognizes this [plan] is one component in a suite of actions necessary to reduce CO2 in the atmosphere."

BMW spokesman Andreas Klugesheid, reached at the auto show in Detroit, says his company is pushing a hydrogen car "whose emission pipe will eventually emit nothing but water vapor.

"We understand the limitation of fossil fuels is basically something that, in the long run, endangers our business.... We share the governor's approach to reduce CO2."

Some observers say oil and car companies will eventually warm to the idea of alternative fuels.

"Oil and car companies generally don't like to be told what to do, so their knee-jerk reaction is not to like it," says Dan Sperling of the Institute for Transportation at the University of California at Davis. "Once they look at this, they will think it is palatable because it gives them a lot of flexibility and comes with a market-based approach. No one of them will be at a disadvantage."

Others, such as RIT's Mr. Winebrake, say the question remains whether the action is "too little, too late."

And environmentalists worry that the state's rule on fuel content may not prevent ways of creating alternative fuels that are themselves polluting. Some ethanol plants in Texas, for instance, burn coal - a big carbon source - in the distilling process, says Sara Hessenflow Harper of the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC). Some methods of growing and harvesting corn for ethanol can be far more polluting than others, environmentalists note.

Supporters and detractors of the new standards agree that the rulemaking and implementation phases are complex - and fraught with political and economic pitfalls.

"In general, we are very excited about the prospect of simultaneously transforming the whole energy economy, lessening dependence on foreign oil, and reducing global warming all at once," says NRDC's Jennifer Witherspoon. "We just hope they don't inadvertently overlook any of the great solutions that are out there."

Former Sen. Burns Hired At Lobbying Firm (AP)

By Mary Clare Jalonick

AP, January 11, 2007

Former Sen. Conrad Burns, whose ties to lobbyists helped sink his re-election bid, has landed at a new workplace: a Washington lobbying firm.

Burns will work for his former chief of staff, Leo Giacometto, at the firm Gage, which has lobbied for Montana interests and several national technology companies, often making headlines for its connections to Burns and his staff.

In the Montana Senate race, Democratic challenger Jon Tester pounded Burns on his ties to Jack Abramoff, the lobbyist at the heart of an influence-peddling scandal. Burns had accepted about $150,000 in campaign contributions from Abramoff, his clients and associates. He later gave that money away, and denied any wrongdoing.

Burns won't be able to become a lobbyist just yet, as Senate rules prevent former members from lobbying their ex-colleagues for one year. The Senate is now considering ethics legislation — partly prompted by the Abramoff scandal — that would bump that period to two years.

A statement from Gage said Burns will be a senior adviser to the firm, focusing on "increasing the firm's visibility and presence domestically and internationally to provide a greater reach of opportunities for Gage clients."

Fairfax Vs. 'No Child' Standoff Heats Up (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Teenagers from Uzbekistan, Korea and Egypt huddled one recent morning in a Fairfax County classroom, studying English words on slips of paper. Dozens were familiar, but not "bitter," "nibble" or "wicked." Felobateer Hana, 13, held up another. An animated movie character came to mind: "Shrek?"

"That's a good guess, but Shrek doesn't have an 'i' in it," said teacher Karyn Niles at Liberty Middle School in Clifton. "This is 'shriek.' Shriek is kind of like yelling."

Students such as Felobateer and his eighth-grade classmates, all recent immigrants who are learning English as a second language, are at the center of an intensifying dispute between Virginia schools and the U.S. Department of Education over testing requirements under the federal No Child Left Behind law.

Fairfax County school officials are protesting a federal mandate to give most English learners reading tests that mirror those taken by their native-speaking peers. Tonight, the school system is taking a major step toward challenging that mandate and the federal law.

DOJ_NMG_0115550

School board member Phillip A. Niedzielski-Eichner (Providence), backed by other members and school administrators, plans to propose a resolution that would authorize officials to refuse to give immigrant students tests that they think most would fail.

The resolution could come to a vote as soon as Jan. 25. If it passes, several Fairfax schools probably will fall short of federal academic standards.

"When it comes between doing what's educationally sound for children and doing what's best for bureaucrats, I'm siding with children every day of the week," said school board Member Stuart D. Gibson (Hunter Mill).

School officials in Arlington and Harrisonburg are considering a similar step.

As Congress prepares to debate renewal of the five-year-old federal law, controversy has emerged over how to measure the progress of children learning English. The federal government objected last year to the way Virginia and 17 other states test limited-English students. Often, federal officials indicated, the state tests for such students were not demanding enough. They said that all students in a given state must be held to the same standards.

"It's important students enrolled in our schools are properly assessed, and that includes limited-English-proficient students," Chad Colby, an Education Department spokesman, said yesterday. "With testing, we have more data. So policymakers and educators at every level will have more information to make sure students who need more help get it."

One of the 17 states that drew a federal objection was Texas, home state of President Bush. Another was New York, which has asked federal officials to waive test scores for certain students who are recent immigrants.

Testing programs for English learners in Maryland and the District have withstood federal scrutiny.

Fairfax is well positioned to challenge the law because of its record of high academic achievement, said Wayne E. Wright, professor of bicultural and bilingual studies at the University of Texas in San Antonio.

"The feds are saying, 'If you say an English language learner cannot meet state standards, you have low expectations,' " Wright said. "The classroom teachers are saying, 'The federal government has completely unrealistic expectations.' "

Until now, Virginia has given English learners a specialized proficiency test to measure progress in reading. Many Virginia educators say that children who lack mastery of the language aren't prepared for grade-level exams that may include questions about similes, metaphors or analogies. They say it can take three or more years of school to reach that level.

Federal law requires testing every year in reading and math in grades 3 through 8 and once in high school. The government exempts students who have been in a U.S. school for less than a year from taking standard grade-level reading tests.

But after one year, the students are supposed to enter the testing mainstream. Federal officials say that students with limited English skills may be given special assistance, such as a bilingual dictionary or more time on a test.

But many local educators say the federal standard is too lofty for students just beginning to understand the nuances of English. The Virginia Board of Education has asked federal officials for permission to use the old, specialized test this spring, giving the state a year to design new tests aligned with state standards. Virginia's congressional delegation is lobbying Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to grant the request. Colby said Spellings has not made a decision. Fairfax officials support the one-year deferral, saying that it would be the best solution.

About 10,200 Virginia students are affected by the testing dispute, state officials said. About 4,000 are in Fairfax, which has the largest school system in the state and the Washington region.

At Liberty Middle School, Niles said her class shows why grade-level tests would stump many recent immigrants. She said that her students are making rapid progress but are still learning to decipher sounds and rules of English.

This week, the class was reading "The Enormous Crocodile," learning about character, plot and theme through a fourth-grade text. Other eighth-graders who are native English speakers were studying John Steinbeck's "The Pearl." Niles predicted that many of her students would be overwhelmed by passages in the standard state reading test.

"They'd shut down," she said. "They'll just put their heads down."

Under the resolution, English learners will continue to take proficiency tests, and the Fairfax district will report the results. Fairfax Superintendent Jack D. Dale is urging principals and teachers to focus on Virginia standards and county goals and not worry about the threat of federal sanctions.

"It's time for us to describe what are the quality parts about the law and what needs to be altered to make sense," Dale said.

Ethiopia 'holding Suspects' After US Air Strike (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0115551

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, said on Wednesday that a US air strike in southern Somalia on Monday had killed eight suspected militants and wounded five others, who had been captured by Ethiopian forces.

Ethiopia, a key US ally, led an offensive against a Somali Islamist movement and has thousands of troops deployed in its Horn of Africa neighbour, backing Somalia's transitional government. But reports of fresh air strikes in the south of Somalia on , where Islamist forces are holed up, were denied by US and Ethiopian officials, who said their aircraft had not launched new attacks.

Both Washington and Addis Ababa accuse the Islamic Courts Union, the coalition of Islamist groups that took control of Mogadishu, the Somali capital, last June, of sheltering alleged al-Qaeda members, including three suspects wanted in connection with the 1998 US embassy bombings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, as well as 2002 attacks in Kenya. The ICU denies any links with al-Qaeda.

On Tuesday the Pentagon confirmed that an AC130 aircraft was used to target "the principal al-Qaeda leadership in the region". The attack in southern Somalia marked the first overt US military intervention in the lawless nation since its doomed invasion in the 1990s.

The Arab League criticised the US military action, claiming it had killed "many innocent victims" and demanding that Washington refrain from further attacks.

Mr Meles disputed reports that civilians were killed in the US strikes and said he was waiting for DNA tests to confirm the identities of the suspects. It was not clear whether the Ethiopian leader was referring to ICU fighters or to suspected al-Qaeda members.

Abdirahman Dinari, a Somali government spokesman, said the area targeted was heavily wooded and that Somali security personnel were searching the area. The region is remote, communications are poor and the weak government is not an effective entity.

The ICU was forced to flee towards the Kenyan border by the Ethiopian offensive, which began on December 24. Diplomats say the US strikes could fuel a potential insurgency and increase the unpopularity of the government and the thousands of Ethiopian troops deployed in Somalia.

Some diplomats are more optimistic than others, suggesting that recent events had created a "window of opportunity" to establish a genuinely representative government. Others remain wary.

U.S. Reportedly Targeted 20 In Somalia (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, January 11, 2007

Ethiopia's prime minister said Wednesday the U.S. military targeted 20 high-level members of an Islamic movement linked to al-Qaida in an airstrike this week in southern Somalia, attacking quickly before the Islamists could escape.

The chief of staff for the Somali president claimed that a senior al-Qaida figure was killed in Monday's airstrike, although U.S. officials did not confirm it.

The air assault has been criticized internationally, with the African Union, European Union and United Nations among those expressing concern. But British Prime Minister Tony Blair told lawmakers it was right to stand up to extremists who were using violence to "get their way" in Somalia.

Somali lawmaker Abdulrashid Hidig said the U.S. launched a new airstrike Wednesday around Ras Kamboni, a rugged coastal area a few miles from the Kenyan border where Monday's attack took place. He cited the Somali military as the source of the information.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi told reporters in his country's capital, Addis Ababa, that eight suspected terrorists were killed in Monday's airstrike, five were wounded and taken into custody by Ethiopian forces, and seven escaped.

Meles said most of the victims were Somali, but the identities would not be confirmed until DNA testing is completed.

He said Ethiopia and the U.S. have been cooperating on intelligence, and that most of the information has come from the Americans. He also said the Ethiopians did not provide any intelligence that led to Monday's airstrike.

"I do not know how the Americans got the information, but they appeared to have some credible information," he said. "Apparently they felt if they did not strike quickly, the target would be missed."

However, a U.S. military official based in the region said the Ethiopian military had provided the intelligence that led to the strike. "We acted on time-sensitive intelligence and made the strike in cooperation with the Ethiopians," said the U.S. official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity surrounding U.S. special operations missions.

In Washington, an intelligence official said the U.S. killed five to 10 people Monday in the attack on an al-Qaida target in southern Somalia. A Somali lawmaker said 31 civilians died Tuesday when helicopter gunships attacked suspected al-Qaida fighters in the south.

The U.S. military official said Tuesday's strike was probably carried out by Ethiopia since the aircraft were identified as Russian-made Hind helicopter gunships like those used by the Ethiopian military.

Abdirizak Hassan, the Somali president's chief of staff, said at least three U.S. airstrikes have been launched since Monday and that more were likely.

The al-Qaida suspect believed to have been killed Monday was Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who allegedly planned the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, Hassan said. He cited a U.S. intelligence report that was given to Somali authorities.

If confirmed, it would mean the end of an eight-year hunt for one of the FBI's most-wanted terrorists. Fazul was believed to have been harbored by the Somali Islamic movement that had challenged the country's Ethiopian-backed government for power.

In Washington, U.S. government officials said they had no reason to believe that Fazul had been killed. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of the information's sensitivity.

Fazul, 32, joined al-Qaida in Afghanistan and trained with Osama bin Laden, according to FBI documents. The U.S. put a $5 million bounty on his head for allegedly planning the embassy bombings, which killed 225 people.

This week's air attacks were the first U.S. offensive in Somalia since 18 American soldiers were killed here in 1993. The military's aim is to capture al-Qaida members thought to be fleeing advancing Ethiopian-backed Somali troops.

Somalia's Deputy Prime Minister Hussein Aided said Wednesday that U.S. special forces were needed on the ground to help Somali and Ethiopian troops capture Muslim extremists. "They have the know-how and the right equipment to capture these people," said Aided, a former U.S. Marine.

A senior Somali government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said a small U.S. operations team already was on the ground, providing military advice to Ethiopian and government forces.

In Washington, two senior Pentagon officials said Wednesday they had heard of no plans to put any sizable contingent of American ground troops in Somalia. Small teams of liaison officers — such as special forces advisers or trainers — were another matter, they said on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak on the subject.

U.S. troops based in Djibouti have been training Ethiopian soldiers for years, mostly in small-unit tactics and border security. Ethiopia has the largest military and is America's closest ally in the region.

Meles said the success of the Ethiopian military intervention may have paved the way for the American airstrikes.

"No one expected the terrorists would be running around in groups of five or six without any protection," Meles said.

In the Somali capital, Mogadishu, some said the U.S. air attacks would increase anti-American sentiment in the largely Muslim country, where people are already upset by the presence of troops from Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population.

Weapons Raids In Somalia After Violent Night (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 11, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 10 — Mogadishu exploded in violence on Wednesday morning after unknown insurgents attacked a transitional government barracks during the night and soldiers responded by sealing off large swaths of the city, searching house to house for guns.

The weapons raids immediately provoked stiff resistance, and squads of Ethiopian soldiers and troops loyal to the transitional government poured into the streets, where they battled outraged residents and a handful of masked insurgents.

From dawn to afternoon, the pop of gunfire and the boom of explosives reverberated across Mogadishu, Somalia's reliably chaotic capital.

But it is difficult to tell how many people here actually support the growing insurgency against Somalia's transitional government and the Ethiopian troops backing it. On Wednesday, a group of masked men stood on the steps of a Mogadishu mosque and proclaimed themselves to be Somalia's new freedom fighters. They were met by jeers.

"Why can't you hit anything, then?" shouted one woman, referring to a botched grenade attack that missed the Ethiopians and demolished a house. "Were you scared? Were your fingers trembling?"

Regardless of the insurgents' popularity, or lack thereof, violence is increasing. And the transitional government, which entered the capital two weeks ago for the first time since it formed in 2004, now faces a critical test: how quickly, if at all, can it pacify a notoriously dangerous city, bristling with military-grade weaponry and split by deep clan divisions?

Most of the violence on Wednesday was concentrated in strongholds of the Ayr, a powerful clan-based group closely connected to the Islamist movement that had controlled much of the country until the Ethiopian military entered the fray last month. On the other hand, neighborhoods of the Darod clan, the clan of Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, the transitional president, were quiet. Many Darod members said they were happy about the weapons raids, especially the ones in Ayr neighborhoods.

Clan rivalries have been the curse of Somalia ever since there was a Somalia. They are the cause of its civil wars, its famines and its state of suspended decay. It seems that this new chapter is no different.

The insurgents are still a mysterious bunch, but they are widely suspected to be members of the ousted Islamist movement. After being routed, the Islamists vowed to fight on as an underground army. As each night passes, more government troops are attacked. On Tuesday, insurgents launched one of their boldest strikes, firing rocket-propelled grenades at an army barracks downtown. Witnesses said at least two soldiers died, and the insurgents got away. But on Wednesday, residents said that Ethiopian soldiers were able to confiscate some guns and arrest several people suspected of being insurgents.

Doctors at Medina Hospital said Wednesday that in the past 24 hours 15 people had been admitted for gunshot wounds, including 3 government soldiers. The violence this past week has filled all of the hospital's 65 beds, leaving bleeding men and women curled up on the floor and under acacia trees in the courtyard.

"This is not something that is going to stop," said Dahir Muhammad, a hospital official. "Until the Ethiopians leave, people will be determined to kill them."

The Islamist leaders, meanwhile, have fled to southern Somalia along the Kenyan border where they are being hunted by Ethiopian troops, with the help of American forces.

Somali officials said Wednesday that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, a main suspect in the bombings against American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, had been killed in a recent American airstrike in southern Somalia.

But American officials quickly distanced themselves from that claim, saying they were not even sure Mr. Fazul was among the terrorism suspects hiding in the jungle with the Islamists. They did say Abu Taha al-Sudani, a top aide to Mr. Fazul, and Aden Hashi Ayrow, a Somali terrorism suspect, might have been killed.

An American AC-130 gunship pounded the area Sunday night, the first time American forces have been publicly deployed in Somalia since 1994. Since June, when the Islamist movement rose to power, American officials have complained that Islamist leaders were sheltering terrorists connected to the embassy bombings, which together killed more than 200 people.

On Wednesday, residents in southern Somalia said warplanes returned, though those reports could not be independently verified. The Ethiopian Air Force has also been pummeling the area.

Pentagon officials said Wednesday that small numbers of American special operations ground troops were in Somalia working with Ethiopian forces and gathering evidence from the site of the United States airstrike.

"One would assume that a U.S. ground presence would be required at the least to do the DNA confirmation," said Roger W. Cressey, a former National Security Council official. "It's not something you would leave to the Ethiopians, and certainly not the Somalis."

Thousands of Ethiopian troops are essentially occupying Somalia, and many Somalis are beginning to resent it. Barwaqho Muhammad Osman, a mother of two, stood in a downtown Mogadishu street Wednesday morning with bags of groceries in her hands and no way to get home.

Ethiopian soldiers told her that her neighborhood had been sealed off because of the raids. When Ms. Osman tried to plead with them, witnesses said, the soldiers clicked the safeties off their guns and told her to go.

"Why did our president bring in these people?" she fumed. "They are occupiers, and if they keep this up, they will fail at every step."

Somali Capital Awash In Anger At Ethiopia, U.S., Interim Leaders (WP)

By Stephanie Mccrummen

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 10 -- A messy, low-level battle for control of the battered streets of Mogadishu continued Wednesday, as a fighter shot a rocket-propelled grenade at a convoy of Ethiopian trucks passing through the combustible Somali capital.

The situation is so confused and the city so fractured and armed that the attacks, recounted by witnesses, could have come from any number of groups frustrated with the presence of Ethiopian troops, who last month swept a popular Islamic movement from power on behalf of the weak, U.S.-backed transitional government that is now struggling to assert control.

Former fighters loyal to the ousted Islamic Courts movement are hiding in the city's byzantine tin-patch neighborhoods. Sub-clans and sub-sub-clans are angry with Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi, who they say is favoring his own people as he doles out power and who has announced intentions to forcibly disarm an insecure city fortified with guns.

And many Somalis are enraged over the U.S. airstrike in the southern tip of the country early Monday, which was aimed at suspects in the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania who are thought to be among the ousted Islamic leaders on the run along the marshy coast near the Kenyan border.

"We are afraid of a long war," said businessman Abdulahi Mohamed Mohamud, 31, speaking by telephone from Mogadishu. "And people are angry at the Ethiopian troops."

DOJ_NMG_0115554

The current spate of violence began Saturday, as hundreds of Somalis flooded the streets, shouting at Ethiopian troops to leave the city, smashing cars, burning tires and throwing stones in protests that were sparked in part by rumors that the Ethiopians were about to go door-to-door confiscating weapons.

After skirmishes between militias and Ethiopian troops Sunday and Monday, a full-fledged gun battle raged for several hours Tuesday amid battered buildings and shops in a busy part of the city called Kilometer Four.

A body, reportedly of a man who launched a rocket-propelled grenade at Ethiopian troops Tuesday, lay in the road all night and into Wednesday morning, when a Somali police officer dragged it off. Three Somali police officers were reported killed in Tuesday's fighting, and a dozen people were injured, though accounts of casualties differ.

Wednesday afternoon, another grenade was launched at a convoy of Ethiopian trucks, wounding one civilian and, according to a local news agency, killing at least one government soldier. It was unclear whether Ethiopians were hit.

Since the Islamic fighters were pushed out, the city has been slowly returning to the hands of militias and thieves. Most attacks since Sunday have occurred in areas considered strongholds of the Ayr, a powerful and well-armed sub-sub-clan and a former backer of the Islamic Courts.

The transitional government, with the help and handicap of the Ethiopians, is racing to establish its authority on the streets. On Wednesday, Somali police dismantled two roadblocks by force and arrested 11 militiamen, government officials said. And Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf, who only recently returned to Mogadishu after a 40-year exile, met with a key leader of the Ayr, Abdi Qasim, a move that some analysts said could pacify a portion of the city.

The meeting "will help if they understood each other," said Mohamed Haji, 38, a columnist for a local newspaper, speaking by phone from Mogadishu. "Qasim was an opponent of the Ethiopian intervention, and his clan was supporting the [Islamic Courts movement]. So it's very important to negotiate with him."

Haji and others remained concerned, however, that new U.S. airstrikes would further agitate the city.

The Pentagon and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi denied Wednesday that U.S. warplanes had conducted additional attacks after the one Monday. But a Somali government official said airstrikes -- whether American or Ethiopian -- were "ongoing." An air attack is "going on today, and probably it may go on tomorrow," Abdirizak Hassan, chief of staff to the Somali premier, said Wednesday.

Two witnesses in Kismaayo, a port city about 60 miles from the area hit Monday, said they saw two military aircraft overhead about 1:45 p.m. Wednesday.

On Tuesday, Hassan told The Washington Post that U.S. military officials had reported to him that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, considered the chief organizer of the embassy bombings, was killed in the airstrike Monday. U.S. officials have cautioned against reports that Fazul was among the targets or was killed and said the main target was another al-Qaeda figure, Abu Talha al-Sudani.

In New York on Wednesday, the U.N. Security Council began debating the conflict. In a closed session, Ibrahim Gambari, the United Nations' undersecretary for political affairs, urged the interim government to begin talks with clan leaders, clerics and moderate elements of the Islamic Courts movement, saying the deployment of a peacekeeping force would be "problematic" without a political settlement in place, according to a copy of his statement.

He noted a pledge by Uganda to provide 1,000 troops for an East African peacekeeping mission and said Malawi, Nigeria and South Africa are considering participation.

Several envoys expressed concern that U.S. airstrikes could undercut international efforts to calm Somalia. But diplomats from China, Qatar and other countries suggested the United States may have a legal basis for intervention: a request for help from Somalia's interim leadership.

Away from the United Nations, diplomats from France, Italy, Egypt, the Arab League and African Union have criticized the U.S. air operation, saying it will destabilize Somalia further.

The Mess At State (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 11, 2007

Members of the Senate intelligence committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, were alarmed last week that John Negroponte was leaving as director of national intelligence after less than two years to become deputy secretary of state. By way of explanation, he informed one Republican senator that he did not want to make the switch but that the White House had prevailed on him to do so.

Just how career diplomat Negroponte came to be the new intelligence czar in the first place is puzzling. But to pull him out just as his on-the-job training was completed reflects a panicky desire to fill the deputy secretary post, which had been unfilled for an unprecedented six months. Five other key State Department positions are either vacant or are soon to be vacant.

Republicans in Congress who do not want to be quoted tell me that the State Department under Condoleezza Rice is a mess. This comes at a time when the U.S. global position is precarious. While attention is focused on Iraq, American diplomacy is being tested worldwide -- in Afghanistan, Iran, Israel, Korea and Sudan. The judgment by thoughtful Republicans is that Rice has failed to manage that endeavor.

Rice's previous government duties had been as an analyst and staffer rather than as a manager. That made it important for her to name a strong deputy secretary to run the building. John Bolton, an undersecretary in President Bush's first term and an experienced bureaucratic manager, volunteered. Rice instead picked him to be ambassador to the United Nations. The conservative Bolton ran afoul of a liberal Senate vendetta that blocked his confirmation for any post.
